A DIAMOND ROBBERY.

A FRENCH STORY.

It was in the palmiest days of the ill-fated second empire. The triumphs of the Crimea were not yet forgotten; the laurels won at Magenta were still verdant and fresh; Sedan, with all its bitter humiliation and disastrous train of tragic consequences, loomed in the misty future, undreamed of amidst the almost fabulous luxury and incredible frivolity which paved the way for the final terrible fiasco.

It was an evening in mid-winter. The Parisian season was at its height, and a brilliant audience had assembled at the Theater Francais to witness the performance of Jules Sandeau's delightful play, "Mlle. de la Seigliere," in which the role of Destournelles was filled by the great Regnier, and that of Helene by Madeline Brohan, then in the zenith of her fame, radiant with youth, beauty, and those fascinations, the outcome of innate talent and refinement, which rendered this gifted lady one of the most charming and perfect actresses of modern days.

The empress was present, graceful and beautiful; the emperor at her side, wrapt in his favorite air of gloomy abstraction, which, like Lord Burleigh's celebrated nod, was supposed to mean so much, yet which, viewed by the impartial light of subsequent veracious history, seems to have signified so very little. Several officers in glittering uniforms were in attendance, sparkling with decorations showered upon them by a grateful sovereign: and amongst these gallant warriors, conspicuous by the sombreness of his attire, was a solitary, humble, black-coated civilian in ordinary evening dress, with the inevitable speck of red at his button-hole.

In a box almost immediately opposite that occupied by their imperial majesties was a young and exceedingly handsome Russian lady, the Countess Ivanoff, concerning whose manifold graces and fascinations the great world of Paris elected to interest itself considerably at this period.

The beauty and wit of this fair northern enchantress were the theme of every masculine tongue, and her magnificent diamonds the envy and admiration of all female beholders.

The countess was accompanied by her husband, a fine man of distinguished prepossessing appearance, who looked an embodied refutation of the celebrated Napoleonic aphorism, as though no amount of "scratching" could ever unearth the Cossack element underneath his refined polished exterior.

The curtain fell after the first act. The emperor and empress withdrew during the entre'acte. Many humbler mortals followed their example; among them Count Ivanoff, apparently in no wise disturbed by the fact that the golden youth in the stalls were bringing a small battery of opera-glasses to bear upon the dazzling charms of his beautiful wife, with a brazen persistency which we chivalrous Britishers like to flatter ourselves is the monopoly of foreigners.

The countess leaned back in her luxurious fauteuil, fanning herself dreamily, serenely indifferent to the interest she was exciting. In the dim light of her curtain-shaded box the glitter of her splendid diamonds seemed to form a sort of a luminous halo around her graceful head; a myriad of starry brilliants gleamed among the masses of her gold-brown hair, and two priceless stones, popularly reported to be worth that unknown quantity, a king's ransom, flashed and twinkled like twin planets in her little shell-tinted ears.

The Count had not been gone five minutes when there was a gentle knock at the door, and in answer to the countess' "Entrez," the ouvreuse appeared and said deferentially:

"Pardon, Mme. la Comtesse, a gentleman charged with a message from her majesty the empress waits in the corridor, and desires to know if madame will have the goodness to receive him."

"Certainly! Enter, I beg of you, monsieur," responded the countess in the low sweet voice, which was not the least of her many attractions, bowing graciously, as she recognized the distinguished looking individual she had already noticed in close proximity to the emperor in the imperial box.

The visitor advanced a few steps, and still standing in deep shadow, said with grave dignity: "I trust my intrusion may be pardoned. I am desired by her majesty to ask a favor of Mme. la Comtesse, and, at the same time, to beg that she will have the goodness to excuse a somewhat unusual request."

"The obligation will be mine if I can fulfil even the least of her majesty's wishes," answered the countess gracefully.

"The case is this," explained the gentleman, in a tone of well bred ease, "an argument has arisen concerning the size of the diamonds in your ear-rings and those of the countess W. The empress begs that you will entrust one of your pendants to her care for a few moments as the only satisfactory method of disposing of the vexed question. I will myself return it the instant her majesty gives it back into my keeping."

"With the greatest pleasure," agreed the countess, with amiable alacrity, detaching the precious jewel forthwith, and depositing it without misgiving, in the outstretched palm of the imperial messenger: for, indeed, diamonds were almost as plentiful in the existence of this fortunate lady as in the pages of Lothair, and she attached no more importance to them than did the jewel laden heroines of our late great and lamented premier.

The countess bestowed a smile and a gracious bow of dismissal upon her majesty's distinguished ambassador, who responded by a profoundly respectful inclination as he made his exit. Once safely outside the box, the aristocratic features of this high-bred imperial emissary suddenly lost their serene expression of dignified gravity, and relaxed into a triumphant Mephistophelean grin.

Shortly afterward Count Ivanhoff returned. "I have been talking to D—," he remarked, as he seated himself. "Clever fellow, D—, I am not surprised at the emperor's partiality to him; he must find him so useful when he is in want of an idea."

"Who is D—?" inquired the countess, with languid interest.

"That is rather a difficult question," replied the count, smiling; "there are several editions of his biography—all different, probably none of them true. He is successful, which is the chief point; moreover, he is entertaining, and, at any rate, looks and speaks like a gentleman, which in these evil days is something—even much. Tenez, he has just entered the emperor's box—the man in the black coat."

"Is that M. D—?" exclaimed the countess, waking up to a mild interest in the subject; "if so, he has been here while you were away. He came on the part of the empress, and carried off one of my earrings, which her majesty wished to compare with one of the Countess W's."

"D—? Impossible! I was talking to him the whole time I was absent, and he only left me at the top of the staircase two seconds before I returned."

"Nevertheless, mon ami, he has been here and taken my earring. See! it is gone."

"Effectively," agreed the count with a grim smile; "but D—has not taken it. It is to the last degree unlikely that the empress would make such a request. Depend upon it you have been the victim of a thief, got up as an accurate copy of the distinguished looking D—."

"Impossible!" cried the countess in her turn. "The affair is absolutely as I tell you. It was M. D—, the veritable M. D— I see opposite, who came into this box and took away my diamond. Only wait a little, and he will bring it back intact."

"To wait a little is to lessen the chance of its recovery. In any case I will go and inquire of D—, if I can get at him, whether he has been seized with a sudden attack of kleptomania; because the idea of the empress having sent him roaming around the theatre, borrowing a lady's jewels, I regard as preposterous. Ah! these Parisian fitous! You do not know what scientific geniuses they are in their way."

With this the count departed, and the second act was nearly at an end before he returned.

In the meantime the countess perceived that she was an object of interest to the occupants of the imperial box, and notably to the "double" of her late aristocratic-looking visitor, who, she could still solemnly declare, had stood before her in the flesh.

"I was right," whispered the count, re-entering and bending over his wife's chair: "D— knows nothing of your earring, and needless to say, the empress never sent him or any one else upon such an errand. I have put the matter into the hands of the police, and they will do all that is possible to recover it."

"Really! How very droll!" remarked the countess, with calm nonchalance—for she belonged to that order of impassive statuesque women, who remain mistress of themselves, though any quantity of "china fall;" "I will take out the other earring, or people may fancy I am trying to set the fashion of wearing an odd one," and she handed the fellow to the purloined jewel to her husband.

The play came to an end, as even that most excellent feast of reason, a good French play, well acted, must do, sooner or later, in common with all things mundane.

The countess was duly commiserated by sympathizing friends, who one and all declared, behind her back, that they never would have been guilty of the imbecility of trusting so valuable a possession to the tender mercies of however fascinating a stranger; but nothing more was heard of the stolen jewel until the following day at noon, when Count Ivanoff received a note from D— to the effect that, as he could not help considering himself partly responsible for the loss of the diamond which had disappeared through the agency of his counterpart, he had taken an early opportunity of interviewing the chief of police, who assured him he had good reason to believe the thief had already been traced as far as Brussels.

Early in the afternoon the countess was about to start for her early drive in the Bois. The frozen snow lay deep upon the ground, and her sledge with its two jet black Russian horses jingling their bells merrily in the frosty air, stood waiting in the court-yard while the countess donned her furs.

A servant entering announced that an officer of police in plain clothes asked permission to speak with Mme. la Comtesse concerning the lost diamond.

Into the boudoir presently came the countess, stately, beautiful, fur-clad, buttoning her little gloves. Near the door stood a short, wiry-looking man, with keen black eyes, closely-cropped hair, and compact military figure. The small man clicked his heels together and bowed profoundly in the presence of so much high-born loveliness, while he said with the utmost respect, at the same time laying a letter upon the table:

"I am sent by order of the chief de police to inform Mme. la Comtesse that the stolen diamond has been satisfactorily traced, but there is unfortunately some little difficulty connected with its identification. I am charged, therefore, to beg that Mme. la Comtesse will have the goodness to intrust the fellow-earring to the police for a short period, in order that it may be compared with the one found in the possession of the suspected thief. Madame will find that the letter I bring corroborates my statement."

The countess glanced hastily through the letter, and ringing the bell desired that her maid might be told to bring the remaining earring immediately; this was done, and the dapper little man, bowing deferentially, departed with the precious duplicate safely in his possession.

The countess descended to her sledge and drove to the club, to call for her husband en route for the Bois. Crossing the Place de la Concorde, she related to him the latest incident in the story of the diamond earring.

"You were never induced to give up the other" cried Count Ivanoff incredulously.

"But I tell you, mon ami, an officer of police came himself to fetch it, bringing a letter from his superior vouching for the truth of his statement."

"If the prefect himself had come, I don't think I should have been cajoled into letting him have it after last night's experience," laughed her husband. "However, for the second time of asking, we will go and inquire."

The coachman turned and drove as directed to the bureau of police, at which the count had lodged his complaint the night before. After a somewhat protracted delay the count rejoined his wife with a semi-grim look of amusement upon his handsome hirsute face.

"The police know nothing of your detective or his epistolary efforts," he said, drawing the fur rug up to his chin as the impatient horses sped away merily over the frozen snow; "it was the wrong man they got hold of at Brussels. Your second earring has been netted by another member of the light-fingered fraternity, and upon my honor I think he was the most accomplished artist of the two."

Food Value of Starch.

It may surprise some of our readers to be told that the starch of bread has not the slightest nutritive property. Its sole office is a heat-producer; and, just like the coal of the engine, the starch or sugar is burned up inside us to keep up the temperature of the machine. It is the gluten, the sticky, tenacious matter in the grain, which is the nutritive, flesh-forming material; but in the present article we have no space to follow the changes which it undergoes in the system, for we are simply treating of starch at present; and we trust we have made it clear how it is changed into sugar, and thus made soluble and fit for absorption into the juices which keep the body at a uniform temperature and in good repair. It is a common but mistaken notion that sago and tapioca are very nutritious. On the contray, they consist almost wholly of starch, with only about three per cent. of gluten, so that, unless cooked with milk or eggs, they form a very insufficient food. The same is the case with Indian-corn flour and arrowroot, which have scarcely a particle of nutritious matter in them, so that it is a great mistake to feed an invalid or a child on such materials. They are no doubt useful, as easily digested heat-producers; but they must be cooked with milk or eggs before they are of much use for actual nutriments; and many a child has been starved to death through its parents' ignorance of this fact. It is true medical men often recommend arrowroot for those in delicate health, as it is of great importance to keep up the natural heat of the body with the least exertion of the digestive organs; but it cannot be too widely known that arrowroot pure and simple is a mere heat-producer; and milk, beef tea, soup, or other suitable flesh-forming food, must be given with it, if the child or invalid is to be kept alive. On the other hand, semolino, hominy, lentil-meat, pea-flour, etc., not being prepared by washing, contain a much greater amount of flesh-forming material than sago, arrowroot, etc.

Sunken Irish Cities.

There are numerous legends of sunken cities scattered throughout Ireland, some of which are of a most romantic origin. Thus the space now covered by the Lake of Inchiguis, is reported in former days to have been a populous and flourishing city; but for some dreadful and unabsolved crime, tradition says, it was buried beneath the deep waters. The dark spirit of its king still resides in one of the caverns which border the lake, and once every seven years at midnight he issues forth, mounted on his white charger, and makes the complete circuit of the lake, a performance which he is to continue till the silver hoofs of his steed are worn out, when the curse will be removed and the city reappear once more in all its bygone condition. The peasantry affirm that even now on a calm night one may clearly see the towers and spires gleaming through the clear water.

With this legend we may compare one told by Burton in his "History of Ireland." "In Ulster is a lake 30,000 paces long and 15,000 broad, out of which ariseth the noble river called Bane. It is believed by the inhabitants that they were formerly wicked, vicious people who lived in this place, and there was a prophecy in every one's mouth that whenver a well which was therein, and was continually cevered and locked up carefully, should be left open, so great a quantity of water would issue therefrom as would soon overflow the whole adjacent country. It happened than an old beldame coming to fetch water heard her child cry; upon which, running away in haste, she forgot to cover the spring, and, coming back to do it, the land was so over-run that it was past her help; and at length she, her child, and all the territory were drowned, which caused this pool that remains."—Blockwood's Magazine.

Conversation at Home.

Endeavour always to talk your best before your children. They hunger perpetually for new idea. They will learn with pleasure from the lips of parents what they deem it drudgery to study in bookes, and, even if they have the misfortune to be deprived of many educational advantage; they will grow up intelligent if they enjoy in childhood the privilege of listening daily to the conversation of intelligent people. We sometimes see parents who are the life of every company which they enter, dull, silent, and uninteresting at home among their children. If they have not mental activity and mental stores sufficient for both, let them first use what they have for their own households. A silent home is a dull place for young people—a place from which they will escape if they can. How much useful information, on the other hand, is often given in pleasant family conversation, and what unconscious but excellent mental training in lively social argument. Cultivate to the most the graces of conversation.

Appeal to a Forgotten Law.

Few people, I should imagine, are aware of the existence of an act of parliament known as the "Tippling Act of George II." By this statute it appears that a gentleman of bibulous propensities who runs up a long score at a tavern for casual drinks can avoid payment of the bill by pleading that the consumption of spirits is contrary to public policy, and ought to be discouraged by preventing inn-keepers from recovering debts so incurred. One Mr. Fricker, a member of the Kingston corporation, who was sued last Friday in the county court, resisted a claim by a publican on these grounds, and was successful in his defence so far as the charges in the bill related to spirits supplied, the judge holding that wines were not within the act. The defendant, I observe, with somewhat unnecessary modesty, said that although he took advantage of the "Tippling Act," he did not wish to be known as a tippler. Surely he does himself an injustice. Palman qui meruit ferat.—London Truth.

The War Feeling in China.

A letter from Hong Kong to the New York Sun says: One of the first results of China's present warlike attitude is that a certain glimmering of patriotic feeling has spread throughout the entire empire, and that, in case of war, the Pekin government can look forward to concerted action on the part of the western and southern provinces. The actual condition of China, her internal relations, the feeling between the people and the mandarins, are very little known, and still less taken into account by western politicians. The Ta Tsing dynasty sits on an uneasy throne. The emperor is not of purely Chinese extraction, for Tartar blood courses through his veins, and his Manchu ancestry, together with the long period of minority from which he is just about to emerge, render him exceedingly unpopular with the people. Secret organizations of a political character overrun the empire, their sole aim being to overrun the reigning dynasty; and, besides these, there are other sects, such as the Triad society of the Canton province, who are at heart nothing less than Nihilists. Their chief desire is to abolish any and all ruling factions.

There is a smoldering volcano in the heart of China, which has long threatened to overwhelm the country. The Tai-ping rebellion, as well as the Nien-fei insurrection has proved that the feelings of dissension and discontent are rife throughout the length and breath of the empire, and no one knows this better than do the Pekin magnates. However eloquently Europeans and Americans may write of the peaceful, home-loving, loyal character of the Chinese, it is very clear that their opinions are drawn from surface indications. It is often difficult to understand the political maneuvres of the Pekin authorities, or their direct bearing upon any one particular event. This is excellently illustrated by the apparently very confusing and contradictory positions assumed by the two leading Chinese statesmen of to-day, Li Hung Chang and the Marquis Tseng, for the dispatches which Marquis Tseng flourished in the face of the French government were the exact negative of the statements made by Li to M. Tricou. When M. Tricou and his suite took leave of Li Hung Chang, that astute statesman strenuously declared that China did not intend going to war with France; and this statement was in reply to a remark made by the French envoy that Marquis Tseng was threatening war unless France consented to relinquish her claims upon Tonquin. Li Hung Chung not only thus expressed himself in thoroughly opposite sentiments to those of his colleague, but he even told the French envoy that he hoped France would declare war against China. M. Tricou was, therefore, perfectly correct in telegraphing to his government that Li Hung Chang disavowed the policy of Marquis Tseng. China's wisest statesmen knew the hidden weakness of the country, and appreciated the fact that a war with France means either the momentary gain of prestige or the entire disorganization of the country, popular sedition, and the overthrow of the Manchu dynasty.

By wisely adding to her naval forces and coast defences, and by mobilizing and furnishing the army with better weapons and reliable commanders, China has for a time awakened a widespread fraternal feeling between the most distant of her provinces and the capital. A common foe has, in this case, been the cause of a greater concord between the formerly hostile factions. This patriotic sentiment is continually evinced nowadays in letters and essays which fill the columns of the Chinese journals in the coast ports, and make the Pekin Gazette for once assume an interesting tone. Of course, indignant and vituperative language has been indulged in at the expense of the French. "How dare you Frenchmen, who are as cats and dogs, fight with us who are panthers and tigers?" asks a patriotic writer in the Hu Pao. Indeed, a good bit of boastful pride, together with a decided contempt for everything French, has been plainly evident, even in the least patriotic effusions, to the undoubted edification of the Chinese reading public. To foreign residents in the east the tone of the native journal is at once encouraging and satisfactory, not so much from their effusive patriotism as from the fact that they indicate an evident increase of amicable relations between the people and the government; for sedition and rebellion, which have seemed so imminent, could but have resulted in anarchy, the feeble dissolution of the treaties, and the immediate attendant endangerment of the safety of foreign residents.

Despite all adverse rumors and a cloudy political horizon, an amicable solution of the Franco-Chinese difficulty is still expected. Up to the present date the best authorities have not ceased to deny the probability of an announcement of hostilities between France and China, at least so far as the empire is concerned. However patriotic and bellicose the people of China are to-day, they may not be so after the reverses of to-morrow—a fact of which the astute advisers of the youthful emperor are only too well aware.

Tongue-Tying.

An ingenious method of putting a check upon chatter has been devised by a school-teacher, who was recently charged in a London police court with assaulting one of his pupils. The defendant, it appeared, being displeased with a boy who persisted in talking during lesson-time, fastened a strap with a slip-knot around the tongue of the offender and then tied the other end of the strap by a piece of a string to a chair, thus effectually preventing a continuance of the nuisance. After hearing the evidence the magistrate dismissed the summons on the ground that the tying of the boy's tongue was not any real punishment. The boy seemed to have been very much given to talking, and it was therefore thought advisable to degrade him the same as by putting a fool's cap on his head or tying the arms of a boy given to fighting. The London St. James' Gazette advocates a similar contrivance for Irish members of Parliament.

Lord Chief Justice Coleridge has written an autograph letter of thanks to the St. Louis Bar for an engrossed copy of the address of welcome extended to him upon his visit to that city, closing with:—"I hope that my visit at least did nothing to impair those feelings of respect and admiration which your nation and mine do feel, and, please God, will always feel, for one another."

A New Axe for Mr. Gladstone.

Late one Saturday afternoon, says a telegram, the following incident occurred at Hawarden: Just as it was growing dark the police, who are in constant attendance upon the premier, were surprised to see a man walk rapidly up the approaches to the castle, carrying under his arm a mysterious looking parcel, and from his manner it was inferred that the man was either labouring under a very great excitement or that he was insane. He was speedily taken charge of by the police, and removed to that part of the castle where they are quartered, and on being interrogated by the officer in charge he said he was a workingman from Birmingham, and had made an axe which he intended to present to Mr. Gladstone. He would present it personally, no matter what the cost. The man was kindly treated by the officer, and after he had somewhat regained his composure, a message was sent to Mr. Gladstone, who came out of the castle and received his admirer on the lawn, where he was presented with the axe, much to the satisfaction of the man, who afterwards walked to Chester and returned to Birmingham the same evening.

The artisan who represented to Mr. Gladstone that he had come from Birmingham in order to present him with an axe is named Simeon Snorter, and is in the employ of a firm at Suttley, near Birmingham. Snorter made the axe of solid steel, and having accomplished his task determined to present it himself without ceremony. He accordingly set out for Hawarden, where he announced his errand, but at first had some little difficulty with the detectives. Mr. Gladstone greatly admires the implement, which is fitted with an old English oak handle. On one side of the blade is Mr. Gladstone's armorial bearings, and on the other the Staffordshire "knot" with a poetical couplet. After partaking of refreshments Snorter was presented with Mr. and Mrs. Gladstone's photographs and autographs.—London Telegraph.

A Substitute for Matches.

Countless accidents, as everyone knows, arise from the use of matches. To obtain light without employing them, and so without the danger of setting things on fire, an ingenious contrivance is now used by the watchmen of Paris in all magazines where explosive or inflammable materials are kept. Anyone may easily make trial of it. Take an oblong vial of the whitest and clearest glass, and put into it a piece of phosphorus about the size of a pea. Pour some sweet oil heated to the boiling point upon the phosphorus; fill the vial about one-third full, and then cork it tightly. To use this as a light, remove the cork, allow the air to enter the vial, and then recork it. The empty space in the vial will become luminous, and the light obtained will be equal to that of a lamp. When the light grows dim, its power can be increased by taking out the cork and allowing a fresh supply of air to enter the vial. In winter it is sometimes necessary to heat the vial between the hands in order to increase the fluidity of the oil. The apparatus thus made may be used for months.—Chicago Times.

Maine is becoming quite a cotton manufacturing State. She has twenty-six cotton mills, with 686,182 spindles, and requiring an investment of $12,987,400. The yards of goods manufactured last year aggregated 42,753 583, besides 980,184 pounds of other goods, 60,000 quilts, 1,000,000 bags, and 2,340,911 pounds of bags.

According to the Brooklyn Eagle, the first water-works in the United States was constructed at Bethlehem, Pa., in 1762 The force-pumps were driven by an undershot water-wheel. The works were calculated to raise the water 70 feet perpendicular height; subsequently increased to 114 feet. These works were in operation in 1832. The first raising main was made of gum-wood as far as it was subject to great pressure, the rest of pitch pine. In 1786 leaden pipes were substitutod. In 1814 these were changed for iron.

Buckingham Palace.

Buckingham Palace, which was built and is now kept up at a vast expense, contains innumerable suites of magnificent rooms, which are empty month after month and year after year. The Queen during the last twenty years has resided there on an average for six nights in each year. The palace is open on four afternoons for drawing-rooms ("courts" have been discontinued, and the Queen has announced she will not hold any more levees), and on four evenings for the State balls and concerts.

WHAT PARALYSIS IS.

Some Interesting and Profitable Medical Reading for Non-Medical People.

So common has become the occurrence of paralysis in recent years that many use the tword for a slang expression; but for all that, it is probable that a vast majority of the people who think at all of paralysis reckon that it is a disease of itself. That some medical men so regard this condition is plain from the fact that deaths are frequently certified to have been caused hy it. The incorrectness of the notion will, however, be plain when the conditions which give rise to it are clearly set forth, and this we now propose.

A carpenter, blacksmith, or some mechanic whose business requires him to wield a hammer, finds some morning that he is unable to raise his hammer-arm, or perhaps while at work the man suddenly feeels his arm become numb and weak, it falls to his side, and he is no longer able to work. The doctor to whom the man applies says a "brachial monopolegia from the muscle tire," which means simply that the man has overwrought his hammer arm, and it needs rest. To these causes the very appropriate name of "artisan's palsy" is given. Again, a poor-blooded, nervously-constructed person, most likely a woman, meets with a great shock, or has to endure an unusual and prolonged mental or physical effort. Soon, and perhaps without warning, the individual loses the use of some part of the body, often the vocal apparatus, and the patient is unable to speak above a whisper. The doctor says "hysterical paralysis," or "hysterical aphonia"—loss of voice. Now just how this comes about we fancy it would puzzle the most learned doctor to say. Concerning this condition, however, as well as the one before mentioned, this much is known—viz., that by appropriate treatment they recover perfectly and promptly, very good evidence that no part of the nervous apparatus is broken. The faith cures, reported from time to time, are probably cases of the kind last mentioned.

It sometimes happens that an intoxicated person will fall asleep with the head resting upon the arm, with the arm hanging over a chair back. When a person wakens the arm is numb; it tingles, and is paralyzed—another "brachial monopolegia," but really pressure upon the trunks of the nerves which supply the disabled member has affected those nerves so that they are unable to perform their usual duty. The nerves which go out from the brain and spinal cord to the extremities are quite comparable to the wires which are stretched from place to place for electric communication, and pressure upon any section of these nerves produces results very like those which follow an interference with the wire. The case just given illustrates very well a large number of cases—of palsy from pressure, for pressure upon the brain or spinal cord, or the nerves which have their exit therefrom, will produce a palsy whose extent will depend upon the extent of the pressure, and whose curability will depend upon the chances for removing the pressure. Pressure upon the nerves which supply one side of the face produces a very characteristic paralysis, and one which causes many laughable mistakes on the part of tyros and non-professional people by their attempts to detect the affected side. Pressure on the brain or spinal cord is mostly due to the presence of tumors, to fractures of the skull or bones of which the backbone is formed, and to blood-clots within the skull or spinal canal. Persons who recover from diphtheria, scarlet fever, and other acute sicknesses, are frequently paralyzed in some part. These casese generally recover by appropriate treatment, and it is quite probable that many cases would recover spontaneously. The remarks before made concerning certain cases which recover will apply equally to the cases just named.

People who work in lead are liable to a peculiar kind of paralysis, which is first seen as a rule, in the muscles of the forearm, on account of which the patient is unable to extend the hand upon the arm. At times the whole muscular system is involved. Change of occupation and the use of remedies which will assist the elimination of the mineral from the system is the proper course of such patients. Analogous forms of paralysis are caused by arsenic and mercury, probably by their action upon the nerve structure of the spinal cord. Wourall, the Indian arrow poison, will also produce paralysis if introduced into the system in sufficient quantities. The paralyzing effect of large doses of alcohol are well known. Certain conditions of the circulatory apparatus predispose to extensive and often incurable paralysis. The arteries are elastic tubes. By age, hard work, care, and the prolonged use of alcoholic drinks, these tubes lose their elasticity and become brittle. By some event which determines an unusual quantity of blood to the brain one of these now inelastic tubes is broken, the poured out blood clots, as before mentioned, and a paralysis immediately follows. Owing to certain systematic conditions, fibrin, a substance normally suspended in the blood, lodges upon the floodgates—valves—of the heart. Presently a part of this matter is dislodged and washed away into the blood; perchance it reaches an artery in the brain which will not permit it to pass. This at once cuts off the blood supply from a part of the brain, one of the immediate symptoms of which is palsy of the part of the body which receives its previous supply from that portion of the brain. These paralyses are usually extensive, and are not readily distinguished from those just mentioned.

The presence of worms in the bowels of children is believed to produce paralysis in some cases. Such cases being due to a known removoble cause are described as reflex paralysis. These are not seen alone in children, but in adults as well. Finally, changes in the structure of the brain or spinal cord produce paralysis, varying in extent with the extent of nerve structure involved. Such paralyses are especially obstinate in those of advanced years. Change of structure in the spinal cord usually produces disability in the legs. Now, these are the almost common causes of paralysis, and, from what has been said, it will be observed that paralysis is not a disease of itself. Neither is it always incurable.

This whole matter has been very thoroughly studied by many medical men, some of whom, for their proficiency in such matters, have attained a national reputation.—Philadelphia Times.

The Last Vienna Murder.

The details of the murder of Detective Block at Vienna are given in the following telegram to the London Times: Another police officer has been murdered in the district of Floridsdorf, and this time in broad daylight. Ferdinand Block, a most able and trusty detective, who had arrested one of those accused of the murder of the Police Officer Hlubek, left his house in Muhlschutti this morning at 7:30 o'clock to go to the police office in Floridsdorf. His path lay over large, desolate field and through a gravel-pit about two meters deep. The latter is of great size. It is divided on one side by a palisading dividing it from a garden enclosure, and on the other it extends to the left bank of the Danube. The gravel pit is about five hundred paces from the main road to Floridsdorf.

About 8 a. m. a detonation was heard, and people ran from all sides to inquire the cause of it. Detective Block was found near the middle of the gravel-pit lying dead on his back, with a bullet mark above the left ear. The first who arrived was a shoemaker named Zicker, whose garden borders on the gravel-pit. He looked over the garden paling and saw a man leaning over another, who lay on the ground, and tearing his watch out of his pocket. Before Zicker could get to the spot the man had taken flight. He took the direction of the old Danube bed, about fifteen hundred paces from the scene of the murder. Zicker, who, from a glimpse at the body of the detective, was convinced that a murder had been committed, raised loud cries, and ran after the fugitive, being soon joined by several persons. The man redoubled his speed, the pursuers following him. After a few minutes interval he had reached the bed of the old Danube, and made his way over the large stones placed there, in the shallow water flowing in the old river bed. On the other side several workmen were digging for gravel. These men having their attention excited by the loud shouts, and seeing a man chased by a crowd making his way across the water, awaited the fugitive so as to stop him. The man, however, produced a revolver, and threatened to shoot anyone who would approach. Most of them who had collected fell back, and he might perhaps have escaped had there not come up some brave men who were not daunted by the danger to their lives. They were the day laborers Ferdinand Mellon, Johann Piller, Leopold Stroh, and August Birner. These four ran after the man. Mellon being the first to reach him. The murderer turned round, and fired quickly two revolver shots at him, both of which wounded him severely in the right leg. He fell down and had afterward to be carried away. The assasin fired a third shot, but stumbled at the moment, and the shot missed. His slip was taken advantage of by Stroh and Piller, who seized his hands, and wrenched away the revolver.

The two workmen, who held each one hand of the prisoner and were supported by some constables who had come up, escorted him to the police station. On the way there the man in custody attempted to carry out a fiendish plan. He made a movement with his left hand as if he were going to take a handkerchief out of his pocket. Instead of this, however, he drew out a dynamite cartridge, which he threw with his full force on the ground. He had, of course, hoped that the cartridge would fall on a stone and would explode. Fortunately, it fell on soft ground and remained harmless.

Detective Block, a man of 40 years of age and a father of two children of 8 and 3 years respectively, has been attached since 1875 to the police force in Floridsdorf. As one of the most active and trustworthy detectives in the service he was much valued by his superiors. When, after the murder of Hlubek, an order came to change the detectives, and one of them was actually transferred to Vienna, Block asked leave to remain, pleading that he could render better service in Floridsdorf than in the capital. His wife swooned when she heard of the murder of her husband.

On the way to the police station after the cartridge had been thrown the crowd wanted to lynch the assassin, and was only prevented by the guard, who formed a cordon round him. The man arrested is about 30 years old, and wears a fair mustache. In order to disguise himself he had pasted a false beard upon his face, which was torn off when he was seized. He has hitherto obstinately refused any information about himself. The prefect of police and two assistants went to Floridsdorf, and at noon the man, who exhibited great coolness, was taken to a prison in the town. The wounded workman, after having one ball extracted, but with the other one still in the joint of the right ankle—causing a dangerous wound—was conveyed to the hospital.

An Australian Outrage.

A Sydney dispatch to the Adelaide Chronicle says: A woman named Catharine Owen, about 50 years old, of the vagrant class, was outraged to death by a number of larrikins. Her body was found at Mount Carmel, Waterloo, a suburb of Sydney. About 11 o'clock on Christmas night her screams were heard at the upper end of the street by two married women, the screams being accompanied by the laughter of a number of young men and boys, and the women saw a crowd of larrikins bearing something toward the sand hill known as Mount Carmel. The screams continuing one of the women went out and asked the larrikins to leave the woman alone, and the mob decamped. About half-past 12 Mrs. Logan heard screams again, and went out to the place. A number of larrikins cleared off, and she found the woman naked, her clothes torn off with struggling, and her mouth bleeding. Mrs. Logan told her to go down to her house, and she said she would follow her when she had recovered herself a little. Mrs. Logan put a shawl over her and left, and as the woman did not follow, and hearing no more, Mrs. Logan concluded she had gone to the other house. Next morning the woman's dead body was found. Seven men from 18 to 25 years of age are in custody, and other arrests are likely to follow.

USEFUL RECIPES.

ORANGE AND COCOANUT.—Three peeled oranges. Make alternate layers of orange slices, sugar and grated cocoanut until a glass dish is filled, having grated cocoanut on top.

ORANGE PIE.—Take four good sized oranges, peel, seed, and cut in very small pieces. Add a cup of sugar and let stand. Into a quart of nearly boiling milk stir two tablespoonsful of corn starch, mixed with a little water, and the yolks of three eggs. When this is done let it cool, then mix with the orange. Put it in simply a lower crust. Make a frosting with the whites of the eggs and one-half cup of sugar. Spread it over top of pie, and place for a few seconds in the oven to brown.

ORANGE SOUFFLE.—Peel and slice six oranges, put in a glass dish a layer of oranges, then one of sugar, and so on until all the oranges are used, and let stand two hours; make a soft-boiled custard of yolks of three eggs, a pint of milk, sugar to taste, with grating of orange peel for flavor, and pour over the oranges when cool enough not to break the dish. Beat the whites of the eggs to a stiff froth, sweeten to taste and pour over the top. Serve cold.

OYSTER SHORT CAKE.—Make a rich biscuit crust, roll about an inch thick, and bake quickly in tin pie plate. While baking, scald a quart of oysters, thicken them with flour, adding milk to make plenty of gravy; season with salt, pepper and butter; boil up at once. Split the crust when done, spread over each piece a layer of oysters and some gravy, and pour gravy over the whole when piled up. Serve hot.

OYSTER PIE.—Line a deep pie dish with rich paste, dredge it with flour, and pour in a pint of oysters, season well with bits of butter, pepper and salt, dredge with flour, put in some of the oyster liquor, and cover with crust having an opening in the centre to allow the steam to escape. Bake in a quick oven.

VENISON PASTRY.—Cut the neck or breast into small steaks; rub them over with seasoning of sweet herbs, grated nutmeg, pepper, and salt; fry them lightly in butter; line the sides and edges of the dish with puff paste, lay in the steaks, and add half a pint of rich gravy made with the trimmings of the venison; and the juice of half a lemon or a teaspoonful of vinegar; cover the dish with puff paste and bake it nearly two hours; some more gravy may be poured into the pie before serving it.

PICKLED APPLES.—Take sweet apples fully ripe, core and quarter them. Take two quarts of vinegar, two pounds of sugar, one-half ounce of mace, one of cloves, and one of cinnamon, with a spoonful of allspice. (These spices should not be ground.) Let it boil together ten minutes. Then put in enough of apples to cover the syrup and let them boil until clear. Skim them and lay on a platter; put fresh apples to cook until you have as many as your syrup will cover when placed in a jar. These, after a few days, sometimes need to be brought again to boiling point, and then will keep any length of time.

SAWDUST USED MEDICALLY.—Sawdust, after being saturated with a weak solution of carbolic acid, can be usefully employed for absorbing the discharge from wounds. The sawdust, which should be coarse, must be allowed to dry, and then should be enclosed in a bag made of several layers of gauze or very fine soft muslin. Pending the arrival of a medical man, a pad of sawdust, carefully arranged to prevent any of the grains working through to the injured part, may safely be applied over the dressing of a wound that has commenced to discharge, or if bleeding, has recommenced from a cut through the strapping. The pad of sawdust should be bound over the part required to be protected.

Everyone is familiar with the value of the yolk of an egg as a hair wash, but perhaps may not be aware of its virtue in clothing cleansing. Beaten up with alcohol, eau de cologne, or ether, like ox gall, it keeps better and is more powerful; or in simpler cases, it may be used alone, or merely mixed with water, to be rubbed on with flannel, for removing from colored materials the stains of mud, or of coffee and chocolate, when prepared with milk. It is frequently applied to velvet collars and cuffs, etc,, and proves a cleanser, as well as a spot extractor. When it has done its work it is washed off with soap, and the material thoroughly rinsed in pure water. Egg has a specially good effect on those annoying patches of wheel grease belonging to the compound class of stains, as they represent a mixture of stale grease, iron and other substances.

Love's Young Dream.

"Oose sweet pwecious is oo?"
"I'se oore sweet pwecious."
"O'ose hungry ittle bit?"
"I'se conld nibble itsy bitsy."
"O'ose salt have lunchy, pwecious."
"Itsy bitsy chicy-wing, sweetsy."
"Tiddy iddy darl', have a cookey?"
"No, ownest-own—a pickule."

They were not idiots on their way to a retreat for the feeble-minded, or lunatics going to an asylum. They were married lovers, had been married nearly two hours, and were taking their first lunch on the cars. And the rest of the passengers did not rise up and s'ay them either, which shows the degeneracy into which, as a people, we are fallen.

Oranges.

Very red little oranges, tomato shaped, with shiny skin, and done up in colored tissue paper, can be found this winter in every fruit store and on many stands. They are Mandarin and Tangierine oranges, from Florida. The two varieties are so nearly alike in looks and taste that persons unaccustomed to them cannot always tell which is which. The Mandarins came originally from China, and the Tangierines from the country whose name they bear. In Florida they are called "kid glove oranges," because, it is said, ladies can peel and eat them without soiling their gloves. Between the skin and the pulp is a loose layer of fibres, which is easily separated from the pulp. The skin has only to be broken, when it can be taken off dry and in one piece. Instead of the spicy flavor that is distinguishahle in ripe and fresh Indian River oranges, there is in the Mandarins and Tangierines a taste suggesting that of new wine. The pulp is very tender, and there is little but juice within the delicate lining.

CURE FOR CHILBLAINS.

Bathe the feet for ten or fifteen minutes in water as hot as can be borne; then apply Hagyards Yellow Oil, and a cure is certain. Yellow Oil cures Rheumatism, Neuralgia, Deafness, Lameness, and Pain generally; and internally cures Colds, Sore Throat, Croup, Asthma, and many painful affections.

A soft answer may turn away wrath, but it wouldn't be safe to call a man a mush head.

John R. Vert, Hamilton, says: "McGregor's Speedy Cure for Dyspepsia and Indigestion is cheap at fifty times the price asked for it. I am a commercial man, and travel continually, and would no more think of leaving home without a bottle of McGregor's Speedy Cure in my valise than I would of leaving my team at home and going on foot." Free trial bottle at Hill Bros. general store. Regular size, fifty cents and one dollar.

"Madame, you've destroyed five dollars' worth of merchandise," angrily remarked a dude to a lady, as she seated herself in a chair in which he had deposited a new Derby hat. "Serves you right," she replied, slowly rising from the ruin, "you had no business ta buy a $5 hat for a 50c. head."

WHAT IS LARDINE.

Bro. Daniel Wright, of Beaver Valley Division who was present proceeded to instal the officers, which was then proceeded with.

Report of Committee on Education.

Your Com. on Education regret having but a short time to prepare a report on this important subject, will in consequence be brief. We beg leave to report as follows: That this Grange memorialize the Government to adopt one set of school books only, and that the Government hold the copyright giving every publisher the right to publish. We are also o opinion that the system of having public school inspectors is a useless expenditure of money, and suggest that steps be taken to discontinue that office.

JOHN WEBER,

DEATH OF A. W. LAUDER, M. P. P.

From the World.

The opposition in the local legislature has sustained a serious loss in the unexpected demise of A. W. Lauder, M. P. P., for East Grey. The deceased occupied his seat in the legislature in the early past of last week, but had since then been confined to his house at Parkdale, by an affection of the kidneys. He leaves a wife and one son, Mr. W. Waugh Lauder, the well-known musician.

Mr. Lauder was the son of the late Thomas D. Lauder, of Durham, Ont., and grandson of the Rev. Wm. Lauder, late of Bewcastle, Cumberland, England. He was born at Bewcastle in 1834 and educated at Canobil and Laugholn, Scotland. In 1856 he was married to Miss M. E. Tort. In 1857 he became a student at law in the office of Ross, Crawford and & Crombie, Toronto, and after being called to the bar entered into partnership with Hon. John Ross, senior member of the firm. Since 1867 he has been a member of the Ontario legislature, and with the exception of Hon. T. B. Pardee and Dr. Baxter, is the only member who has continuously served since that time. He occupied several prominent and responsible positions during his life time in connection with public institutions, being a member of the senate of the university, of Victoria college, Cobourg, and government trustee of the municipal bonus fund of the Toronto, Grey & Bruce railway in 1869.

After routine proceedings at the local legislature yesterday, Mr. Mowat rose and said—When I came to this House this morning I was shocked and greaved to learn of the death of one of the members of this House—the hon. member who had for so long represented one of the ridings of Grey. He had always been attentive to his Parliamentary duties, and when I heard of his illness I expected that in a few days he would be in his place, as he was apparently in the best of health, which promised him long life; but to-day he is numbered with the dead, and his family are mourning the loss of a loving husband and a affectionate father. He was an active member of this House, and while warm words have frequently passed between him and the gentlemen on our side of the House, we all recognized him as a man of ability, extended culture, a superior platform speaker, and an able debater in this House. He has been a member of this House ever since Confederation, which can be said of only two members now remaining. It is no small testimony to a man's character to have passed through so many successful elections as Mr. Lauder has. In spite of the efforts of rivals and competitors he had passed through six contests in the ridings of Grey, never having once suffered defeat, and so strongly was he entrenched in the public mind that during the twelve years we have occupied these benches he has always been regarded by the public as one who, in the event of a change of Government, would form one of the Cabinet. He has passed from this arena forever. Others can speak more fully of his personal qualities than I, for I had little acquaintance with him outside this House, but I rejoice to know that for many years he was a member of a Christan Church, and he held in it a position which shows that he had the high estimation of the religious body to which he belonged. In view of all this I am sure that the feeling of the House will be not to proceed with business to-day, and I therefore move that the House do now adjourn.

Mr. Meredith, who was a considerable period before he could master his emotions sufficiently well to proceed, said:—Mr. Speaker, my emotion will hardly permit me to utter the words that I ought to utter on this occasion. I have to thank the leader of the Government for the kindly words which he has spoken of our deceased friend—words, I am sure, which every member of this House re-echoes. He has said that our deceased friend occupied a high position in this country. He entered public life a young man, and devoted the best years of his life to the service of his Province; had he devoted these years to the practice of the profession to which he was brought up I am certain that his gains in a pecuniary point of view would have been much grater, but he gave, as I have said, the best years of his life to the service of his Province. The Attorney-General has well said the course of debate in this House and his public speeches throughout the country, but I know that there did not bear a warmer heart than that in the breast of Abram Lauder. I know, sir, from my own personal acquaintance with him, that while that was his course in debate he had the warmest feelings towards his opponents, If, sir, hon. gentlemen opposite can speak in that manner of him, how much more warmly can we on this side of the House speak of him. There has not been a more self-sacrificing, earnest friend than our deceased friend, Mr. Lauder, who on all occasions was ready to go anywhere, ready to do anything in the service of his country; and not only was he an able servant of this House, but he was one of the most active member of his party. We feel that a great void has been created, and that we have lost not only a friend but a prominent fellow-worker from his place here, and it will be a long time before we can fill it. I cannot do justice to the subject, Mr. Speaker, in this state of mind, and in view of the stock I have received I will not detain the House any further, but second the motion for the adjournment of the House.

The motion was carried, and the House adjourned at 3.25.

FUNERAL CEREMONIES.

From the Globe.

The funeral of the late A. W. Lauder, M. P. P., took place on Saturday afternoon from Ardnacloich, Parkdale. The funeral procession to the Metropolitan Church was a very long one, and was participated in by all the members of the Ontario Legislature and the personal and public friends of the deceased. At the Metropolitan Church the galleries, the pulpit, and the family pew were draped with black hangings. Mr. Torrington played the "Dead March in Saul" as the remains were borne up the aisle by the pallbearers—Hon. T. B. Pardee, Mr. W. R. Meredith, leader of the Opposition, Mr. H. E. Clarke, M. P. P., Dr. Baxter. M. P. P., Mr. John Charlesworth, Mr. Wm. Gooderham, Mr. Edward Gurney, and Mr. Walter S. Lee. Among the large congregation were Lieut.-Governor Robinson, Hon. A. S. Hardy, and most of the city officials. The chief mourners were:—W. Waugh Lauder, son of the deceased; Thomas Lauder, Registrar of the County of Grey, John Lauder, Edward Lauder and James Lauder, brothers of the deceased; G. W. Grote, of Toronto, and John W. Grote, of St. Catharines, brothers-in-law of deceased; Dr. Walter Chaffee of Toronto; William Perry, of Mt. Forest; Alfred Perry, of Calgary, N. W. T., and J. J. Copeland, of St Catharines.

The casket was plased below the pulpit and was surrounded by floral tributes. Rev. Dr. Withrow and Rev. S. J. Hunter read appropriate parts of the Scripture, and.

Rev. Hugh Johnston, pastor of the church, said that all trusted the deceased had exchanged earth for Heaven, life of immortality. At another time he hoped to gather up the lessons to be drawn from the life and character of Mr. Lauder, but the event which had brought them together was a sermon of which God was the preacher. It was sunset here, but the dead man had gone to such a sunrise as never purpled the hills and lit up the sky viewed by mortal eyes. He had followed many others of the Trustee Board of the Church, and no man knew who would go next. Friends would soon be doing for those who heard the preacher the kind offices they were now doing for one whom they all revered. Riches and honours and the powers of this would passed away, but religion alone remained to comfort and strengthen man. Mr. Johnston was deeply effected during his remarks, and it was plain that he felt a personal loss in Mr. Lauder's death.

After the remains had been viewed by the congregatron the journey was resumed, and the procession took its way to Mount Pleasant Cemetery, where the body was deposited in the vault.

Holland Council.

Council met at Vogan's Hall; Reeve in the chair. Members present—Messrs. Norton, Galbraith and Williscroft. A communication from Thos. Gordon was read by the Reeve to the Council, with respect to U. S. S. No. 2, Holland and Euphrasia.

Moved by Mr. Galbraith, seconded by Mr. Williscroft, That the report of the committee on the Treasurer's security be adopted.

Moved by Mr. Norton, seconded by Mr. Galbraith, that an order be issued for $3, in favor of Robert Hannah.

Moved by Mr. Galbraith, seconded by Mr Williscroft, That Mr. Rutledge get the township printing for the year 1884.

Moved by Mr. Galbraith, seconded by Mr. Williscroft, That Mr. Rutledge's account be paid.

Moved by Mr. Galbraith, seconded by Mr. Norton, That the clerk order 6 copies of Kehoe hand book, for use of the council, and that an order be issued in his favor.

Moved by Mr. Norton, seconded by Mr. Williscroft, That Robt. McKinnet get the assessorship at a salary of $58, to cover all work connected with it, attending courts of revision and selecting jurors.

Moved by Mr. Galbraith, seconded by Mr. Williscroft, That the council grant an order in favor of John Charleton for the sum of $20, the clerk at the same time agreeing to give $10 as part indemnity for his loss in the suit re lot 2 of 7, con. 1, and Watson.

Moved by Mr. Galbraith, seconded by Mr. Norton, That the by-law, appointing assessor, be read 1st, 2nd and 3rd time, and engrossed on the minutes.

Moved and seconded, That this council adjourn till the 26th day of March, 1884.

IN GOLDEN BONDS.

After dinner, when I was in the drawing-room with the ladies, some of them drew me on a sofa and pulled me about and petted me just as if I had been a child, and asked me a number of questions about my life at the Alders and "that handsome Mr. Rayner."

"And is it true that he is such a dreadfully wicked man, Miss Christie?" said one.

"Yes, it is; she is blushing," said another.

But I was not blushing at all; there was nothing to blush about. I said, laughing—

"No, he is not wicked. The village people think he is, because he plays the violin and goes to races. He is very kind."

"Oh, we don't doubt that, my dear!" said Mrs. Clowes, in a demure tone.

"You think I like him only just because he is kind to me," said I boldly. "But I shouldn't like him if he were wicked, however kind he might be."

"And Mrs. Rayner—is she kind and good too?"

"Oh, yes, she is just as kind!" said I.

This was not quite true; but I knew already enough of these people to be sure they would laugh if I said "No;" and it was not poor Mrs. Rayner's fault that she was not as nice as her husband. Presently Mrs. Cunningham took me to the other end of the room to look at a portrait of Lady Mills.

"It is no business of mine who gave you that pendant, my dear; but have you any more ornaments of the kind, and, if so, where do you keep them?" she said gravely.

"Oh, I have no more!" I answered, a little surprised at her manner. "And I keep this in an old case in the corner of my desk."

"Ah, I thought so, from the careless way in which you were going to slip it into your pocket when we caught you in the conservatory. Why, my dear child, I have a set that I value very much—no finer than yours, though—diamonds and cat's-eyes—and I sleep with them under my pillow, and even my maid doesn't know where they are."

I showed my astonishment.

"Believe me, when you travel about on a series of visits, as I am doing now, and are obliged to entrust your dressing-case to a careless maid, it is no unnecessary precaution.

"But I shouldn't take so much trouble with my paste pendant," said I.

She shook her head at me, with a laugh, and said dryly—

"I should with such paste as yours."

And then the gentlemen came in. One of them had brought from town that day a parcel of new waltzes, but the ladies all declined to play them until they had tried them over privately: and the gentlemen seemed so much disappointed that, having turned over the pages and seen that they were perfectly easy, I timidly offered offered my services. They were really pretty, and, after the difficult music I had had to read with Mr. Rayner, they were like child's play to me. When I had got to the end of the first, I received an ovation. The owner of the music was in ecstasies, and those who had begun to dance stopped and joined the rest in a chorus of admiration that made me quite ashamed of myself.

"Didn't you know that I am a governess?" said I to one gentlemen, laughing and blushing.

"Yes; but we thought you were only for show," said Mrs. Clowes.

And I played the rest of the waltzes, and thought how much nicer it was to play for these people than for those I had met at Mrs. Manners' tea-party. Then the gentleman they called Tom, whose name I had now found out to be Mr. Carruthers, led me away from the piano, saying that I was not to be made a victim all the evening for other people's amusement: and, telling a gentleman who was talking to me that he and I were going to have a serious conversation and were not to be disturbed, he took me to a deep window where there were seats, and gave me one, while he threw himself into another beside me.

"How beautifully you play!" said he, leaning over my chair and looking at me. "I never knew such a pretty girl as you take the trouble to learn anything properly before."

I had been so much spoilt that day by flattery that I only answered calmly—

"Why shouldn't pretty people learn things as well as ugly people, Mr. Carruthers?"

"Don't call me 'Mr. Carruthers'; nobody calls me 'Mr. Carruthers':—at least, nobody nice. If you don't yet feel equal to 'Tom,' let the matter remain in abeyance for the present. Now, to continue from the point where I lost my temper, ugly people have to be accomplished and good and all sorts of things, to get a little of the attention that a pretty person can get without any trouble at all."

"Ah, but it is different if you have to earn your own living! If you are a governess, for instance, people don't care about what you look like, but about what you know."

He stroked his moustache meditatively, looked at me, and said—

"Of course; I forgot that. I suppose you have to know a lot to teach. I am sure you know more than any woman in this room."

"Oh, no, indeed I don't! They are all a great, great deal cleverer than I am. I couldn't talk as they do."

"Heaven forbid!" muttered he, as if to himself. "They know how to chaff—that's all. Did you ever meet any of them before to-day?"

"Never before to-day."

"I wonder if you know any of the people I know? Do you know the Temples of Crawley Hall?"

"No."

"Have you ever been farther west than this—Staffordshire—Derbyshire?"

"No, never."

He was looking on the ground; he raised and fixed his eyes suddenly on my face as he said—

"Do you know the Dalstons?"

"No-o," said I, rather hesitatingly.

"Not Lord Dalston, with his different crazes? You speak as if you were not sure."

"I am sure I don't know him," said I. "But I was trying to remember what I have heard about him, for I seem to know the name quite well."

In the most gravely persistent manner Mr. Carruthers went on probing my memory about Lord Dalston; but I could not even remember where I had heard the name mentioned before. He had to give it up at last; I believe however that he thought it was obstinacy that prevented my telling him.

When, at last, long past the hour when the household at the Alders retired to rest, we dispersed to our rooms, I made a mistake in my corridor, and found myself in one which led to the servant's wing; and I heard a man's voice that I knew saying persuasively—

"Don't be in such a hurry! She won't be up for half an hour yet, nor my man either. I never get a word with you now."

Suddenly it flashed upon me whose the voice was. It was the voice I had heard talking to Sarah in the plantation, the voice of Mr. Rayner's mysterious friend. And the person he was talking to, and with whom he proceeded to exchange a kiss, was Lady Mills' maid! It was a strange thing, but one about which I could no longer have a doubt. The respectful man-servant I had met before dinner in the corridor and the visitor who was shown into the study at the Alders as a gentlemen, and who was yet on familiar terms with Tom Parkes and Sarah, were one and the same person!

I was very sleepy and very much preoccupied with this curious discovery when I got to my room; but, before I went to bed, I put, as I thought, my beautiful but unfortunate pendant safely inside my desk, resolved not to wear it again.

CHAPTER XVII.

I got up next morning directly I was called, and was down stairs long before anybody else—but I was glad of that, for I wanted to explore the garden. It was a beautiful, warm, bright morning, and I rejoiced, for it would bring the people to Geldham Church for the harvest-thanksgiving. I went over the lawn, and down the alleys, and round and round the flower-beds, and peeped into the green-houses, and tried to see through the steaming glass of the hot-houses, which were locked, when, suddenly, turning round one of them, I came face to face with Tom Parkes in his Sunday clothes, with a key in one hand and a basket of eggs in the other. He was evidently disconcerted, and tried by turning to the door of the hot-hot to avoid me. But I accosted him at once.

"Tom—Tom Parkes, don't you know me—Miss Christie?" I said.

"Lor', yes, miss, to be sure, so it is! Who'd 'a' thought o' seeing you here?" said said he, touching his hat with rather awkward surprise.

"Why, you must have known me, Tom! You looked as if you had seen a ghost?"

"Well, the truth is, miss, asking your pardon," said Tom sheepishly, "that I didn't want you to see me. You see, I've been took on here as extry under-gardener and help, and the head-gardener he don't like Londoners, and I don't want him to know as I'm a London chap. So, if you would be so good, miss, as not to mention as you've seen me before, I should take it kind."

"Very well, Tom, I won't betray you," I replied, laughing.

And he said, "Thank you, miss," and touched his hat again, and went off with his eggs. I was very much amused by this encounter and the important secret I had to keep. As if my mentioning that I had seen Tom at the Alders would necessarily entail the awful discovery that he was a Londoner!

By this time time I thought I had better go in and see if any of the other people had come down to breakfast: and I was sauntering along, when, as I got near the house, I heard two men's voices.

"Bella is getting jealous, Tom."

A grunt in the other voice.

"I say, ain't it rough on the little one?"

Then I heard Lady Mills's voice, and when I got to the door there were eight or ten people already assembled. But the two nearest the door, whom I had overheard, were a gentlemen named Cole and Mr. Carruthers. It was Mr. Carruthers who had grunted. Who was "Bella"? And who was "the little one?" And what did "rough on" mean?

The bells of Denham Church, which was close, had begun to ring before breakfast was over, and Lady Mills wauted to know who was going.

"I am going, for one," said Mrs. Clowes, and she looked across at Mr. Carruthers, who was helping himself to a great deal of marmalade.

"Do try to make up a respectable number," said Lady Mills. "You can do just what you like, you know, as soon as it is over; and people in the country think so much of it. We scandalise the neighborhood quite enough, as it is, by not going to bed at ten o'clock, and other wicked practices. And last week we were only three at church out of a party of seventeen."

"Are you going, Miss Christie? Yes, of caurse you are. I'll go, if you will find all the places for me," said Mr. Carruthers.

And when we got to church—we mustered eight altogether—he sat by me, and picked out from among the books the biggest church-service he could find, which he put in front of me when the collect was given out, whispering—

"Find it for me, please."

At first I would not take any notice, for it was just like playing in church; but he began making such a disturbance, rustling the leaves of his book, looking over those of his neighbors, and dropping with a crash all those within reach of the ledge before him, that I was obliged to find it for him, and all the other places too during the service, just as if he had been a little boy. But I was very angry all the time, and when we came out I would not speak to him. He came however and walked by my side, while I talked to somebody else, and at last he said meekly—

"Have I offended you?"

"Yes," I said; "I think you are very irreverent."

"I didn't mean to be irreverent," he said, in a still meeker tone. "But it is so dull to sit in church and not be able to follow the service, and it looks so bad to be fumbling in one's book all the time and find the place only when the parson is a long away ahead. And you can always find it in a minute."

"You should go to church oftener, and then you could find the places as well as I," rejoined I severely.

"Yes, but I always have such a lot to do on Sunday mornings in town," said he mournfully—"pipes to smoke, and—and other things. But I'll try to go oftener; I dare say it will do me good."

"I don't believe going to church does people like you any good at all," remarked I gravely."

And Mr. Carruthers burst out laughing, and said it was very wrong of me to discourage him just when he wanted to try to be good.

At luncheon I sat between him and clever Mrs Clowes, who described the sermon in a way that made everybody laugh, and said a lot of amusing and sometimes unkind things, as she always did. Presently, in a rather low voice, she addressed Mr. Carruthers across me.

"Shall I pass the sherry; or is it true that you have taken to milk and water? she asked meaningly.

"Quite true," said he. "And you can't think how nice it is—not half so insipid as you would expect, and a pleasant change after too many stimulants. Let me give you some grapes, Miss Christie."

And Mrs. Clowes turned away her head, as if there had been something that hurt her in his answer.

Most of the people spent Sunday afternoon just as if it had not been Sunday at all, except that nobody rode or drove. But some went on the river, and some played lawn-tennis, and some lounged about and read novels; and, others, of whom I was one, sat under the trees on the lawn and drank iced champagne, which is quite the nicest thing I ever tasted. I heard the mysterious man-servant give an order to Tom Parkes, calling him, "Here, you gardener, what's your name?" as if he had never seen him before, and walked up and down Mr. Rayner's garden, and gone into Mr. Rayner's stable with him only two nights before. What a silly fellow Tom was with his little mystery! I pointed out the other man to Mr. Carruthers, and asked if he knew whose servant he was.

"He is mine, and the best I ever had. I've had him six months now, and of late I've given up thinking altogether; he does it for me so much better."

I began to wonder whether this mysterious man-servant was some poor relation of Mr. Rayner's, who had taken to this way of earning his living, but was ashamed of it, and who came privately to see his richer connections, to spare them the talk of the neighbors about what people like the Reades, for instance, would certainly consider a great disgrace. So I said nothing more about him to Mr. Carruthers, who was sitting near me, smoking, and teasing me to read a Sunday newspaper, which I did not think right. So at last he began reading it aloud to me, and then I got up and ran away with Mr. Cole to the fruit-garden, where he gathered plums for me; and we looked at the chickens, and watched the fish in the pond, and threw crumbs to them, which they would not take any notice of, until dinner-time.

Mr. Cole cut me some beautiful flowers to wear in the front of my frock, for I had resolved not to wear my pendant again; but my muslin gown did not look nearly so well without it, and I thought I would just take it out and see the effect of it at my throat close to the flowers, and then put it away again. But, when I unlocked my desk and opened the shabby case in which Mr. Rayner had given it to me, the pendant was gone. Nothing else had been disturbed; the sovereign my uncle had given me lay untouched in its little leather bag close by; the notes I had had from Laurence, tied up with pink ribbon, were just as I had left them. I searched my desk, my pockets, every corner of the room, though I knew it would be of no use. For I remembered quite well, sleepy as I had been the night before, that I had shut it up in the case carefully, turning it about for a few moments in my hand to watch it flashing in the candle-light.

It had been stolen—by whom I could not guess. I sat down after my fruitless search, trembling and too much frightened to cry. For there is something alarming in a mysterious loss like that, an uncomfortable sense of being at the mercy of some unknown power, apart from the certainty that one of the people about you is a thief. At first I thought I would go to Lady Mills and tell her privately all about it; but my courage failed me; for if my loss got known there would be an unpleasant scene for all the servants and a sense of discomfort in the entire household; besides, several of the servants in the house were those of the guests, and not under Lady Mills' authority. It was just as likely that my pendant had been taken by one of them; and everybody would be indignant at the idea of his or her servant being suspected of the theft. So I resolved to say nothing about it, but to bear my loss, which I felt more than I should have thought possible, in silence. After all, if I could never wear it without exciting more attention than I cared for, and surprising people by my possession of an ornament which they persisted in thinking extremely valuable, it was better that it should have disappeared. I began to think it had already had an unwholesome effect upon me, by my secret wish to wear it again.

So I went down-stairs to dinner with a piece of plain black velvet round my throat, told Mrs. Cunningham, who asked why I did not wear my pendant, that I had come to the conclusion that it was too handsome an ornament for a girl in my position, and heard Mr. Carruthers say that the same remark would apply to my eyes.

It was a fine night, not cold, though there was a slight breeze; and after dinner some of us went into the garden, and I among them, for I was afraid they would make me play the waltzes again, although it was Sunday. One of the gentlemen did say—

"Let us ask Miss Christie to play for us."

But the lady he spoke to replied, in a rather offended tone—

"We need not always trouble Miss Christie; and I am sure she would rather not be disturbed. I just tried the waltzes over this morning, and they are quite easy."

"Just tried 'em over!" muttered Mr. Cole, who was standing by me in the conservatory. "She was hard at it hammering at the piano all churchtime."

It was late in the evening when Mr. Carruthers, who had been in the billiard-room with some of the others, came out and sauntered, with a cigar in his mouth, up to the grape-house, where I was standing with Sir Jonas, who had taken a fancy to me and insisted on cutting me some grapes straight from the vine.

"Lady Mills wishes me to say that Miss Christie will get her death of cold if she comes out of the hot-house into the cold air with nothing round her shoulders," said Mr. Carruthers, when we were at the door.

"Bless me—so she will! Fetch her a shawl, Tom."

"I have anticipated the lady's wants; I always do," said Mr. Carruthers; and he wrapped round my head and shoulders a beautiful Indian shawl belonging to Lady Mills.

"Take her in quickly, Tom. I should never forgive myself if she caught cold," said kind old Sir Jonas anxiously, standing at the door of the grape-house with his knife still in his hand.

"Nor should I," muttered Mr. Carruthers. "Now run, Miss Christie."

I was not a bit cold, and told him so; but he said, "Never mind—won't do to run risks," and put his arm in mine, and made me run as fast as I could until we were round the corner of a wall, out of Sir Jonas' sight.

"And now," said he, "we'll run another way,"

And he took me down a long path between apple and pear trees until we got to a side-gate that I had not seen before.

"I am going to take you for a walk," said he.

"But it is so late, and I am dressed so queerly."

"Never mind. You are not sleepy, are you?"—and he looked down into my face. "No, your eyes are quite bright and—wide awake. And nobody goes to bed here till they are sleepy, which is a very good plan. As for your dress, I think it is very becoming—very becoming—quite Oriental. And as it is soo late for anybody else to be about, and too dark for them to see you if they were, I am the only person you need consult."

So we went through the gate and by a narrow foot-path over the grass down to the river. We stopped when we got there, by the bath-house, and Mr. Carruthers said it would be a lovely night for a sail,

"Just down there to the broad," said he, "and along that path of moonlight, up to those trees and back again. Wouldn't it be jolly?"

"Yes, if it were not Sunday," I said timidly.

No other objections occurred to me. He looked down at me, as if hesitating about something, and then said—

"You are right. You see I respect your scruples, if I do not share them;" and he took out his watch. "It is just a quarter to twelve. By the time I have got the boat ready it will be Monday morning, and then there will be nothing against it."

He had one foot in the boat before I could do more than say—

"But, Mr. Carruthers, it is so late. What would Lady Mills say?

"I'll make it all right with Lady Mills; and you are such a good little girl that nobody will think anything of what you do."

I did not understand this speech so well then as I did later; but it gave me a sense of uneasiness, which however was but momentary, for he talked and made me laugh until he had the boat ready, and we heard the big church-bell strike out twelve.

"Now, unless that clock is fast, our consciences are free. Give me your hand. Step carefully. There you are."

I was in the boat, smiling with pleasure, yet ready to cry out at every movement, for I had never been on the water before.

"There isn't much wind; but I think there is enough to bring us back, so I'll just scull down the stream to the broad. Take the lines—so—and pull whichever one I tell you."

I disengaged my hands from the shawl I was shrouded in, and, everwhelmed by a sense of my new responsibilities, did as I was told without a word. And, as there was not much steering required, I fell to thinking of Laurence. I had had to talk a great deal during the last two days; but whenever I was not talking my thoughts flew back at once to him, as they did now.

"You are not thinking of me," said Mr. Carruthers quietly.

I started, blushed, and pulled my wrong line at once.

"Never mind," said he meekly—"only it's ungrateful. He isn't half so much absorbed in you as I am."

"Absorbed in me! I was thinking of—Mrs. Manners."

"Happy Mrs. Manners to be able to call up such a smile of beautitude on the face of a beautiful girl!"

"Who did you think it was, Mr. Carruthers?"

"If I tell you, you will upset me, or command me to land you at once."

"No I won't. And you wouldn't pay any attention if I did."

"Let me come and sit by you, and I'll tell you. We can drift."

So he came and sat by my side, and directed our course by splashing in one of the sculls, first on one side and then on the other, as we went on talking.

"Why is it," he asked suddenly, "that a woman never cares for the man who loves her best?"

The question, which was quite new to me, startled me.

"Doesn't she—ever?" I asked anxiously.

"I—I am afraid not," said, in a very low voice, bending his face to mine with a sad look in his eyes that troubled me.

"But how is she to tell?" I asked tremulously.

"I think she can tell best by the look in his eyes when they are bent on her," he whispered, with a long steady gaze which disconcerted me.

I turned away my head.

"If," he went on, still in the same voice quite soft close to my ear, "she raises her lips to his and then tries to read in his eyes the emotion he feels for her——"

"But I did," said I quickly, turning to him with my heart beating fast at the remembrance of Laurance's first kiss.

Mr. Carruthers drew back, stroked his moustache, and looked at me in quite a different manner.

"You have not lived all your life in the country, Miss Christie, I think," said he drily

And I saw in a moment, by the change in his look and voice, what I had done. He had been making love to me, while I was thinking of nothing but Laurence. I put out my hand to his very gently, and said—

"Don't be offended with me, Mr. Carruthers. I dare say all you say is true; but I am so fond of him that I cannot help thinking he does love me best."

I said this just to comfort him, for I could not really have doubted Laurence for the world. He took my hand and kissed it, but not, I thought, as if he cared about it very much, and then he said we had better think about getting back; so he turned the boat round and put up the sail, and, the wind having freshened a little, we got back in a very short time, not talking much; but we were quite good friends again, for my mingled delight and fear amused Mr. Carruthers.

A Cold Day for the Geese.

Yesterday morning Hy Downs, the tunnel tender of the Virginia and Truckee railroad near Washoe Lake, went out about 5 o'clock to shoot geese. He soon discovered a flock on the ice in the lake, and crawled on his hands and knees on the ice, through the tules, to get a shot. Downs is a thorough sportsman, and never takes the advantage of a goose that is not on the wing. Coming within shooting distance he rose up and expected to see the birds fly, but they did not. Then he waved his hat, and a few of the geese flapped their wings, but did not budge an inch. He then walked up, and there, to his astonishment, found 128 birds frozen fast to the ice and helpless. It appeared they had surrounded an air hole for water the night before, and had been wading about in the overflow and slush until the cold wave came up toward evening, and before they knew it their feet had become fast in the ice. Some were dead, but the majority were living. Later in the day he went down with a cart and bagged the entire lot.

A Splendid Speculation.

Mr. Dumley was making an evening call, and Bobby, who was allowed to sit up a little later than usual, put to him the following question:

"Mr. Dumley, do you want to make $5 in ten minutes?"

"Do I want to make $5 in ten minutes?" laughed the young man. "Certainly I do. But how can I make $5 in ten minutes, Bobby?"

"Mamma will give it to you. She told papa she would give $5 to see you hold your tongue for ten minutes."

FACTS FOR FARMERS.

Tree Planting.

So small would be the money outlay, so inconsiderable the labor required, to insure for the next generation a wealth of timber land equal to that of which we have the benefit, and shade and shelter trees in even more adequate supply, that it is a great wonder to us, amid all the forcible facts brought forward against the rate at which forest destruction is going on, there has been no more general movement in favor of tree planting. In Germany and Austria, for upward of half a century, the number of trees planted has borne a good proportion to those annually cut down, and it is certain that this is the case now, year by year. In France, Italy and England, also, tree cultivation is now general. But here, with the characteristic improvidence which has come to be considered a marked feature of American character, we are destroying our great virgin forests with a rapidity never before equalled in any other country, and without taking any measures to insure their future growth.

Treatment of Balky Horses.

Any one observing the inhuman treatment often bestowed upon balky horses, will indorse the following persuasive measure recommended by the Germantown Telegraph. To these remedies others may be added, but the ground is sufficiently covered by these hints to meet all ordinary cases of the sulks in horses:

As long as we can remember, this singularity of obstinacy in the horse has been discussed, and all sorts of plans given for overcoming it. It must be remembered that what will prove a remedy for one horse will not for another. The original cause of it is, doubtless, neglect, and ill treatment of the colt, or after it has been broken to harness. Sometimes stopping a few moments will be sufficient to start the animal again of its own accord. Kind words, patting, a handful of hay or grass, an apple, or a little black pepper put upon the tongue, will induce it to go ahead as if nothing had been the matter. Whipping, at all times, and especially in this case, is the worst resort. We have ourselves induced balky horses to quietly start by some of these means, and one was entirely cured of it by letting it stand until it went on again of its own will. Sometimes the mere turning of the head and letting the animal look in a different direction, or rubbing the nose, has answered; so has tying a string around the foreleg below the knee and drawing it rather tight. Various resorts of this kind should be adopted, but never force.

Meat for Chickens.

We do not think that we can be mistaken in the belief that we should be far more successful in the raising of young chickens by giving them a great deal more animal food than we are in the practice of doing. Corn meal mush, boiled potatoes, and similar substances generally compose, as we all know, the principal food of young chickens; but we can see no reason why these young birds should be exceptions to the ordinary rule of young birds in general, which feed largely, indeed chiefly, on animal food; even those which, when they are mature, live mostly on fruits and seeds, are fed when in their nests on worms, grubs, and insects. We notice the old birds all day long busily engaged in supplying their young with food, and always with animal food. In fact, it is doubtful that we have seen anything else. Now, then, should chicks be an exception? The recommendations, almost without exception, in our poultry publications are to give more animal food to our grown fowls if we expect them to give us more eggs, especially in winter, when they help themselves to some. That it is a great inducement to make them lay more generously, we have many proofs to admit of any doubt. Besides, it is claimed that animal food has other advantages in the way of good health, etc. Why, then, let us ask again, should growing chickens not be benefited with at least a moderate supply of animal food? Every chicken raisers know the great losses always suffered in the growth of them, and why it not be owing to a large extent to the withholding entirely of this strengthening food, which is of so much benefit to the matured fowl? We, therefore, suggest to our readers to change their method of feeding their young chickens by giving them a due proportion of animal food, chopped up in very small pieces, and thus find out, each one for himself, whether it is not a very decided benefit in raising to maturity an additional number of the chicks into strong, healthy fowls.—Germantown Telegraph.

Modern and Ancient Rainfal.

In discussing recently the question whether we were in danger of a permanent increasing reduction of, our available water power, a question of most vital importance, we were forced to conclude that no such peril was imminent, and that the scarcity of water so troublesome for two or three years past in New England and the adjacent States was merely local, and would be only temporary. It is however well worth while to look further. We may find reason to believe that changes are in progress, though moving too slowly to be detected within one or two generations. Our rain records cover but comparatively a very few years, but there are records to which we can refer, going back several thousands, and they tell a different story from that which brief national history seems to show.

We do not refer in this to geological evidence, though that is by no means to be disregarded, for it is manifest that vast areas of the earth's surface were formerly covered with water which has passed away entirely by evaporation. Changes in elevation have raised the continents and thus forced the ocean back into narrower limits, but these changes are of a different kind. The seas of enclosed water owe their continued extent to the relative amount of evaporation and precipitation, and nothing can be more certain than that, in some instances at least, such areas have been in steady progress of contraction since certainly the close of the Tertiary age, this steady contraction being perfectly consistent with fluctuations which might continue many years each. Two illustrations only are sufficient. The basin of the Aral-Caspian (for the two are to be counted but as one) gives us one. Humboldt says: "The desiccation which is unquestionably going on in the basin of the Aral Sea . . . is in no way dependent on any violent revolution in the order of nature." Major Herbert Wood of the Royal Engineers says that "there is no doubt of the former vastly greater extension of the combined Aral-Caspian Seas, and extremely little as to their former connection with the Polar Ocean."

The other we find in our own continent. Every one travelling on the Central Pacific Railroad has had the opportunity to see for himself that the Great Salt Lake of Utah has formerly covered a vastly greater extent of surface than it does now. The terraces which its waters have left all along the flanks of the Wahsatch Mountains, at elevations of thirty to fifty feet and more above its present level, are as plainly to be traced, as any railroad embankment, a state of water which would flood a vast area.

But these manifestations we take only incidentally, for we know nothing of the amount of time involved in them. If we can find, however, that the same changes have been progress within the time which we can measure by definite years, then these geological records become to us of immense importance, since they show a persistence of effects and causes that must certainly depend on natural laws, and may be expected therefore to continue in steady action new and for all time to come.

No matter what views we take of the origin of the human race, it is manifest to all that the oldest of all indications to which we can refer, written, monumental, or traditional, are mostly grouped around the eastern limits of the Mediterranean Sea, with the countries to the northeast beyond. We look in the dim light of extreme antiquity to the regions around the Euphrates and the Tigris. The Assyrian Empire is to us the embodiment of the very earliest days. Its power swayed all the Southwest of Asia, and it was because it had a thickly peopled domain. Dr. D. Fraas says; "The most fruitful land of antiquity was, as is well known, the region bordering on the Lower Euphrates and Tigris, and in particular that called in later times Mesopotamia. But as Richter says, the land of great canals is now desert and barren, without settlement, and a dried up wilderness—covered with a growth of the plants peculiar to a saline soil and all this where once was the 'garden of the world,'" Mr. Blanford, chief of the India Geological Survey, writes of Persia: "From the accounts given by ancient writers, it appears highly probable that the population was much greater and the cultivated land far more extensive 2,000 years ago than at present, and this may have been due to the country being more fertile, in consequence of the rain fall being greater."

Captain Burton says: "The once wealthy and commercial land of Midian has become a desolation among the nations; the area of some three thousand square miles, which thirty-one centuries ago could send into the field 135,000 swordsmen, is abandoned to a few hundreds—half peasants, half nomads." Once more, when the Israelites, in their exodus, came up on the east side of the Dead Sea, the whole plain of Bashan was swarmed with inhabitants. It was dotted over with walled towns, with intervals of but a very few miles in any case. The towns are there now, but where are the people? A few wandering Bedouins roam here and there, but the cities are "waste, without inhabitants." The land is in no way able to support the population which three thousand three hundred years ago lived in prosperity. We may not deny that various causes have contributed to this decadence—moral, social, political, but the one which has been engaging our attention is of itself imperative. "Ichabod" has been written on the land, for its glory has departed with the rain.

And so we might go on; the same truth is shown everywhere over Asia and Europe and the north of Africa. But we will look at only one other single line of evidence, and that shall be among the ancient people of America. We will come nearer in space and probably nearer in time, though how much nearer we do not know. It is well known to all that in many parts of New Mexico and Arizona are found extended proofs of the former occupancy of that country by a people certainly distinct from the Indians of modern type. They have long since passed away; how long since we can only conjecture. But their houses remain—some of them single, some in villages and towns. Some are in the valleys, some on the mesas far above the valleys, while many are real cliff dwellings, recalling in their situations the homes of Edom.

The one point which at present interests us as to these ruins is this: no one now can live where they were built, simply from the lack of water. Dr. Bessels, speaking of those along the Hoven Weep, says: "There is no running water whatever during the greater part of the year." Mr. W. H. Jackson, describing those on the San Juan, states that "there is not a living stream throughout this whole region." Capt. Simpson, in his report to the Secretary of War, detailing those he saw along the Rio Chaca, says: "The country, as usual, on account doubtless, of constant drought, presented one wide expanse of barren waste." And yet over all that stretch of country was manifestly found long ago an abundant population.

It is evident, therefore, that then rain fell in much larger amount than now; and, inasmuch as there is nothing to indicate any sudden change, it is reasonable to infer that the change has been gradual, and hence that it may be still in progress.

One item of interest is worth mentioning as being a collateral proof of such a condition. Through all the region northward thence—New Mexico, Arizona, Nevada, and Utah—the tree growth (which is very limited) gives one constantly the impression that it is about to come to an end. The nut pines, for instance, all look old; there is scarcely such a thing as a young tree to be seen. The bare, ragged branches seem as though they might have battled the storms for hundreds of years, but could scarcely do it much longer, and then when they were gone there would be nothing left.

All these facts apparently make one indication, and though any local droughts, even if protracted over several years, may be of small moment, yet the evidence comes strongly to us that a gradual desiccation of the earth's surface is in progress, and that this proceeds from causes not connected in any way with human agency, and of course not under human control.

Arabi Pasha's Influence.

A correspondent of the London Standard writes that journal from Suakim: I have referred to the fact that the fellahs are not willing soldiers. I fear it must be accepted that their hearts are still with Arabi and the anti-foreigner movement of which he was the champion. Immediately after Arabi's trial there can be no doubt that in Egypt the British had earned some popularity. We had saved the nationalist leaders and hundreds of their followers from death and banishment. While the treatment promised to Arabi in Ceylon seemed generous in the extreme compared to that which the Khedive, if left to himself, would speedily have accorded, this popularity and sympathy of the nationalists seemed a hopeful sign for the success of the task we had undertaken in Egypt. But somehow we seem to have lost all that good will which the French said we had won through intrigue and gold more than by straight policy. We have estranged the Nationalists in some mysterious manner, and, on the other hand, have not made ourselves very popular with those who surround the Khedive. The other day I saw and conversed with Arabi in Ceylon. I found him much changed. Instead of the cheerful contentment which he manifested when he first landed in the island, he had grown morose and sulky. No attention is paid to him by the government officials of the colony. He is allowed to do as he likes and see whom he likes, and he sees few Englishmen compared with the number of foreigners who call upon him. From every Messageries steamer that puts in at Colombo, dozens of Frenchmen go to pay the exile a visit, even the saloon stewards being admitted, and with all these, of course, the theme of conversation is condolence with Arabi and his lot, and abuse of England and her selfish policy. And Arabi himself does not in any means talk in so friendly a manner now of England and her work in Egypt as he used to do after the trial. All this, perhaps, would matter little, were it not that Arabi is unrestricted in his correspondence, and he is consequently, I happen to know, in communication with his former friends in Egypt. He is well posted up in everything that is going on in that country; and it is a pity that his influence should be carelessly allowed to mitigate against us, when with a little good management it might easily have been turned the other way. One has only to talk to the Egyptian officers and soldiers here about Arabi to see that that influence even now counts for something. When I tell them that I saw their late leader only a short time ago, their faces brighten up as they eagerly ask for information concerning him.

THE RED SUNSETS.

No Correct Explanation of the Phenomena yet Given.

No recent phenomena has more puzzled astronomers than the remarkable appearance of the atmosphere as observed after sunset and before sunrise during the last five months. These brilliant glows have been seen in all parts of the habitable world. They were first noticed on the 28th of August, and they may still be seen, both morning and evening, when the atmosphere is favorable. It is well known, in fact, that on any clear day the matter by which the appearance is produced may be seen around the sun, extending to a distance of twenty or thirty degrees. The phenomena have been ascribed:

1. To watery vapor in the atmosphere.
2. To meteoric matter through which the earth has been supposed to be passing; and:
3. To the volcanic eruptions of Java and Alaska.

The first conjecture has been discovered by the spectroscope. The second may be said to be rendered extremely improbable by the long continuance of the glows. The earth crosses the meteoric streams of August and November in a few days at most, but the present phenomena have already lasted more than five months. The volcanic hypothesis is received with most favor, and we must either accept it or admit that the true explanation remains yet to be discovered. In the last number of Sidereal Messenger, I have briefly stated some objections to this theory, as follows:—"No similar results—at least to any great extent—had been known to follow volcanic eruptions. If the matter started from Java on the 26th of August, its rates of motion through the atmosphere till its appearance in Brazil was 100 miles an hour. Or, if we assume that the appearance in South America was derived from the Alaska outburst, we have the additional improbability that results of a character before unknown following volcanic eruptions in opposite hemispheres at nearly the same time. Again, what force could have maintained this volcanic matter at so great an elevation during a period of several months?"

In short, no explanation yet offered is free from serious difficulties.

Preaching and Practice.

"See here, Mr. Blank, what are you going out to-night for?" asked Mrs. B. with a threatening look.

"Big political meeting to-night," explained Mr. B., apologetically.

"Political meeting, eh?" echoed Mrs. B. "You have been going to political meetings every night for five weeks, and if it had not been for me you would have worn your boots to bed every time."

"But just think how nice it would be if I should get nominated for something? Think of the loads of money I could rake in, and the nice furniture and new clothes and sealskin sacques and—"

"That will do," interrupted Mrs. Blank; "I have heard that story before. You made a speech last night at a ward meeting, I see."

"Yes," responded Mr. B., with pardonable pride.

"And I see by the two or three lines notice of it in the newspaper that the burden of your remarks was 'the office should seek the man and not the man the office.' Now, [you just take off that overcoat; and sit down, and if any office comes along and knocks I will let it in."

A Burlington mother has miraculously cured her young hopeful of smoking by the laying on of hands.

LAUGHLETS.

A veteran was relating his exploits to a crowd of boys, and mentioned having been in five engagements. "That's nothing," broke in a little fellow, "My sister Sarah's been engaged eleven times."

Little Willie has been summarily corrected by his mother for repeated acts of naughtiness. The punishment being over, "Papa," he sobs, in tones of anguish, "how could you marry such an ill-tempered woman as mamma?"

"You see," said a lawyer, in summing up a case where one party had sued the other on a transaction on coal, "the coal should have gone to the buyer." "Not so," said the judge, "it should have gone to the cellar."

"There are various keys," said a young man to another, "such as sul-key, bul-key, and ris-key, but the only key to your heart is Su-key." "It may be so," replied the other, "but I defy anything to reach your heart but whis-key."

A rich old bachelor was dying. Several female cousins as old as himself came to nurse him, in hope of being remembered in his will. The first question usually asked in the morning by one of these cousins was, "Are ye ony waur?" A more kindly inquiry would have been, "Are ye ony better?"

"What do you think of my article on the political situation?" inquired Fenderson. "Everbody I have heard speak of it," replied Fogg, "praises it very highly." "Do they?" said Fenderson eagerly. "Whom have you heard speak of it?" "Nobody but yourself," said Fogg carelessly.

Sir Robert Peel told a story of a man who gave warning to his master that he must leave his place. "Well, John," said the master, "I am sorry you are going to leave me; what are your causes of discontent?" "Well," said John, "I don't wish to be unreasonable, but I want three things, sir; more wages, less work, and I should like to have the keys of the wine cellar."

An impatient Welshman called to his wife:—"Come! Come! Isn't breakfast ready? I've had nothing since yesterday, and to-morrow will be the third day!" This is equal to the call of the stirring housewife, who aroused her maid at four o'clock with—'Come, Mary get up! Here 'tis Monday morning; to-morrow is Tuesday; and next day's Wednesday—half the week gone, and nothing done yet!"

A gentleman who had been allured by the announcement of a quiet country hotel, came down the morning after his arrival and made complaint that his boots had been outside his door all night and until eight o'clock that morning, and nobody had touched them. The landlord, who, in his shirt sleeves, was tipped back in a chair and picking his tooth with a knife, beamingly remarked—"Law me, ye might have left yer purse out there all night, and nobody would have touched it. Honest critters down here. I tell ye."

They tell a capital story in the Temple of ex Chief Baron Pollock, that one who wished him to resign waited on him, and hinted it, suggesting it for his own sake, entirely with a view to the prolongation of his own valued life, &c. The old man arose, and said, with his grim, dry gravity, "Will you dance with me?" The guest stood aghast as the Lord Chief Baron, who prided himself particularly upon his legs, began to caper about with a certain youthful vivacity. Seeing his visitor standing surprised, he capered up to him, and said, "Well, if you won't dance with me, will you box with me?" and with that he squared up to him, and half in jest half in earnest, fairly boxed him out of the room. The old Chief Baron had no more visitors anxiously inquiring after his health and suggesting his retirement.

Be Somebody.

Robert J. Burdette, the facetious editor of the Burlington Hawkeye, has been lecturing to large audiences in different parts of the country, and in his amusing style he imparts to the rising generation some wholesome advice. The following is from one of his lectures:—

"Be somebody on your own account, my son, and don't try to get along on the reputation of your ancestors. Nobody knows and nobody cares who Adam's grandfather was, and there is not a man living who can tell the name of Brigham Young's mother-in-law." The lecturer urged upon his hearers the necessity of keeping up with the every day procession, and not pulling back in the harness. Hard work was never known to kill men; it was the fun that men had in the intervals that killed them. The fact was, most people had yet to learn what fun really was. A man might go to Europe and spend a million dollars, and then recall the fact that he had had a great deal more fun at a picnic twenty years ago that cost him just 65 cents. The theory that the world owed every man a living was false. The world owed a man nothing. There was a living in the world for every man, however, provided that the man was willing to work for it. If he did not work for it, somebody else would earn it, and the lazy man would 'get left.' There were greater opportunities for workers out West than in Eastern cities, but men who went out West to grow up with that country must do their own growing. There is no browsing allowed in the vigorous West. An energetic man may go out into the far West, and in two or three years possess himself of a bigger house, a bigger yard, a bigger barn, and a bigger mortgage than he could obtain by ten years' work in the East. All young men ought to marry, and no young man ought to envy old men or rich men. In conclusion, Mr. Burdette said that a man should do well whatever he was given to do, and not despise drudgery.

Looking out for Lorne.

It is understood to be the wish of the Queen that the Marquis of Lorne should be called to the House of Lords by one of his father's minor titles, and that this will be done shortly after the opening of Parliament. It is said that Her Majesty's object in this is to prepare the way for the appointment of Lord Lorne either as Viceroy of India or as Lord Lieutenant of Ireland. In the one case the annual income is $500,000, and in the other, $100,000.

SNOWED UP.

Four Days on a Rocky Mountain Train.

Charles Willis, a passenger on a train which was snowed under near Osier, was in Denver recently. In conversation with a reporter he detailed his experience. "We left Silverton last Sunday," he said. "A heavy snow storm was falling, but it wasn't very cold. When we got to Durango it commenced snowing hard. It seemed to fall in flakes as big as your hand. We had to plow through the stuff for several miles, and made headway like a ship against the wind. Above three miles from Osier we stopped, and there we remained for over three days. We made the best of it we could. The women were half scared to death, and one of them wanted to get out and walk. Her husband told her she could go if she wanted to, but after taking a survey she concluded to remain where she was. Lunch baskets were soon emptied, and a raid was made on the express car. There was little in it, but what there was was confiscated by Tuesday night. Some parties came to us from Osier on snow shoes, and were kept busy after that packing provisions until the road was cleared. We had to melt snow for water, and didn't go unwashed if we did go without a change of clothing. If our quarters had not been so narrow and confined, we would have had an excellent time, and tried to have one anyhow, if we did but partially succeed.

"At last, on Tuesday afternoon, we got an opening, but had a hard time of it until we passed Toltec gorge. I suppose there are several millions of tons of snow in that pass alone. When we reached Salbotte it was comparatively easy traveling, and thence on we had no difficulty. I was glad when we reached Pueblo. It was like getting into Paradise after having been in the frozen circle so graphically described by Dante. but I think if Dante had ever been snowbound for four days he could have improved upon his description."

An Electrical Exposition in Philadelphia.

Some time during the coming fall, Philadelphia will hold what it is hoped will be the most important exhibition of electrical machines and methods so far convened anywhere. Some very novel and startling events will mark this display of electrical power. It is proposed to place an electric light of 100,000 candle power in the bed of the Schuylkill River. This is to show how torpedoes and other warlike instruments can be detected before they do damage by exploding. The developments of electrical science as applied to daily necessities are simply marvelous. A vast industry has thus been created in the last few years involving tens of millions of dollars. It has so far been found impossible to procure trained experts to supply the demand for electrical machinery. In the classification adopted the different groups will consist of: First, apparatus for the production of electricity; second, electric conductors; third, measurements; fourth, applications of electricity, under which there are two subdivisions, apparatus of small power and those of large power; fifth, terrestrial physics sixth, historical apparatus, and seventh, educational and biographical. The section devoted to measurements is probably one of the most interesting te scientists and the least known to the public of any of the exhibits.

A Wonderful Bell.

The temples at Kroto, Japan, says a correspondent of the Philadelphia Press, are mainly of interest on account of their bell, which swings in a monster wooden belfry half way up the hillside, back of the buildings proper. This bell is a huge bronze cup with nearly perpendicular sides and a flat crown, and, like all other Japanese bells, is sounded by means of a huge beam kept in place by ropes, but, when occasion requires, brought against the rim of the bell with great force. It requires twelve coolies to manipulate this beam. Formerly it was only rung once a year, but now it may be heard two or three times every month. It is one of the greatest wonders in Japan. It is 18 feet high, 9 and a half inches thick, 9 feet in diameter, and weighs nearly 74 tons It was cast in a monster mould in the year 1633. As the bell was cast with the rim up the gold entering into its composition—computed to be 1,500 pounds—sunk to the crown. It has a magnificent tone, and when struck by the open palm the vibrations may be heard at a distance of one hundred yards.

Leap Year Festivities.

The season of leap year parties is upon us and the feelings with which these anomalous festivities are regarded by their votaries probably vary as widely as do their views of theology. There are those to whom there is always a certain savor of vulgarity about a leap year party, but those who are less fastidious the strongest sensation is that of strangeness and an emotion of topsy-turviness. The unfortunate damsels who are entrapped into acting as escort to one of these gatherings generally emerge from the trying ordeal with a new sense of the weighty nature of the masculine duties, and, as a rule, find one experience quite sufficient for four years. It is amusing, moreover, to note how few people have the imagination or observation necessary to change places socially with one of the opposite sex, and satisfactorily to act the part. What seems at first thought the easiest of undertakings, in reality requires no inconsiderable share of histrionic powers. It is usually safe for either lady or gentleman to set out for a leap year dance with the preliminary wager that before the evening is over both will have made half a dozen palpable and undeniable blunders in their respective roles, and such book-making will be found successful beyond all precedents in betting.

"Mike," said a priest to his servant, "if the Protestant minister calls to-day, remember I do not wish to see him; don't say I'm not at home, for that would be a lie, but give him an evasive answer." "Ooh, I will," said Mike. "Well, Mike," said the priest in the evening, "did the minister call?" "Faix, he did, your riverence." "What answer did you give him?" "I gave him an evasive answer, as your riverence towld me." "But what did you say to him?" "Why, your riverence, he asked me was yer at home, and I towld him, was his grandmother a donkey."

CHEESE FACTORY.

A meeting was held on Saturday last, in the Orange Hall, for the purpose of electing officers and other business in connection with the establishment of Markdale cheese factory. There was a large attendance of the farmers of the district, all of whom appeared enthusiastic on the factory question. Mr. Garrett, of Flesherton cheese factory, was present, and gave valuable information in reference to the management of the business. The following officers were elected:—Mr. B. Coleman, President; Directors—Messrs. John Boland, John Hutchinson, John Whitby, Wm. Jackson, jr., Wm. McLoughry, H. McKee, Wm. Brown, Euphrasia, H. D. Irwin, Jas. Wright. The directors elected Mr. Thos. Boland as secretary. The business is to be managed on the same principle as that of the Flesherton factory, viz: The patrons guarantee the milk of a given number of cows each, making in all not less than 200, to be delivered at the factory in good condition and pure, while the proprietors of the factory bind themselves to make a first-class article at a certain price per lb., the directors, or one of themselves whom they appoint for the purpose, make sale of their product from time to time, as the market and other circumstances suit. Messrs. Elliott and Carson are now making vigorous efforts preparing for the erection of the factory which they will have ready for operation by the 1st of May.

NEW ELECTION.

Owing to the death of A. W. Lauder, M. P. P., an election in East Grey will take place at an early day; and considerable uneasiness is already displayed in certain circles, as to who will be the lucky man to fill the vacancy. The feeling has been growing for years in favor of a local man to represent the riding, but no one ever expected it to come about in the sad way in which it did. Mr. Lauder was, comparatively speaking, a young man, and bid fair for many years of active life, and though the probabilities were that he would not have been successful as a candidate for East Grey another term, owing to the increasing desire on the part of ratepayers to have a local man, yet he would have had no difficulty in securing a seat in the house. There are a number of aspirants, or those who are spoken of as probable candidates, in the Conservative party, among whom are Messrs. W. J. McFarland, T. Kells, Dr. Christoe, N. McColeman, T. McKinney, J. Rorke, Thos. Gamey; and on the Reform side we have heard the names of Messrs. Wm. Brown, J. J. Middleton, and A. Gifford, mentioned. Each party will, however, have a meeting of their convention forthwith, after which things will present a more practical aspect.

What we may Expect.

Another wedding.
A thaw in March,
And an early spring.
A large number of aspirants in East Grey.
And W. J. McFarland be the choice of the Conservative convention,
And be elected.
Mr. Myles in the field.
The election not just yet.

HYGIENE.

"How is your health?" "Quite well, thank you." The question often comes formally, but sometimes doubtless, with anxious concern for our welfare, from a friend or acquaintance. The true answer would be, in the great majority of instances, to say, "No worse than usual." Very few, indeed, enjoy perfect health, the indispensable prerequisite to real success and happiness. This may, to many, appear a startling statement, while, on the other hand, in view of the almost universal and constant violation of the physiological laws, by even the educated, as well as the more illiterate, those who properly understand the relations of cause and effect with respect to the laws of health, rather regard it as a wonder, that so many are, after all, comparatively comfortable, and do not suffer more, though they are certainly far from the enjoyment of perfect health.

To be healthy, we must obey the health laws; but the great majority of the people live as if there were no law to be regarded, but the law of their own inclinations and convenience; they forget that to be healthy we must have, in due quantity, pure and proper food, pure water, pure air, cleanliness, sufficient exercise, rest, sleep; the proper and healthy regulation of the feelings, especially the control of the passions and propensities; due regard to temperature, and the free circulation of the blood.

First, then, as to proper food. Those articles that are impure in their nature, highly concentrated, difficult to digest, or highly stimulating, should be discarded as unfit for human aliment. Among these may be mentioned, pork, pastry, spices, and tea and coffee, which many regard as affording nourishing food as well as drink. That prince of savengers, the hog, constitutes an important part of the food of millions. By nature, he is filthy, and by practice, he is abominable. No filth is too revolting for his omnivorous tastes, and no quantity excessive, so long as it will permit him still to breathe and grunt. It is admitted that impure air, water, and surely impure food will breed impurities in the human organism; then why should they not in the organism of the hog? The term, scrofulous, which is an important basis of filth diseases, is derived from the Latin, scrofa, a sow, because of the known condition of this animal's flesh. But while the flesh of a healthy hog, if such a term is admissible, and such an animal possible, might be tolerated, the process of fattening to which he is subjected, should cause even the human stomach to revolt against receiving this concentrated essence of all that is filthy. This scavenger, shut in his narrow pen, wallowing in his own filth, eating to the utmost repletion, inhaling an intolerable stench, feeding upon the foulest combinations of animal and vegetable refuse in all processes of decay, can no more have healthy flesh than can man subjected to the same conditions maintain pure blood.

A swill-barrel is a concentration of filth capable of producing more dysenteries, diptherias, scarlatina, small-pox than all the boards of health in North America could control; and yet it is considered proper food on which to feed the fattening hog, which is, in turn, to be eaten by the hungry millions; this filth, if fed to other animals, would soon cause disease and death, but the coarse, filthy appetite of the hog is never debauched, and he lives and grunts, though he is poisoned every hour of his life; and when he becomes too loaded with filth to live much longer, when his feeder has grave fears that he cannot continue to endure these disease-producing processes, he kills him and places him upon the market as healthful food, or should nature forestall the butcher, and the hog die a natural death, it is not certain that the feeder's conscience would secure him a natural burial. Surely this cancerous, tuberculous, scrofulous, trichina-infected pork is a concentration of filth eminently capable of transference to other organisms, and the production of human diseases. A healthy sty-fed hog must certainly be considered an impossibility; for though his organism is not sufficiently sensitive to develop dangerous diseases, the causes thereof must certainly exist in a latent form to be developed into actual disease in the more sensitive human organism.

Late investigations in vegetable physiology have proved that even the plant may become impure or poisoned by being planted in filthy soil, it having no power to reject the elements of impurity which happen to be mingled with its natural food, while the very subject we are discussing derives all its importance from the acknowledged scientific fact that animals too must become poisoned and impure, if the impurities exist in the air breathed, the water drunk, or the food eaten. How important, therefore, must be the conclusion that pork, apart from its natural unfitness for food, is poisoned and filthy because of the habits and surroundings of the hog!

But how is it with the flesh of other animals? None are so filthy in their habits, we are sure, as is this one, and if left to themselves, their flesh could not, by any means, compare in foulness with the justly despised pork; but when we consider the processes of fattening to which our beef, mutton, turkey, duck, chicken, are subjected, we are compelled to ask ourselves if these supply pure food for human beings.

Among the Kimberley items it is stated that Mr. D Holman is going to start a shoe shop in that place. This is not so. If you were to hunt Kimberley from one end to the other, you couldn't get a place large enough to stick your head in, except the gristmill, summit house, and we all know what that is like. (Probably Kimberley correspondent don't). Advance man wonders if "D." wants to get any more printing done on "Tick", or if he expects to use what he ordered last fall, when doing business in Maxwell, and which, he says, has not yet been paid or called for. Well! well! Advance, your memory must have failed you, or you would remember that I called for same three times and was not done, and had the money ready for you any time. So at last you promised to send it to me when done. You failed in doing so, and I never called for it again, and don't intend to now. But when you mail to me, as agreed, your pay will be remitted to you. Please grind a few more little fibs like this in your mill, which you are accustomed to do, and then stop.

GRATIFYING PROGRESS OF THE ORDER.

GUELPH, Feb. 19.—The Grand Lodge of Ontario A. O. U. W. is holding its annual session here to-day. About 250 representatives are present. The Grand Master's report shows that the Order has increased from 400 members in Febuary, 1879, to 7,467 in Febuary 1884, and since the organization of the order in April, 1877, that $252,000 have been paid for benefits. Last year it cost each member $12 to carry his beneficiary certificate of $2,000. Grand Recorder Carder's report shows the receipts for the past year to have been $78,061,87. Grand Medical Examiner Widdifield's report shows that out of 2,261 applications received the past year, 77 were rejected. The death rate was six per 1,000, which Dr. Widdifield regards as a highly favourable exhibit. The election of officers will take place to-morrow. The Grand Master Workman's shows that twenty-three lodges have been organized in Ontario last year, and the number of members had increased by 1383, there now being a total membership of 7.467.

During the year 2.261 applications were received of which 2,180 were approved and 77 disapproved, leaving 4 under consideration. The death rate was 6 per 1,000, a highly satisfactory exhibit, the rate throughout the whole of the Supreme Jurisdiction being 9 per 1,000.

Flesherton.

From our own correspondent.

Owing to the inclemency of the weather last Thursday the Musical and Literary entertainment, given under the auspices of the I. O. O. F. here in the Town Hall, was poorly patronized; the audience was small, and made it rather discouraging for those immediately connected with the entertainment, and also for those taking part in the programme; but all seemed fully determined to make the evening as enjoyable as possible, and each one rendered his and her part with as much enthusiasm as if to a crowded house. Mr. A. S. VanDusen occupied the chair very creditably, but seemed a little bashful. Songs were well rendered by Mrs. W. Trimble, Miss Christoe, Miss M. Richardson, Miss VanDusen, and Mr. F. McDowell. Mr. Macpherson, our popular banker, with song, "Uncle Joe," brought down the house and was loudly encored. Song, "Mortgaging the Farm," by Mr. McPherson and Mrs. W. W. Trimble and Company, in character, was well rendered and duly appreciated by the audience. Recitations were well rendered by Miss Hopkins, Miss Ida Jimby and Miss Breeaze, of Chatsworth. Miss Hopkins still retains her reputation and ability as a reciter. Miss Jimby, although her voice is not strong, is very expressive. She recited "Death's Doom" exceedingly well Miss Breeaze recited "The Mother's Fool" very nicely. Readings were given by the Editor of the Advance and J. Blackburn. Choice selections of instrumental music were rendered by the Quartette, also by Messrs. McDowell, McKechnie and Vanzant. The Parks Bros. also dalighted the audience by their sweet music. On the whole the programme was well sustained, and no doubt if the weather had been at all favorable there would have been a crowded house.

Dr. Campbell, Phrenologist, who visited this place about 16 years ago, and is well known here to have a good knowledge of the science, lectured in the Town Hall on Monday evening. Subject, Phrenology.

At the Masonic social, on Friday evening, there was a good attendance, in fact the hall was well filled. The entertainment consisted chiefly in various games and social amusements, together with an oyster supper, all of which was heartily entered into and very much enjoyed. Quite a number were present from Markdale.

MR. J. C. Glen, of the firm of J. Phillips, Toronto, has completed putting in gasoline and fixtures in W. J. McFarland's store. It has been now in operation three nights, and works very satisfactory. Mr. Glen fully understands his business, and the introduction of this new light will doubtless prove all that is claimed for it.

A GRAND skating carnival will take place in the Dundalk rink on Tuesday evening next, 4th March. Their rink is large, and very comfortable for spectators, and this carnival will doubtless eclipse anything of the sort that has ever been given in the district. We have attended skating carnivals in Dundalk, and know whereof we speak.

SUDDEN DEATH.—We regret having to announce the death of Mr. Robert Whitelaw, of St. Vincent, which sad event took place on the morning of Tuesday the 91th inst., after a short illness. His demise was caused by the breaking of a blood vessel in the brain. He was a young man of excellent character, and will be greatly missed in the neighborhood. His many relatives have the sympathy of all in their sore bereavement. The deceased was a brother to Mr. J. C. Whitelay, of Law, & Whitelaw, Meaford.—Meaford Monitor.

STEAM THRESHERS.—From what we learn of the satisfaction given to the public in this vicinity by the steam thresher belonging to Messrs. Duncan & Cook, of Brampton, it is probable that in a few years horse power threshing will be a thing of the past. We are assured, upon reliable authority that the steam power does double the work of the best horse power, and all things considered, at a saving of from forty to fifty per cent. Messrs. Duncan & Cook have earned for themselves a high reputation amongst the farmers in this section, wherever they were employed.

WEDDING BELLS.—We understand that the wedding at Townsend's Lake, on the 20th inst., was a grand affair. There were about sixty guests sat down to dinner at 7 o'clock p.m. The dinner, which could not be surpassed, was an evidence of the proficiency in cooking of the esteemable and amiable hosts, Mrs. T. Townsend. The presents to the bride were very beautiful and costly, and expressed the regard the community had for Miss S. B. Townsend. The company enjoyed themselves in social converse until 1 o'clock a.m., when they sat down to a sumptuous repast, after which the bridegroom, James Black, Esq., gave an eloquent address, thanking the friends for their kindness and presents, and hoping to meet all in the better country. Mr. and Mrs. Black removes to the state of Iowa during the month of March, and they will take with them the good wishes of the whole community.—COM.

Glenelg Council.

A special meeting of council, held in the Township Hall, Glenelg, Feb. 13th, 1884, for the purpose of appointing an assessor in place of W. H. Arrowsmith, resigned. Present—John A. McMillan, Deputy-Reeve; Messrs, Neil and McCuaig, Councillors. The Deputy-Reeve in the chair.

Moved by Mr. McMillan, seconded by Mr. Neil. That the township be subdivided into two subdivisions for assessment purposes, that No. 1 subdivision be composed of wards Nos. 1 and 2, that No. 2 subdivision be composed of wards Nos. 2 and 3, that Thos. McGirr be appointed assessor for No. 1 subdivision, at a salary of $40, that John McDonald be appointed assessor for No. 2 subdivision, at a salary of $40, and that a by-law be now passed confirming said divisions and the appointment of said assessors. —Carried

By-law 222, in accordance with above resolution, was introduced and read a first and second time.

Moved by Mr. McCuaig, seconded by Mr. Neil, That by-law No. 222 be now read a third time, signed, sealed, and engrossed in the minutes.—Carried.

The council adjourned.

FOREIGN ECHOES.

An indignant writer in a German paper calls attention to the fact that a town in which two thousand workmen were employed in the manufacture of harmonicas now sees them idle, as the American demand for these instruments having ceased, the factory is closed. The writer assigns as a cause the cessation of the pork trade, the cutting off of which has necessitated the closing of the reciprocal branches of the exchange.

One of the most significant facts in the expansion of Italy is the recent increase in the number of its newspapers. There are now published in that country 1,378 journals and other periodicals. Of the newspapers the oldeet is the Genoa Gazette, which dates from 1797. Another saw light in 1814, five came into being between 1320 and 1830, six from 1830 to 1850, nineteen from 1840 to 1850, fifty-two between 1850 and 1860, while 333 new ones appeared in 1882, and thirty-four were started Jan. 1, 1883.

Horses have seldom found kinder friends, says the Pall Mall Gazette, than the late organist of All Hallows' church, Barking, and his wife. The organist left a bequest amounting to more than £100 a year for strewing gravel in slippery weather along the steep inclines of Tower Hill, Nightingale land, and the Minories. On his death his widow supervised the operations in person every morning. The work is still carried on, but the horses miss the energy and superintendence of their old friends.

A party of Persian pilgrims once started for Mecca. They were, however, forbidden to leave the steamer on which they took passage, it being reported that cholera prevailed in Persia. They were carried unwillingly from port to port, and finally deposited almost friendless in London. There fortune favored them, and, after seeing the sights and making money, one married an actress and settled in Baywater, two others went to Paris, and the rest returned home with much worldly wisdom, though a lessened interest in the prophet.

The London correspondent of the Freeman's Journal says: I learn on good authority, that the will of Mrs. Stapleton Bethertton, who recently bequeathed a sum of £400,000 to the pope, is likely to become the subject of litigation. Some of the relatives have already taken the initial step toward contesting the validity of the instrument, on the ground of want of testamentary capacity. The legality of the bequest will be further disputed as being made to an alien, but this does not appear to afford a very strong ground of objection, if, indeed, it is admissible at all.

The Roman correspondent of the London Morning Post telegraphs: A letter from Nice states that last week a rich foreign gentleman shot himself at the Hotel de Paris at Monte Carlo, after having lost a considerable sum the previous night. A merchant shot himself on Friday evening at 10 o'clock at the Place des Phoceens. On the same day the dead body of a man had been found hanging behind the Hotel de Londres. On Thursday night a gentleman who had won 7,000 francs at roulette was murdered when returning home. The authorities of Monte Carlo have, as usual, hushed up the affair and pretend to know nothing.

As a new part in the equipment of a Russian soldier, the St. Petersburg Gazette describes a military handkerchief, designed by a Russian officer, and manufactured in a large factory at St. Petersburg. The cotton handkerchief has a border representing the most lively battle scenes, with full descriptions of each picture, while from the middle the soldier may take a lesson in the mechanism of all kinds of rifles and guns, of which clear and accurate drawings and minute explanations are given. It is said that these handkerchiefs are becoming very popular among the soldiers, which is not astonishing, if the eager desire of the Russian for information of all kinds of machinery is considered. This information has, however, to be imparted to their childlike nature in the simplest possible form, and therefore the idea of imparting it by pocket-handkerchiefs, absurd as it may appear, is not ill adapted to the requirements of those for whom it was intended.

Statistics are being collected in France for the purpose of forming an estimate as to whether the total number of the inhabitants in the country will be greater or less than it is now at the close of the century. Thus far the figures tend to show that there is likely to be a decrease rather than an increase in the population. There are not upon an average more than two children now to each family in France, and, though there has always been an increase in population since 1807, the rate of the increase has been constantly declining from 38 per 10,000 yearly to 26 per 10,000. Returns also state that out of every 100 inhabitants in Paris only 36 are born in the department, 57 coming from the provinces and 7 from abroad. Moreover, while the number of births remains nearly stationary in France, the rate of infant mortality is enormous, being as much as 27 per cent. in Normandy, and 15 per cent. for the whole of France.

At a recent meeting of Paris rag-gatherers a resolution was passed protesting against the order of the prefect of the Seine as to depositing rubbish henceforth in boxes. The master rag-gatherer, who presided, said there were thirty thousand persons in Paris who lived by rag-gathering, and that the prefect of the Seine in choosing a time of commercial crisis for his measure had chosen a time when such a measure fell hardest on them, which, indeed, seems admitted to be true. Another speaker said that long ago a similar measure had been adopted and withdrawn. The paper and rags collected by his fellow-workers were employed in different industries, the rags thus collected forming 70 per cent of the composition of certain cheap textiles, and if not collected within twenty-fours both paper and rags through decomposition lost their utility.

The experiment of opening South Kensington and Bethnal Green museums to the public three evenings in the week has been so successful that a resolution will be moved in the house of commons during the present session in favor of keeping the British museums and the National gallery open till 10 o'clock at night. At the Bethnal Green museum, situated in a district which is densely populated by people of the laboring classes, out of a total of 447,722 visitors in 1881 217,914 went between the hours of six and 10 p.m., on Mondays, Tuesdays, and Saturdays (twelve hours) in each week, and 239,838 (between the hours of 10 a.m., and 4, 5, or 6 p.m. (thirty-six, or forty-eight hours) on six days per week.

On Fainting.

It is surprising how everybody rushes at a fainting person and strives to raise him up, and especially to keep his head erect. There must be an instinctive apprehension that if a person seized with a fainting or other fit fall into a recumbent position, death is more imminent. I must have driven a mile to-day while a lady fainting was held upright. I found her pulseless, white, and apparently dying, and I believe if I had delayed ten minutes longer she would have really died. I laid her head down on a lower level than her body, and immediately color returned to her lips and cheeks, and she became conscious. To the excited group of friends I said:—Always remember this fact, namely:—Fainting is caused by a want of blood in the brain; the heart ceases to act with sufficient force to send the usual amount of blood to the brain, and hence the person loses consciousness because the function of the brain ceases. Restore the blood to the brain, and instantly the person recovers. Now, though the blood is propelled to all parts of the body by the action of the heart, yet it is still under the influence of the laws of gravitation. In the erect position the blood ascends to the head against gravitation, and the supply to the brain is diminished, as compared with the recumbent position, the heart's pulsation being equal. If, then, you place a person sitting whose heart has nearly ceased to beat, his brain will fail to receive blood, while if you lay him down, with the head lower than the heart, blood will run into the brain by the mere force of gravity; and in fainting, in sufficient quantity to restore consciousness. Indeed, nature teaches us how to manage the fainting persons, for they always fall, and frequently are at once restored by the recumbent position into which they are thrown.

Dosing Infants With Drugs.

There is far too much of "physicking" practised, with good or evil intentions, at the cost of the young. Many mothers and nurses, especially the inexperienced, remarks the Lancet, seem never to feel satisfied as to the health and well-doing of their little ones unless they have them "under treatment." They are perpetually "purging" or "cooling," or "soothing" or "strengthening" the helpless victims of their solicitude. This is the more to be deprecated because the great majority of the so-called ailments with which very young children are troubled are the direct effects of bad feeding or ill-management of some sort, or are in themselves efforts of nature to get rid of the stomach-hardening or irritating masses with which children are fed or physicked. The practice of administering sedatives to infants is particularly reprehensible, and ought to be strongly denounced. There is no sedative which can be used with safety in the case of infants, except by medical men versed in the action of drugs and familiar with the indicative phenomena of health and disease. The use of cordials and drams is simply a reckless play with poisons.

If mother and nurses who mean well to those under their care could only know one half of the pain they inflict and the mischief they do under the guise of solicitous domestic doctoring, they would not readily forgive themselves. No inconsiderable proportion of the maladies of very young children are made, and therefore are needless. There are faults of a fussy endeavour to treat diseases which have no existence, and to preserve health which is only jeopardised by the measures taken to render it doubly assured.

A Snake's Philosophy.

In Senora, Mex., they have lots of snakes. Among the rest is a handsome specimen, mixed red and black, called the coral snake. It is singular that in that country everything, instead of having longitudinal stripes, as with us, has crosswise stripes or rings. The snakes are ringed, and it is said that all ringed snakes are poisonous. The doves are ringed around crosswise instead of lengthwise, and the trees are checkered around their trunks.

In one corner of the blacksnake's cage is a little hole belonging to some industrious rat. A good fat toad had crawled into this hole, and the snake darted in his head after him and speedily swallowed him. But with this incumbrance he found he could not withdraw himself. Then he at once disgorged the toad, which, finding himself free, began to move off. This was too much for snake philosophy, and the snake again swallowed him, and a second time was compelled to disgorge him, for he could not get his head out. But he reflected. He had learned something. He reached out a third time, and grabbing the toad by the leg backed out with ease.

"They Never Come Singly."

Landsmen seem to think the weird stories and what are termed the "superstitions of sailors" fit subjects for ridicule and laughter. The fact is while some of these stories and peculiar notions may be wholly fictitious yet the majority of them are undoubtedly based upon scientific facts. For instance the writer has heard the statement that "three heavy seas are invariably followed by three lighter ones" laughed at a score of time and yet surfmen know from actual experience that it is true and by taking advantage of this peculiarity of the seas have saved many lives. So the statement that one calamity is almost invariably followed by another of similiar character may be called a foolish superstition, yet it is a statement which has been corroborated in numerous instances both on the land and on the sea. The recent murders in the Town of Oyster Bay may be cited as an illustration. It may be said that one murder or suicide suggests to the vicious or weak minded a desire to duplicate it, or that atmospheric conditions which cause the wreck of one vessel are likely to wreck others.—J. Because church bells sometimes have wedding songs, it does not follow that they are married.

FASHION NOTES.

Condor brown is a very fashionable color.

New towels have elaborate Roman borders.

Shot and shell are again among the new importations.

Pink shades in gray or cafe au lait velvets are much in favor.

Belts and side-bags will appear with the new spring costumes.

Among pronounced novelties in bonnets are some with very high crowns.

Large plaids and small checks will be equally fashionable in the early spring.

Evening dresses of great taste and elegance are made of the new ecru batistes nearly covered by gold or silver figures that make sham look like cloths of gold or silver, but this stuff comes among millinery goods only.

The costliest dog-collars, generally worn by pugs, are of gold and silver set with diamonds, opals, rubies, emeralds, and other jewels, the initial letters of which spell out the name of the wearer of its fair owner.

Brilliant-hued arabesques, leaf designs, small flowers and vines, heraldic figures, and small fruits are now exhibited in new dress and cloak garnitures of plush and chenille. These are displayed on the fronts of the Louis XIV. waistcoats, the edges of the panels, cutaway jackets, deep collar and cuffs. Medium-sized buttons to correspond accompany these effective and elegant trimmings.

Serge, cashmere, and finest Australian wool dresses in pin check patterns, with stripes of colored satin alternating, will be very fashionably worn this spring on the promenade. Many of these costumes will be formed entirely of the striped material, while others will be made up in conjunction with one-colored fabrics, the polonaise or waistcoat and panels being made of the latter material.

Narrow bands of fur, despite their inappropriateness, are still used to trim both house and evening dresses. One magnificent trained robe of velvet, recently made was further enriched with sable trimmings; a tea gown of snowdrop cashmere was simply bordered down the front, around the bottom, and at the throat and waist with narrow bands of long-haired, dark brown fur, while a stylish matinee of pink Indian cashmere had its wide lace ruffles headed by wide bands of swansdown.

Among the newest imported jerseys are those which are nearly covered with an elaborately beaded embroidery, either in black or with those iridescent hues, in odd Indian designs, which give them a very Oriental appearance. One very handsome style shows a black silk stockinet jersey embroidered with small stars in brilliant cut-jet beads. A chenille drop and jet fringe finish the lower end of the bodice. Sometimes, and generally where there is no braiding or embroidery on the jersey collars, cuffs of velvet are now added to relieve the usual plain appearance. These are invariably of the same color as the jersey.

Though plain fabrics are just now less in request than plaids, pin checks, and brocaded and shot materials, the former are always popular and ladylike, and do not weary the eye as patterns must do when constantly before it. Seal brown, laurel or bottle green, telegraph or royal blue, and other self-colors look very pretty trimmed with several rows of very narrow gold or silver braid. There is a great improvement in the manufacture of this kind of trimming. Good qualities do not readily tarnish, and are guaranteed to stand the action of a salty atmosphere, which will be a thing much in its favor as a commendable garniture for seaside costumes the coming season.

Snubbing.

This is a serious business in any view that can be taken of it. And it is certainly a most disagreeable one. Those who are snubbed are generally taken off their guard, and this constitutes their main annoyance. They are given a sudden blow when they are careless and at ease in the security of social intercourse, and thus they are placed at a great disadvantage.

A snub, says one, is a check, a blank; it is a curtain suddenly drawn down; it is pulling up against a dead wall; it is cold obstruction and recoil. Either the snubber has authority on his side, and we have laid ourselves open by some inadvertence, by a misplaced trust in his condscension, and we have seen parents painfully snub their children in this sort, first allow them liberties, then atop them with a harsh check in mid-career of spirits and in the presence of strangers, or perhaps we have given way to enthusiasm and are met by ridicule. Or we have made a confidence which we think tender, and it is received with indifference. Or we tell a story, and are asked for the point of it. Or we are given to understand that we are mistaken were we have assumed ourselves well informed. Or our taste is cooly set at naught; or we talk, and are reminded that we are prosy; or we are brought face to face with our ignorance in a way to make us feel it most keenly. The strength of a snub lies in the sudden apprehension that we have committed ourselves, and a consequent painful sense of insignificance, that there is somebody quite close to us, regardless of our feelings, looking down on us, and ostentatiously unsympathizing.

Beware of snubbing any one. It makes a most painful and permanent impression. It may be done in a moment, and yet is not likely to be forgotten for years, if not for an entire lifetime.

EXCELLENT HINTS FOR THRIFTY HOUSEKEEPERS.

Cream Gems (with fruit).—Mix one pint of whole meal with cream enough to make a stiff batter. Then stir in one cup of currants or seedless raisins, well dredged with a portion of the flour; the currants should be picked, washed, and dried, before dredging. Bake in a brisk but even oven, and be careful not to scorch in finishing.

Corn Griddle cakes.—Two cups coarse oatmeal, two cups sour milk, or buttermilk, one egg, one tablespoonful Graham flour, one teaspoonful soda, dissolved in boiling water. Make a batter of the meal, milk, eggs, and flour; if it is too thick, add a little milk. Then stir in the dissolved soda, beat well, and bake immediately on a hot griddle: do not scorch the cakes.

Potato and Corn Muffins.—One cup of cold mashed potato, one cup of sweet milk, one egg, well beaten, one cup cornmeal—or enough for gem-batter. Time—Twenty to thirty minutes. Soften the potato with the milk, working out all the lumps; then stir in cornmeal till the batter is just thick enough to drop easily from the spoon; add the whipped egg, and beat hard. Drop into hot gem-pans, oiled, and bake in an even oven twenty to thirty minutes.

Crumb Griddle-cakes.—Two cups sour milk, or buttermilk, two cups stale bread-crumbs, one-half cup sifted Graham flour, one egg, well beaten, one teaspoonful soda, dissolved in boiling water. Soak the crumbs in the milk till soft; then work till smooth, and add enough flour to bind the mixture together. Stir in the beaten egg and dissolved soda, beat very hard, and bake to a good brown; the griddle should be well oiled. If prefered, use part sour cream, and leave out the egg.

Graham and Corn Muffins.—Two full cups cornmeal, one cup Graham flour, one cup sweet milk, two cups boiling water, one egg. Time—twenty minutes. Pour the boiling water into the meal, and stir well; let the mixture stand till lukewarm. Then add the cup of milk, or enough to form a batter about as stiff as will drop from the spoon, and beat well. Set this in a warm place two hours; then break in the egg, and beat hard. Sift into hot gem-pans, well oiled, and bake twenty minutes in a brisk oven.

Corn Custard.—One pint (heaping cornmeal, two teaspoonsful white flour, one quart sour milk, or buttermilk, three eggs—yolks and whites separate, two teaspoonsful soda, dissolved in boiling water. Time—twenty minutes.

See that the oven is just right; then stir together the meal, flour, milk, and beaten yolks. When these are well mixed, add the dissolved soda, and the whites cut to a stiff froth, and beat hard. Pour into two pans, well oiled, and bake immediately. The custard should not be more than an inch in thickness when done; it should bake in about twenty minutes.

Rice Griddle cakes.—One cup cold boiled rice, one cup sour milk, or buttermilk, one cup sifted Graham flour, one egg, well beaten, one teaspoonful soda, dissolved in boiling water.

Moisten the rice with the milk, and mix them well together; if there are lumps remaining mash fine with a spoon—or a fork, which is better. Stir in the Graham flour and beaten egg, forming a thin fritter batter; then the dissolved soda and beat well. Bake in small, thin cakes to a good brown; the griddle must be cleaned and well oiled. Cold snap (fine hominy) mixed in the same way, is excellent.

Bachelor's Johnny Cake.—Three cups cornmeal, one cup Graham flour, three cups new milk, one tablespoonful sugar, one teaspoonful soda, dissolved in boiling water. Time—twenty to thirty minutes.

Mix the meal, flour, and milk over night, and set the batter where it will keep moderately warm, but will not sour. In the morning add the sugar and the dissolved soda, and beat hard. Pour into two pans, well oiled, and bake for breakfast; the cakes should not be more than an inch thick when done. They will require a hot oven and twenty to thirty minutes.

Kentucky Corn Cake.—Take, say two cups of cornmeal, and half scald by stirring into it a cup of boiling water; then add cold water or cold sweet milk, to form a batter as stiff as can be stirred with a spoon; beat very thoroughly. Spread it two-thirds of an inch thick on an oiled griddle, and bake ten to fifteen minutes, or till the bottom is well browned; then remove the griddle from the top of the stove, place it in a moderate oven, on the topmost grate, and let it bake from thirty to forty minutes; longer if mixed with water. If more convenient, you can dispense with the griddle, pour the batter into a bread-pan, and bake in the oven forty to fifty minutes.

Rice and Corn Bread.—One and one-half cups cold rice, two cups sour milk, one egg, well beaten, one teaspoonful soda dissolved in boiling water, three cups coarse cornmeal—or enough to make a tolerably soft gem-batter. Time—thirty minutes.

Soften the rice with the milk, and mash all the lumps; add the beaten egg, and enough of the cornmeal to form a thin batter. Stir well; then add more meal—enough to make the batter stiff enough to mould with the hands; add also the dissolved soda, and beat hard. Form into small oval cakes, say three inches long and an inch and half in thickness, and bake in a hot oven thirty minutes.

Irish Potato Pie.—One quart of sweet milk—or part cream, one and one-half cups mashed potato, dry and mealy, one-half cup (nearly) sugar, three eggs, yolks and whites separate, juice of one lemon.

Mix the potato well with the milk, and put through a colander, to remove lumps. Then beat the yolks, lemon, and sugar together, and stir them in; add the whites cut to a stiff froth, and stir well. Line three pie pans with a good cream paste mixed stiff. Fill with the batter, and bake in an even oven till the pies are done; see that the crust is well browned. Serve cold the same day.

"All the Garden" Soup.—Six quarts cold water, four potatoes, medium size, four tomatoes, medium size, two onions, medium size, two tablespoonsful chopped parsley, two stalks celery, if you have it; one cup green peas, shelled—if you have them; one cup chopped cabbage; one small parsnip; ten-cent soup-bone. Time—three hours and a half.

Crack the soup-bone without completely crushing it, cover with the cold water, and when it comes to a boil, skim. Then prepare the vegetables, slicing and chopping all—save the peas—till they are fine; and as soon as the meat is skimmed add them (except the peas and parsley), and stew moderately two hours and a half. Then strain the soup through a coarse colander, and skim off any fat that rises; return it to the kettle, put in the cup of green peas, and parsley, finely chopped, ten minutes before finishing.

Later in the season, substitute for green peas either a pint of canned ones, or a cup of shelled beans fresh from the garden; put the beans into the pot with the potatoes, turnips, and other vegetables. If canned peas are used, add them half an hour before the soup is done.

Breakfast. (spring or summer).—Sunday.—Ripe fruits, as apples, peaches grapes. Hard Graham rolls; Graham loaf bread, or dry toast. Cornmeal, or farina mush. Baked potatoes, peeled or unpeeled. Stewed sweet currants or canned pears. Compromise.—Soft boiled eggs.

Monday.—Ripe fruit. Hard Graham rolls; cream biscuits. Oatmeal mush. Boiled or mashed potatoes. Stewed or canned apples, or stewed dried apples.

Tuesday.—Hard Graham rolls; mush biscuits, or mush rolls. Graham or oatmeal mush. Browned potatoes. Strawberries or raspberries; these ripe, stewed, or canned.

Compromise—Eggs and toast.

Wednesday.—Ripe fruit. Hard Graham rolls; leavened Graham bread. Oatmeal or farina mush. Mashed or baked potatoes. Stewed dried peaches (peeled), baked apples, or canned plums.

Thursday.—Ripe fruit. Hard Graham rolls; currant gems, or dry toast. Oatmeal mush, or steamed rice. Boiled or baked potatoes. Stewed apples, canned peaches or stewed cherries.

Friday.—Ripe fruit. Hard Graham rolls; leavened Graham break; Graham or oatmeal mush. Browned or mashed potatoes. Raspberries and currants (mixed); these stewed or canned—or blackberries or cherries, stewed or canned.

Saturday.—Hard Graham rolls; corn gems, or hot-water rolls. Oatmeal mush. Boiled or baked potatoes. Stewed or canned plums, strawberries, or baked apples.

Compromise.—Green corn, griddle-cakes, or milk toast.

The Greatest of All.

Mercy, how the fellows ate, how peremptory they were in order, how eager in contemplation, how earnest in cutting up, how vigorous in putting down. They hurried through the operation as though they were having a tooth pulled, and the quicker it was over the better. I was particularly struck by one man who finished a pork pie, a cup of custard, some cold coffee, and fifteen or twenty pieces of cheese in less time, I was going to say, than it takes me to tell it, who asked, while the tumbler was still resting in his mouth and the milk was gurgling down his throat "Check, please," and, snatching out the other hand for the ticket as he moved away, pressing his fingers into his side-pocket for change with which to pay. No wonder liver-pills are sold by the billions, no wonder stomachic regulators of various sorts and kinds find quick and ready sale, no wonder doctors retire rich, no wonder, indeed, that our graveyards grow and our cemeteries extend their boundaries year by year. It apparently makes no difference what time of year it is, the icy breath of winter, the sweltering of dog-day August, the lassitude-breeding fogs of spring, and the pleasant atmosphere of autumn, each in its way inspires appetite and drives the human race pell-mell into the modern restaurant. New York is a great place for restaurants. We have them from the humble doughnut-stand on the sidewalk, or, for that matter, a lower grade still, a hot corn man who sells his fragrant cobs from the curb of the pavement, through many, many styles and ranks until we reach those gilded palaces where luxury is the normal condition and extravagance the customary rule. The great physical sin today is against the human stomach. Sins against the ten commandments, we are told, can be forgiven, sins against human laws can be expiated, sins against individuals may be condoned, but sins against the stomach remain uncanceled and unforgiven. A disordered stomach breeds disease of every sort and kind; it unmans the nerves, it unbalances the brain; it dims the eye, it paralyzes the ear, and makes life so wretched that the conundrum of ten arises: "Is it worth while to go through so much to gain so little in the end?"

Everybody has his nostrum. All the way from hot-water baths inside to red flannel bandages outside there can be found doctors, nurses, patent-medicine men, old women, to prescribe this, that and the other. I pity the man whose stomach is out of order. John Gilbert, whose stomach is a long one, looks as though he had never been troubled. I envy such as he. I envy Gen. Grant, who smokes from morning until night, and drinks from night to morning. I envy Ben Butler, whose stomach capacity is simply eminent. People talk about Beecher and Beecher's brain, but what gave him one or the other? Without doubt Beecher's stomach. Next time you see him on the platform, in the pulpit, or bowling down the street like a tremendous lightning express under full headway, take him in. Look at his magnificent head thickly thatched with whitening hair, see his furrowless forehead, mark the keen glitter of his full blue eye, see the ruddy hot glow rushing through his rosy cheeks, mark the leonine aspect of his entirety. What is it? Brain, muscle, nerve, disposition? Nonsense, it's stomach!

Scientists now assert that the earth was peopled fifty million years before Adam located the garden of Eden as a tree claim. However, they can advance no clinching argument in support of the claim. Fashion-plates cannot be traced beyond the period when Adam and Eve were the leaders of their set in society.

Ned Clopper's Little Game,

OF LOVE AND LUCK.

BY C. M. FARMER.

IN TWO PARTS—PART I.

Ned Clopper was only twenty-one, but he was in love. It was no doubt foolish in Ned, seeing he was only a country swain born and bred on a farm—his only playmates in childhood and youth being the pigs and goats—his only education the hebdominal tuition of an itinerant pedagogue who imparted to his young mind a limited instalment of questionable knowledge every Saturday morning in consideration of a good supper and bed on Saturday night and a good breakfast on Sunday morning. Beyond these delectations and an occasional half holiday for angling in a neighboring mill pond when that gentle pastime was in season, Ned knew no change from youth to early manhood, save a gradual increase in appetite and a tendency in later years to cultivate and encourage a sandy mustache and goatee; and when surveying these hirsute appendages in his four by six inch mirror one fair morning, on getting out of bed, he suddenly bethought him that he was in love. He had not seriously considered the subject before because there was only one young lady in the neighborhood (except his mother's Irish cook) and although he had seen her (not the cook) many a time in early morning gathering flowers in her father's garden as he passed by on his way to the hay field, and had admired the dainty brown curls and the little coquettish summer hat that crowned them, the delicate round wrist and the white cambric apron embracing it, the rosy cheeks and coral lips, far outblooming the flowers and buds she held in her soft little hands, and most of all the bright eyes and sunny smiles with which she bade him good morning—he had no suspicion until now what a bewitching spell had been at work all the time through those silent influences for the overthrow of his happiness. But now he all at once realized the fact that the dainty brown curls, and coquettish summer hat, and white cambric apron, the rosy cheeks and coral lips, the bright eyes and sunny smiles of Angelica Bruce had been so many barbed arrows from the quiver of the mischievous little fat legged urchin which had, one and all, pierced him through and through, and that he loved Angelica to distraction.

"Why, what a soft-headed chap I am!" he said to himself, as he gently and gingerly smoothed his little sandy mustache with his finger and thumb. "Here I am, a man grown—never been five miles from this blessed old cabbage patch in my life—know nothing of life beyond the barn yard and pig pen—never read any books worth reading but Gil Blas and Robinson Crusoe (and these I've had to keep hidden from the old folks ever since old Plegitt gave them to me, and to read them by candle light)—never kissed a girl—never drank a glass of whisky nor mug of beer—never had more than a dollar at one time since I was born—in short never did anything fit for me since I first came into the world. I'm not going to stand this, you know—I guess not—not if I know myself! My mind's made up. I'll do it or burst!"

This sounded like a bloody threat. It might mean suicide, or going into the army, or taking summary vengeance on those under whose control he had so long been kept down and, as it were, squelched. But he contemplated none of these rash but meritorious measures. His heart was passionate but pacific, and he neither meditated bloodshed nor bluster.

His resolve being taken he put on his best clothes and calfskin boots, although it was the middle of the week, and with his new straw hat in one hand and a little red cane in the other, answered the call of his mother and went down to breakfast.

"Why, what'n the name o' sense! What's the matter with the boy?" exclaimed Clopper senior, laying down his knife and fork and staring at his son and heir, while Mrs. C. raised her hands and eyes piously to the ceiling, as Ned laid aside his hat and cane and dropped into his alloted chair at the breakfast table, full of blushes and confusion. "Edward, my son," continued the old gentleman, "what are you up to—dressed up in your store clothes? This ain't Sunday, my boy, nor the Fourth o' July neither, and don't you know Jim Slade and Peter Raynor's a coming to-day to help git in the hay?"

"The hay be blowed!" remarked Ned. "I've got something to attend to besides the hay," and he emphasized the last word with supreme contempt.

"But Ned my dear—" his mother, began.

"Hold on," said the young gentleman impatiently, "I've got a little particular business on hand this morning up at the squire's. I'll finish it up in an hour or two and get back in time to go ahead with the hay."

"Business with the squire," gasped the father, "oh lord!"

"It's more business with his daughter Angelica," replied Ned, very red in the face, but it may lead to business with the old game cock too. I'm going to—to—ask Angelina to be my wife. There. That's what's the matter."

Ned said this slowly and with an air of confidence, as if he were some fendal lord who had made up his mind to espouse some vassal's fair daughter, and only need to announce his gracious intention to have her gratefully placed in his arms by her plebeian sire.

His parents were too much astonished at this presumptuous speech to utter a word in reply. They could only look at the youngster with eyes and mouth wide open. Taking advantage of their helpless state, Ned hastily swallowed his cup of coffee, and leaving his plate untouched, bolted from the house.

As Ned slowly approached the little flower garden where he naturally expected to see the fair object of his devotion engaged in her usual playful pastime of gathering her morning bouquet, he felt a warm streak of bashful timidity tingling through his nerves and began to fear he was about to put his foot in it, as the saying is. He had never made love to a girl, and wondering how he ought to begin. Should he walk boldly up, take the little hand in his and say, "Angelica, my darling, I'm desperately in love with you, and shall die at sunset this evening if you don't at once consent to be my wife?" Or should he drop on one knee and with outstretched hands, in the posture of a ball catcher, exclaim, "Oh, Angelica, my first and only love, look down in pity on your captive slave and bid him rise your accepted husband, or a pistol bullet shall penetrate his brain ere the shades of evening fall upon the landscape?" Here his mental rhapsody was suddenly put to flight by a sight that staggered him and caused a cold chill to run all the way down his spine. Emerging from the house, and attended to the gate by the squire and his daughter, came a gay young swell of the latest metropolitan breed and dressed regardless of hard times and high tariffs, who mounted the squire's favorite thorough bred cob, touched his hat to the squire, kissed his gloved fingers to Angelica and cantered away towards the railway station.

Ned suddenly thought he'd go home, take off his clothes and resume his labors in the hay field. Then he thought he wouldn't. His first impulse was to turn and run away without any definite thought of where he should run to; but the next moment his new-born passion got the better of this rash proceeding, and he boldly advanced to the gate which though a frail and delicate wooden wicket, seemed to him a grim iron barrier that shut him out from his fair idol. Recognizing him at once the charming little Angelica came forward to greet him (she was more beautiful than ever), while the squire, with a slight nod, returned to the house.

"Miss Angy," stammered Ned, as he took the small white hand she extended, "I've come over early to settle a little business with you before the boys come to cart in the hay. I hope you are pretty well this morning. You look lovely, I'm nearly crazy with—never mind that—who was that chap who rode off? I hope he don't know you—at least I hope you don't know him—that is there's nothing serious between—as I was saying—I mean as I was passing by I thought I'd just call and ask how the squire is, But upon my word you are looking more beautiful than—"

"Why good gracious me, Mr. Clopper!" exclaimed the young lady, "how funny you do talk! What sort of business did you want to see me about? I don't know anything about business. You'd better go in and see papa. Oh look now—you've crushed my pretty flowers all to pieces." Ned had grasped the little bouquet she held lightly in her disengaged hand, and convulsively thrust it inside his white duck waistcoat.

"Excuse haste," said Ned, "I don't exactly remember what I was going to say—but the amount of it is that I've come over to make you an offer of marriage. There now, hang it, you understand me. I'm dead in love with you, and can't live four and twenty hours unless you say yes."

"My stars!" cried Angelica, jerking away her hand which Ned had grasped in the frenzy of his declaration. "You must be crazy. I'll run in and get papa to come and—"

"No—no," gasped Ned. "Hold on—nothing's the matter with me, but who was that that chap that just—"

"It was Mr. Van Dyke Nostrand, of New York, a very rich young man; one of the oldest families. We met him last summer at Saratoga. He's immensely rich and handsome, and papa says we are going to be married. I'm engaged to him, you know, and I don't mind—I rather like the idea in fact. Won't it be splendid to live in the city in winter and have balls and parties and go to the theatres and opera and all that sort of thing? And he's so rich and so handsome and owns, he says, a castle on Murray Hill, beside a cottage at Long Branch and a steam yacht and ever so many fine things. Ain't it nice?"

"Goodbye, Angy—Angelica—I mean Miss Bruce," said poor Ned (not taking her hand this time) "I must be getting back. I think we shall have a fine day for haying. No, thank you—I wouldn't choose any," he added, resisting a tiny rosebud almost as dewy and lovely as her own lips, which she offered him, as if a rosebud—a bushel of rosebuds and full blown roses, not to speak of peonies and hollyhocks, could compensate for the cruel stab beneath his white waistcoat which she had inflicted through the false and malignant Van Dyke Nostrand of fashionable Murray Hill, whom may the fates confound.

(TO BE CONCLUDED IN OUR NEXT.)

People who Live on the Railroads.

There is a distinct railroad population that is constantly growing. It is composed of commercial travellers, lecturers, show agents, actors and actresses. They eat more meals in hotel cars and railroad meal stations than they do at home or in hotels. They spend more nights in sleeping-car bunks than in beds. To a parson who travels only occasionally it is interesting to note how thoroughly equipped these professional journeyers are. Upon entering the sleeping-car early in the evening, for instance, they remove their shoes and put on slippers, hang their hat up and don silk travelling caps, take off their coats and put on short sack coats or smoking jackets.

In the morning, when the occasional traveller, obliged to wear the only clothing he has brought, goes to the toilet compartment in his coat and vest, and thus struggles in an effort to cleanse his skin without soaping his sleeves or his coat coller, these professionals again excite his envy. They hang up their smoking jackets and display snowy white robes, ornamented with colored binding and braid, and capable of being thrown open at the neck and rolled up above the elbows. From a pocket in the suspended jacket one produces an ivory-backed brush and costly comb, a tooth-brush and perhaps a nickle-plated soap-box. Another opens out a prettily embroidered receptacle, composed of many folds, each one a pocket and each one labelled. In these pockets are a comb, a brush, a tooth-brush, shaving-brush, soap box, pair of rasor cases, nail-brush, whisk broom, hand glass and cologne bottle.

Their familiarity with their surroundings is as noticeable a part of their equipment. A glance out of the car window is almost certain to reveal to them their whereabouts when they arise or when they are waked up, or are about to go to bed. They carry their time-table, and give good advice as to which station has the best caterer. They are sociable and democratic.

To all mankind death is but a question of time; with womankind the length of life is often merely a question of veracity.

THE RAILROAD TATTLER.

A Scranton despatch in the New York Times says: A mechanical contrivance, invented by a Methodist minister, and now in use on the railroads centering in this city, for the purpose of checking the manner in which freight trains are run by the employes, has recently attracted a good deal of attention, and been vigorously denounced by railroad men. The claim is made by the employers that some such thing was necessary to prevent the deceptions practiced upon the companies by the crews running freight and coal trains faster than schedule time to make up for the unnecessary delays at the various stations. The officials allege that no matter how faithfully a conductor and engineer may promise not to run faster than fifteen miles an hour, there are times when they will disregard all obligations and run as fast as thirty miles an hour to make up time squandered with their cronies at some of the stations along the line. The invention already alluded to makes it impossible for railroad men to practice any such deception. It is a simple piece of mechanism constructed much on the principle of the "tape" that checks off the condition of the stock market. It is wound up like a clock, locked within a box, and placed in the caboose, where it is geared to the axle of the car. On a large sheet of stiff paper, marked into small squares, a pencil or tracer keeps moving with the train and records the revolutions of the axle, the delay made at any given point, the number of jolts and jars sustained on the trip, and where they occurred, together, with other facts going to make an accurate record of the journey. The record is laid before the superintendent, who sees at a glance how any particular train was run, and acts accordingly. It is claimed on the part of the companies that the irregularity of running coal and freight trains and the "soldering" of the men at the stations, as well as their method of making up for lost time, have in the past been prolific of many serious accidents, resulting in much loss to railroad property in wreckage, as well as in wear and tear. With the "tattling machine" at work in the caboose, recording every throb of the locomotive with the precision of a shorthand reporter, this will be impossible. But "the tattler" is not liked by railroad men. They consider it not only a nuisance, but a blunt warning on the part of the companies that their men are untrustworthy and cannot be relied upon.

PEARLS OF TRUTH.

Whatever our plans alloted to us by providence, that for us is the post of duty. God estimates us not by the position we are in, but by the way in which we fill it.

"In their afflictions He was afflicted, and the angel of His presence saved them." It is between Christ and his Church as between two lute strings—no sooner one is struck but the other trembles.

Work and play are the universal ordinance of God for the living races, in which they symbolize the fortune and interpret the brand of man. No creature lives that must not work and may not play.

The speech of the tongue is best known to men; God best understands the heart. I had rather speak three words in a speech that God knows, than pray three hours in a language that he understands not.

Confidence and fear are almost one thing rather than two when we speak of God. He that fears most trusts most. To none is death so little of a change as to those whose life has been one long confidence in God.

Christian faith is a grand cathedral with divinely pictured windows. Standing without, you see no glory, nor can possibly imagine any; standing within, every ray of light reveals a harmony of unspeakable splendor.

Our best friend is our Father's house on high. Our hearts and our treasures are there. Why should we not "look up and lift our heads" toward the land where we shall "see the King in his beauty," and meet the dear ones who are waiting our coming?

In self-examination, take no account of yourself by your thoughts and resolutions in the days of religion and solemnity; but examine how it is with you in the days of ordinary conversation, and in the circumstances of secular employment.

God is love; and, toward the fuller possession and fruition of this life there is but the straight road—devotion. Other things are good and useful; one is vital—heart communion with God. We may well fear that not only the world, but the church also, is growing too busy to pray.

The crown is in the distance, but the glory is already begun. The immortality which outflows from Christ is consummated at the day of Resurrection; but it starts from that threshold over which the ransomed soul passes into the radiant joys and blissful expectancies of Paradise.

God makes crosses of great variety; He makes some of iron and lead, that look as if they must crush; some of straw, that seem so light, and yet are no less difficult to carry; some He makes of gold and precious stones, that dazzle the eye, and excite the envy of spectators, but in reality are as well able to crucify as those which are so much dreaded.

Sleeping Together.

Somebody has said that more quarrels occur between brothers, between sisters, between hired girls, between clerks in stores, between apprentices in mechanics' shops, between hired men, between husbands and wives, owing to electrical changes which their nervous systems undergo by lodging together night after night under the same bedclothes, than by any other disturbing cause. There is nothing that will so derange the nervous system of a person who is eliminative in nervous force than to lie all night in bed with another person who is absorbent in nervous force. The absorber will go to sleep and rest all night; while the eliminator will be tumbling and tossing, restless and nervous, and wake up in the morning fretful, peevish, fault-finding, and discouraged. No two persons, no matter who they are, should habitually sleep together. One will thrive and the other will lose.

The wages of sin is death. It is strange that sin does not strike for higher wages.

A MODERN RESURRECTION.

A Miracle that Took Place in our Midst Unknown to the Public—The Details in Full.

(Detroit Free Press.)

One of the most remarkable occurrences ever given to the public, which took place here in our midst, has just come to our knowledge and will undoubtedly awaken as much surprise and attract as great attention as it has already in newspaper circles. The facts are, briefly, as follows: Mr. William A. Crombie, a young man formerly residing at Birmingham, a suburb of Detroit, and now living at 287 Michigan Avenue in this city, can truthfully say that he has looked into the future world and yet returned to this. A representative of this paper has interviewed him upon this important subject and his experiences are given to the public for the first time. He said:

"I had been having most peculiar sensations for a long while. My head felt dull and heavy; my eyesight did not seem so clear as formerly; my appetite was uncertain and I was unaccountably tired. It was an effort to rise in the morning and yet I could not sleep at night. My mouth tasted badly, I had a faint all-gone sensation in the pit of my stomach that food did not satisfy, while my hands and feet felt cold and clammy. I was nervous and irritable, and lost all enthusiasm. At times my head would seem to whirl and my heart palpitated terribly. I had no energy, no ambition, and I seemed indifferent of the present and thoughtless for the future. I tried to shake the feeling off and persuade myself it was simply a cold or a little malaria. But it would not go. I was determined not to give up, and so time passed along and all the while I was getting worse. It was about this time that I noticed I had begun to bloat fearfully. My limbs were swollen so that by pressing my fingers upon them deep depressions would be made. My face also began to enlarge, and continued to until I could scarcely see out of my eyes. One of my friends, describing my appearance at that time, said: "It is an animated something, but I should like to know what." In this condition I passed several weeks of the greatest agony.

"Finally, one Saturday night, the misery culminated. Nature could endure no more. I became irrational and apparently insensible. Cold sweat gathered on my forehead: my eyes became glazed and my throat rattled. I seemed to be in another sphere and with other surroundings. I knew nothing of what occurred around me, although I have since learned it was considered as death by those who stood by. It was to me a quiet state, and yet one of great agony. I was helpless, hopeless and pain was my only companion. I remember trying to see what was beyond me, but the mist before my eyes was too great. I tried to reason, but I had lost all power. I felt that it was death and realized how terrible it was. At last the strain upon my mind gave way and all was a blank. How long this continued I do not know, but at last I realized the presence of friends and recognized my mother. I then thought it was earth, but was not certain. I gradually regained consciousness, however, and the pain lessened. I found that my friends had, during my unconsciousness, been giving me a preparation I had never taken before, and the next day, under the influence of this treatment, the bloating began to disappear, and from that time on I steadily improved, until to-day I am as well as ever before in my life, have no traces of the terrible acute Bright's disease, which so nearly killed me, and all through the wonderful instrumentality of Warner's Safe Cure the remedy that brought me to life after I was virtually in another world."

"You have had an unusual experience, Mr. Crombie," said the writer who had been breathlessly listening to the recital,

"Yes I think I have," was the reply, "and it has been a valuable lesson to me. I am certain, though, there are thousands of men and women at this very moment who have the same ailment which came so near killing me, and they do not know it. I believe kidney disease is the most deceptive trouble in the world. It comes like a thief in the night. It has no certain symptoms, but seems to attack each one differently. It is quiet, treacherous, and all the more dangerous. It is killing more people, to-day, than any one other complaint. If I had the power I would warn the entire world against it and urge them to remove it from the system before it is too late."

One of the members of the firm of Whitehead & Mitchell, proprietors of the Birmingham Eccentric, paid a fraternal visit to this office yesterday, and in the course of conversation, Mr. Crombie's name was mentioned.

"I knew about his sickness," said the editor, "and his remarkable recovery. I had his obituary all in type and announced in the Eccentric that he could not live until its next issue. It was certainly a most remarkable case."

Rev. A. R. Bartlett, formerly pastor of the M. E Church, at Birmingham, and now of schoolcraft, Mich., in response to a telegram, replied:

"Mr. W. A. Crombie, was a member of my congregation at the time of his sickness. The prayers of the church were requested for him on two different occasions. I was with him the day he was reported by his physician as dying, and consider his recovery almost a miracle."

Not one person in a million ever comes so near death as did Mr. Crombie and then recover, but the men and women who are drifting toward the same end, are legion. To note the slightest symptoms, to realize their significance and to meet them in time by the remedy which has been shown to be most efficient, is a duty from which there can be no escape. They are fortunate who do this; they are on the sure road to death who neglect it.

WARNER'S SAFE CURE

FOR THE Kidneys, Liver, and Urinary Organs.

THE BEST BLOOD PURIFIER.

There is only one way by which any disease can be cured, and that is by removing the cause—wherever it may be. The great medical authorities of the day declare that nearly every disease is caused by deranged kidneys or liver. To restore these, therefore, is the only way by which health can be secured. Here is where WARNER'S SAFE CURE has achieved its great reputation. It acts directly upon the kidneys and liver, and by placing them in a healthy condition drives disease and pain from the system. For all Kidney, Liver, and Urinary troubles; for the distressing disorders of women; for Malaria, and physical troubles generally, this great remedy has no equal. Beware of impostors, imitations and concoctions said to be just as good.

While Mr. John Cameron, warden of the county, was working in his barnyard the other day a rifle bullet whistled past him and lodged in a straw stack a few feet from him. He feared at first that his elevation to the wardenship had placed him in the same class with those great parsonages who are now-a-days considered fit objects for assassination, and was on the point of raeing his position, when it turned out that a few young men were practising at a distance with a rifle, and that the bullet had strayed from that direction. Young men should be careful in practising that there is nobody in or near their range. Chatsworth cor., in O. S. Advertiser.

Poetry.

Boil it Down.

Yes, let us boil it down, my boys,
For that's the proper way
To deal with long winded bores,
And make the paper pay.

Who wants to wade through columns long
Of stale and senseless stuff?
So give the bright, the witty points,
The facts—and that's enough?
Boil it down.

To My Sister, Lately Married.

(By Special Request.)

Let not my sister, though a wife,
Bid all her fears adieu,
Comforts there are in married life,
But there are crosses too.

I do not wish to mar your mirth,
With an ungrateful sound:
But yet remember, bliss on earth,
No mortal ever found.

Your prospects and your hopes are great,
May God your hope fulfil;
But you will find in every state
Some difficulties still.

The rites which lately joined your hands,
Cannot ensure content:
Religion forms the strongest bands,
And Love the best cement.

A friendship founded on esteem,
Life's battering blast endures.
It will not vanish as a dream,
And which I hope is yours.

But yet God's blessing daily crave,
Nor trust your youthful heart;
You must divine assistance have,
To act a prudent part.

Though you have left a parent's wing,
No longer ask its care;
It is but seldom husbands bring
A lighter yoke to wear.

They have their humors and their faults,
Se mutable is man;
Excuse his failings in your thoughts,
And hide them if you can.

No anger or resentment keep,
Whatever is amiss,
Be reconciled before you sleep,
And seal it with a kiss.

Should he see cause to reprehend,
Bear it with mild address,
Remember he's thy dearest friend,
And love him ne'er the less.

It's not the way to scold at large,
To clamor, rage and boast,
For wives their duty best discharge,
Who condescend the most,

Mutual attempts to serve and please
Each other will endear,
Thus you may spend your life with ease,
Nor discord interferes.

Thus give your tender passions scope,
Yet better things pursue,
Be Heaven the object of your hope,
And lead him thither too.

Since you must both resign your breath,
And only God knows when;
So live that you may part at death,
To meet with joy again.

And may the Lord your ways approve,
And grant you both a share
Of his redeeming, saving love,
And providential care.

The Races.—First Day.

The winter meeting of the Owen Sound Turf Association took place on the bay on Wednesday, and owing to the large amount of money offered a large number of good horses and enthusiastic sportsment were attracted to the town. The day was very cold and it snowed almost incessantly during the whole afternoon, while the races were in progress. but notwithstanding these drawbacks the large crowd gathered on the ice, remained till the close and appeared to thoroughly enjoy the sport. Owing to the great number of entries, and the difficulty the Judges labored under in seeing the races from start to finish, considerable dissatisfaction was expressed at some of the decisions, but on the whole, as far as we could see. they were wholly impartial and could not have been better. The races which took place on Wednesday were as follows:

FIRST RACE—2:40 TROT.

FIRST HEAT.—Pirate 1st, J. K Leslie 2nd, Butcher Boy 3rd.

SECOND HEAT.—Goldfinder 1st, Butcher Boy 2nd, Minnie Collins 3rd.

THIRD HEAT.—Pirate 1st, Butcher Boy 2nd, J. K. Leslie 3rd.

The Town Trot was the second race—6 entries, as follows:—Telephone, Maud S., Peggy, Lucy, Happy Jim, and Billy.

SECOND HEAT.—Peggy and Lucy made a dead heat, Maud S. 3rd.

THIRD HEAT.—Lucy 1st, Peggy 2nd, Maud S. 3rd.

The winners were Peggy 1st, $25; Lucy 2nd, $15; Maud S. 3rd, $10—purse $50.

The third event was the colt race, for which there were eight entries:—Grey Johnny, Conn, Black Maud, Black Bess, Little Fred, Young Valentine, Geo. L., St. George. Owing to the lateness of the hour only two heats of this race were decided, the rest being trotted to-day too late for our report this week.

COLT TROT.

The meeting has been a complete success, and we hope to see any races ever held here conducted on the square as it was quite evident those held today were. Messrs. M. Forhan, Owen Sound, C. Kenney, Paisley, and J. Tuck, Chatsworth, acted as Judges.—O. S. Advertiser.

The Princess Alice.

The life of the Princess Alice has just been published in Germany, with copious extracts from her own letters and those written by her mother to her. This princess, like the other daughters of Queen Victoria, had a strong intellect and much deep womanly feeling. The fact is now made public, for the first time, that for years her religious faith was clouded, she having fallen under the influence of Dr. Strauss, who was her personal friend.

She openly avowed her doubts of the existence of a God, and her determination to "seek truth through philosophy and through the intellect alone." She invited the most profound metaphysicians in Germany to her court, read the works of the most learned free-thinkers, but found no secure standing-ground. Soon after this time, her little son died, and a German friend who knew her intimately states that "she did now no longer speak as she had done. She confessed to me that she was changed, and I could not hear her story without tears." It was the death of her child which had changed her, and the homely counsels of a poor Scotch artist who gave her drawing lessons.

"The whole grand edifice of philosophical reasoning which I had erected dwindled to nothing at the touch of death," she said. "What would become of us in this life if we have not the belief that there is a God who rules over each of us? I weary for prayer; I love to sing hymns with my children."

This princess was devoted to her children, educating them herself in many branches of knowledge; and the letters now published, which passed between her mother and herself, are the simple, earnest utterances of two wise, good women, consulting together as to the best way to rear little children to be Christians, manly men and useful women.

In the Princess Alice's case, too, "the emphasis of death made manifest the eloquence of action in her life" to a singular degree. One of her children was dying of diphtheria, and the mother refused to give up her post at its bedside. The child, with its last breath, held out its arms, moanig, "Kiss me, mamma." The physicians interfered, knowing that the kiss would probably be fatal, but the mother could not resist the call. She kissed the child, and drew in death with that last breath.

Such books as this memoir will do good, not by increasing the silly awe with which many ignorant people regard royal personages, but by showing how precisely the same pains and passions, the same doubts and hopes, rack their hearts as are suffered by the poorest. The history of this princess, loving her children with passionate ardor, giving her life for them, doubting God in her days of happiness, and seeking Him with repentance and tears at the side of her dead baby, is that of many a poor woman whose life will always be humble and obscure.

Whether we wear rags or royal purple, we travel the same road after all, to the same gate and single beacon at the end.

The C. P. R.

SUMMER ROUTE.

(Montreal Star.)

Mr. Harder, Assistant Traffic Manager of the Canadian Pacific railway, during his visit to this city perfected some important tariff rates and running arrangements for the ensuing immigration season. The company's steamers, which originally were intended to run from Algoma Mills to Thunder Bay, will start from Owen Sound. This is rendered necessary by the fact that the Wilson Channel, at the entrance to the harbor of Algoma Mills, is rendered extremely dangerous to such large steamers as the Algoma, Arthabaska and Alberta, owing to the presence of several submerged reefs which will require to be removed by the Government before this route can be utilized. The new route will therefore be, until such time as the Wilson channel is made perfectly navigable, from Owen Sound to Port Arthur. The run will be accomplished in something like forty hours, so that the time between Montreal and Winnipeg will be equal, if not less, than an all rail route. As regards the question of rates, Mr. Harder states that passenger rates on European business will be £2 sterling from Quebec to Winnipeg, and he believes arrangements are being consummated with the large shipping lines to reduce the rates, so that immigrants from Liverpool to Winnipeg will be carried for $25.

The company is at present constructing twenty really elegant sleeping-cars for immigrants, so that settlers coming into the country will have comforts never before enjoyed. The Ontario and Quebec railway will be completed in about two months from Perth to Toronto, where connection is made with the Toronto, Grey and Bruce, so that whether main line is completed or not, a perfectly independent line will be operated by the Canadian Pacific railway from Montreal to the summit of the Rocky mountains. Speaking of the outcome of this new route, Mr. Harder says it will result in reducing freight rates from Montreal to Winnipeg from $300 to $100 a carload, and will also open up a large carrying trade from Montana and and other western States. He anticipates a large influx of immigrants during the spring, and says that already a number of Crofters are booked for Manitoba and the North-West.

What he Mastered.

"How did you get a start in life?" asked a youth of a billionaire.

"I worked at odd jobs till I found something better."

"You thoroughly mastered some trade, business, or profession, in the course of time, I presume, to accumulate such wealth?"

"No," was the reply. "I was in business, but knew no more about it than thousands of others. I owe my success to my mastery, not of a trade, business, or profession, but an art."

"An art?"

CHAPTER XVII.—CONTINUED.

When we landed at the boat-house, the church clock was just chiming the half-hour past one. The lateness of the hour shocked me.

"Never mind," said he. "They are sure not to have gone to bed yet. I'll take you in by a side-door I know, and you shall slip into the library and open a big book before you. And I'll bring in Cole and one or two others, and say we didn't know what had become of you; and you can pretend to have fallen asleep over a book."

"But why should I do all that?" said I. "I haven't done anything to be ashamed of. You said Lady Mills would not mind."

"No, of course not, my dear child; I'll tell Lady Mills all about it. Don't trouble your head about that. She won't say a word to you, and you need not say a word to her. But none of the other ladies could have done a thing so unusual as you have in your innocence—and—and Sir Jonas would scold you for your rashness, and say you might have taken cold."

"But it wouldn't look innocent to pretend I had never been out at all, Mr. Carruthers. And I wasn't alone; I was with you—so I was all right. I dare say Lady Mills has not gone to bed yet. I'll go and see."

And I ran away before he could prevent me, and found Lady Mills and Mrs. Clowes in the drawing-room, the former looking anxious and grave, the latter hard and angry.

"My dear child, where have you been?" We thought you were lost!" Her voice trembled.

"Oh, Lady Mills, I am so sorry! I went on the water with Mr. Carruthers. He said you would not mind: but I ought to have known better when it was so late."

"The later the better, my dear, I should say," said Mrs. Clowes, in her most cutting tone.

But Lady Mill's face was lightening as she looked at me.

"Don't you know, my dear, that Mr. Carruthers is one of the most dangerous men——"

Then she stopped, for Mr. Carruthers had come into the room; and turning from me to him, she said, in such a stern voice that it made me tremble—

And he answered very gravely—

"Perhaps; but that doesn't matter. But this inquisition is out of place, Stephana, for it is easy to see that to that child night and day are all the same; and, if I had been my respected father in iniquity himself, she would have been none the worse for my society. It was very sensible of you to come to Lady Mills, child," he said to me very kindly.

And he shook hands with me, and Lady Mills kissed me, and Mrs. Clowes gave me a cold little bow; and they sent me off to bed without knowing even then the enormity of the breach of propriety I had committed.

Sir Jonas, who was going up to town the next morning, was to drive me to the Alders, and then go on to Beaconsburg station. Every one—nearly every one, for Mrs. Clowes, never came near me at all—bade me a very kind good-bye; and just as I was sitting in the phaeton waiting for Sir Jonas to take his place beside me, Gordon, Mr. Carruther's mysterious servant, came up to me in his stolidly respectful manner, and said—

"I think this is something of yours, ma'am. You must have dropped it, for I found it on the stairs, and I am afraid it has been slightly injured." And he put my pendant into my hands.

I was so much astonished that he was gone before I could even thank him; and then, turning it over in my hands, I found the little shield on which the initials were engraved had been wrenched off.

Was Gordon himself the thief, and had he repented? Or had the person who took it been ashamed to restore it in person? Or had I really dropped it, and only dreamt that I put it away?

CHAPTER XVIII.

When Sir Jonas left me at the gate of the Alders that morning, a sense of desolation crept over me as I walked down the drive, followed by the gaunt Sarah carrying my little trunk—like a gaoler rejoicing over a recaptured prisoner, I thought ungratefully to myself as I came in sight of the dark red ivy-covered walls of this house on the marsh, which, though I had lived in it two months, still had mysteries for me.

All the questions which had puzzled me about this household came into my mind again with new force after my short absence, which seemed, with its fresh experiences, to have lasted so long, together with others which had arisen while I listened to the talk of my new friends. Was Mrs. Rayner really mad? If so, how was it that no suspicion of the fact had reached that gossip-loving company I had just left, who had tales to tell of almost every family in the neighborhood? Why had the ladies called kind Mr. Rayner, who always went to church and led the simplest of lives, "dreadfully wicked?" They did not think it wrong to play the violin or to go to races. And why, if they thought him "dreadfully wicked," did they all say they would give the world to know him? What was the relation between Mr. Rayner and Gordon, Mr. Carruther's servant? Then was Sarah really Mrs. Rayner's guardian; and was she not herself a little mad too? What had become of the wild jealousy of Jane which she had expressed to the stranger in the plantation? And why did she hate me so? Had she stifled her hatred once and for all, or would she—— Oh, what would she not do, if her wicked, senseless dislike of me should get the better of her again?

It was better to talk to her than to think of her, and I turned and asked after Mr. and Mrs. Rayner and Haidee. My pupil was not well, and had not got up that day; but Sarah would ask if I could could go and see her.

"She caught cold, miss, wandering round the pond late Saturday night, because she said she could talk to you there. Such nonsence! But you know she is full of her fancies."

I was touched by the proof of little Haidee's affection for me, and I wanted to go to her at once; but Sarah said Mrs. Rayner was with her and did not wish to be disturbed. So I went up-stairs, having asked in as careless a manner as I could, if there were any letters for me, and having been told that there were not. Laurence might have sent me just a little note; I had been so longing for one. He had not been nearly so nice since I told him I loved him, I thought to myself mournfully; and I sat with my head on my arms and cried. But I had not much time to indulge my grief, for it was nearly dinner-time, and I did not want Mr. and Mrs. Rayner to see my eyes red and swollen, and to think that my holiday had made me discontented. But I think that Mr. Rayner saw that something was wrong, for he looked at me very closely, and said I did not look any better for the change, and that it was plain dissipation did not agree with me. And, as I was still rather pensive and my voice a little tremulous, he asked me only a few questions about my visit and then left me to myself, for which I was very grateful.

In the afternoon I was allowed to go into Haidee's room. It was a cold day, and the room itself and the long corridor which led to it struck me as feeling damp and chilly. It was the first time that I had been in the left wing. Haidee's chamber was a little dressing-room without a fireplace, and I wondered why they did not move the child, who was really ill, into another room. She jumped up in bed and clasped her hot little hands round my neck as soon as I came in, and then drew my head down on the pillow beside her and told me to tell her everything I had done from the first moment I went away. So I made a little story of it all, leaving out the parts it would have been improper for her to hear, such as the behaviour of Mr. Carruthers in church, and laying particular stress upon such points of interest as my feeding the chickens and cutting the grapes and the flowers. Mr. Rayner peeped in once, and, after listening to part of my narrative, said—

"I shall want to hear about all that too, bye-and-by, Miss Christie; but shall want another edition, one not revised for the use of infants."

I felt a little disconcerted, for he said this rathermischievously; and I began to wonder whether he would approve of the governess having enjoyed herself quite so much, for I had forgotten to be dignified and prim altogether while I was at Denham Court.

Haidee begged me so hard to have tea with her that I was obliged to consent, the more willingly that Mrs. Rayner, who had never once came in to see her child while I was in the room, had seemed, by the way she greeted me on my return, to have exchanged her attitude of apathy towards me for one of dislike. While we were alone together over our tea, Haidee said very softly—

"Miss Christie, will you please go to the door and see if anybody's listening?"

I went to the door to content her, opened it, and saw that there was no one.

"And now will you listen at the other door—mamma's door?"

This was locked; but I put my head against it, listened, and assured her there was no one there. Then she beckoned me back to her and put up her head to whisper.

"Last night that hateful Sarah made mamma cry. I heard her through the door. Mamma's frightened of Sarah—and so am I. Hush! Somebody is always listening."

But no listener could have heard her soft whisper; even I, with my ear close to the lips, could scarcely catch the faint sounds. I comforted her, told her Sarah would not hurt her or "mamma" either—though I felt by no means so sure of her good will as I pretended to be—and stayed with her until she went to sleep.

Then I wrapped myself up in a shawl and went into the plantation to look at my "nest." And there, leaning with his back against the tree which formed my seat, was Laurence. I gave a cry of delight and ran forward, but he only raised his hat and said.

"Good evening, Miss Christie."

I stopped short, overwhelmed with dismay, Then I said in quite a low husky voice, for I could scarcely get the words out—

"Laurence, why do you speak like that? Aren't you glad to see me?"

"Why should I be glad to see you, Miss Christie? I can't hope to show to advantage in your eyes after the more amusing society you have just left."

"What do you mean? What society do I like better than yours?"

"Oh, you are very kind; and I dare say I do very well as a make shift when there is no more exciting amusement to be had!"

"Oh, Laurence, how can you say such cruel things? Are you angry because I went to Denham Court, and because I enjoyed myself? I couldn't help it, every body was so kind. But I thought of you all the time, and I wished with all my heart that you had been there,"

"Did you think of me while you were letting Mr. Carruthers whisper to you in the conservatory? Ah, I don't wonder you start! And did you think of me when you were sitting in the window-seat with Mr. Carruthers leaning over your chair, and when you were using the same book in church with Mr. Carruthers, and letting Mr. Carruthers gather fruit and flowers for you, and feeding the fish with him in, oh, such an idyllic manner, and playing his accompaniments, and talking about poetry, and——"

"Stop, Laurence—it isn't true, it isn't true! It was Mr. Cole who gathered flowers and fruit for me, and who looked at the fish with me—not Mr. Carruthers at all. And it was Mr. Standing whose accompaniments I played and who talked about poetry with me, not——"

"Mr. Standing? He's another beauty! You choose your friends well, Miss Christie. I feel I am not worthy to be admitted among the number. I am too dull."

"You are too rude," said I, my spirit rising. "I don't know what you mean by calling them 'beauties;' but none of the gentlemen you sneer at would have thought of insulting me and trying to make me unhappy, just because I sometimes talk to other people."

"No, you tried to be impartial, I see," he sneered again. "But I don't think you succeeded. You were not on the river between twelve and two o'clock in the morning with all the men-visitors at Denham Court, were you?"

"No," said I; then, stung to the quick by sneers—"I wasn't at Denham Court long enough."

"Oh!" said Laurence, more angrily than ever. He was so angry that he began to speak again two or three times, but only stammered and broke off. At last he said, "You—you were not there long; but you—you made good use of your time or by this morning the fame of your exploits has spread all over the neighborhood."

"My exploits!"

"Yes. This morning, before you arrived, Mr. Rayner had heard of them."

"Mr. Rayner! Oh, that is not surprising!"

Laurence turned upon me sharply.

"Mr. Rayner has a friend staying there," said I, with sudden caution. I must not let out things concerning the people I was living with which they did not wish to have known.

"Oh, more mysteries! So Mr. Rayner set a spy upon you; I can't quite believe it of him."

"I did not mean that. Of course he would not think of such a thing. And there is no need of a spy to watch my actions, for I don't do anything to be ashamed of. And Mr. Rayner knows that, for he has said nothing to me about my conduct, which you seem to think so disgraceful."

"Mr. Rayner! No, of course he would not mind. It is nothing to him whether you endanger your reputation by going out alone late at night with one of the most notorious fast men about town."

"But how could I tell he was notorious, Laurence?" said I—I couldn't be spirited any longer; I wanted to cry. "Lady Mills said afterwards that he was dangerous; but could I tell before? Nobody ran away from him, and all the ladies seemed fond of him, and rather jealous because he talked to me. And he didn't say wicked things—not half so wicked as the things they said. Oh, Laurence, don't be harsh to me! How could I tell?

He was touched at last; the hand with which he had been angrily pulling at his moustache dropped, and he was turning slowly towards me, when the church clock and the far off Beaconsburgh town hall clock began to strike seven together.

"Oh!" said I, turning instictively towards the house.

"What is it?" asked Laurence, suddenly stiffening again.

"Mr. Rayner. I promised to be in the drawing-room to accompany his violin at a quarter to seven"

"Pray don't let me detain you," said he between his teeth. "I am sorry I came at all to disturb you in your meditations upon your late enjoyment. But, as I shall leave Goldham for the Riviera in two days, and shall not have another opportunity of seeing you before I go, I took the liberty of coming round this way to night, to congratulate you on having become an accomplished coquette. Good-night and good-bye, Miss Christie. I wish you another pleasant evening with Mr. Rayner."

He shook hands with me, trembling all over with passion, and dashed away through the plantation before I could find voice to call him back. I was too utterly miserable to cry; I sank upon my seat, with a confused sense that all joy and brightness and hope had gone out of my life, since Laurence had left me angry and unforgiving; but I could not think. I sat there staring at the pond until Mr. Rayner himself came out in search of me; and, seeing how unhappy I looked, he very kindly told me that I was tired and should not play that night; but I said that I would rather; so we went in and I sat down to the piano, and he took out his violin

But the spirit was not in me on that night, and I played the notes loudly or softly as was marked, without a spark of the fire which is the soul of music. At last Mr. Rayner went out of the room. It was to go and see Haidee; but in my despondent state it flashed through my mind that it was because my heartless playing was spoiling the music, and a tear rolled at last down my cheek on to one of my hands. Mr. Rayner stopped, put down his violin, and said, oh, so kindly—

"What is it, my poor child? I did not mean to make a martyr of you. But I saw you were in a sad mood, and I thought the music might divert your thoughts."

"Oh, it is nothing, Mr. Rayner! Let me go on please."

"No, child, I am not so selfish as that. It would hurt me more than you. Come and sit by the fire, and I will bring you Nap to play with."

Nap was his big retriever. Mr. Rayner drew my arm in his, seated me by the fire, and left the room; and I dried my eyes, feeling heartily ashamed of myself. What would he think of a governess who went away on a short visit, did things that shocked people, and came back and cried, and could not play, and made herself a burden to everybody? He came back with Nap at his heels, and a glass and decanter in his hand; then, sitting down by me, he poured me out some wine and told me to drink it.

I began apologetically—

"Oh, Mr. Rayner, I am so——"

"Yes, I know. You are so very sorry that you can't help thinking Denham Court a livelier place than the Alders, and so very sorry that you were obliged to leave a lot of nice, bright, amusing people there to come back to a couple of very worthy, but prosy people who——"

"Oh, no, no, no, Mr. Rayner, not that at all!" said I, alarmed.

"Wasn't that what you were going to say? No, my child, you were going to say something far more civil, but not half so true. We may be worthy, but we are prosy; and why should we not own it? And why should you not own that you enjoyed yourself more at Denham Court than you can possibly do here? Why, that is the very thing you went there for!"

"I ought never to have gone at all."

"Now that is a mistake, my dear child. If you were to remain always boxed up in this dreary old vault, you would soon take to spectacles and a crutch. Take all the amusement that comes in your way, little woman, and, after the first natural reaction, you will work all the better for it. And now tell me all about Denham Court; I've been saving myself up for your description as a little treat, though I've heard something of your doings, Miss Prim, from another quarter."

And this was what Laurence, in his passion, called "spying upon me," when Mr. Rayner owned that he heard what went on at Denham Court!

"I heard, for one thing, that you wore the pendant I gave you."

He seemed pleased at this, I thought.

"Yes, it looked so beautiful with my muslin frock. And, oh, do you know, some of the people thought it was made of real diamonds!"

"Did they really?"

"Yes; I knew you would laugh when I told you that. But now you see it wasn't so silly of me not to know the difference when you first showed them to me, when those people who have worn diamonds and beautiful jewels all their lives were taken in by them. One of the gentlemen, Mr. Carruthers, said he once saw a pendant just like it in real ones, and it was worth fifteen hundred pounds. Do you think it is true?"

"I dare say it is. Stones of that size would be very valuable. To whom did it belong?

"He didn't say. And it had initials behind it too just like mine."

"How very curious! The same initials?"

"Oh, I don't know! I shouldn't think they were the same."

"I thought he said they were the same?"

"Oh, no! He wanted to see the back of the pendant; but I wouldn't let him."

"Why not?"

"Well, you see, Mr. Rayner, I—I thought, if he still went on thinking they were real, as I believed he did, and he were to find out by the initials who gave it me, why—why he would think you must be mad, Mr. Rayner, to give diamonds to a governess!" said I, laughingly. "Fifteen hundred pounds! Why, it would be about thirty-eight year's salary!"

Mr. Rayner laughed too.

"That was very sharp of you," he said. "If he had been as sharp as you, he would have got at it, and found out the initials, if he really wanted to know them."

"But I didn't wear my pendant again.

"Why not?"

"Because people noticed it too much, and—and Mr. Rayner, it is really too handsome for me."

"Nonsense! Nothing is too handsome for you, child; haven't your new admirers told you that?"

I laughed and blushed.

"But, Mr. Rayner," I went on gravely and rather timidly, "then such a strange thing happened that I must sell you about. I put my pendant into my desk—at least, I am almost sure I did—on Saturday night, and next day it was gone."

"Well, we must find you another."

"Oh, no! But this is the strangest part. Just befor I left this morning, Mr. Carruther's servant put it into my hand, saying he had picked it up on the stairs. And the little shield with the initials was broken off and lost. Isn't it strange?"

"Well, not considering that they were paste. If they had been diamonds, I should say it was very strange that he gave it back again. You careless little puss, you don't deserve to have any finery at all! What will you do when you have real jewels, if you are not more careful with mock ones?"

"Oh, Mr. Rayner, I hope I never shall!"

"Do you mean that?"

I he-itated.

"I mean they seem to be such a heavy responsibility to the ladies that wear them."

"I suppose there were some ladies there with jewellery that made your eyes water."

"They didn't wear much; but I believe some of them had a great deal. One lady—she was the wife of a very rich husband who wasn't there—had dazzling diamonds, they said."

"And what was the name of that fortunate lady?"

"Mrs. Cunningham."

"What did Mrs. Cunningham think of your pendant?"

"She would not believe it was not real, and she scolded me for my carelessness; but I really did——"

"I suppose she is very careful of hers?" interrupted Mr. Rayner.

"Oh, yes—you don't know how careful! She has one set, diamonds and cat's eyes ——"

By a sudden movement he trod on Nap's tail, and the dog howled. I broke off to comfort him.

"Go on, go on," said Mr. Rayner, touching my arm impatiently.

"What was I saying? Oh, I know—about Mrs. Cunningham's jewels. She has one set of what they call cat's-eyes and large diamonds, which she keeps——"

"That she keeps where?" said Mr. Rayner, yawning, as if tired.

"Oh, that she keeps always concealed about her person!" said I.

"Do you mean it?" he asked, much interested.

"Yes, really. She told me so. And nobody in the house, not even her maid, knows where they are. She sleeps with them under her pillow."

Mr. Rayner rose.

"Well, I don't think even the responsibility of diamonds under your pillow would keep you awake to-night, for you must be tired out."

He was fidgeting about the room, as if he were anxious about going to bed too. But he did not look sleepy; his eyes were quite bright and restless. He gave me my candle.

"Pleasant dreams of Denham Court, madam, though you don't deserve them! What business have you to repeat secrets that have been told to you in confidence?"

"Oh, Mr. Rayner, as if it mattered—to you!" said I, laughing as I left the room.

"Yes, it is lucky you told it to me," he answered laughing back.

Fast English Trains.

The longest run without stopping, on the Great Northern, and the longest in the kingdom, are between Grantham and King's Cross, 105½ miles, in 2 hours and 4 minutes, an average speed of 51 miles an hour. This distance is done by no less than four trains each day, all of which perform the journey within 2 hours and 6 minutes. The highest average speed attained on this line, 52¼ miles, is between Grantham and Doncaster (51½ miles in 58 minutes.) The longest run on the North eastern is from York to Newcastle, 80¼ miles, in 1 hour and 42 minutes; and the quickest, York to Darlington, 44¼ miles, in 53 minutes—an average speed of 50 miles an hour.

"Mamma," said a precocious little boy who, against his will, was made to rock his little baby brother, "if the Lord has any more babies to give away, don't you take them."

OVER THE CATARACT.

(Albany, N. Y., Journal.)

Among the hundreds of thousands of tourists who have visited Niagara Falls and stood in awe before its miracle of power, there is, probably, not one who has failed to notice the large stone building which stands directly opposite the cataract and a short distance below the railroad suspension and cantilever bridges. This building is known to all as the "Monteagle House," and it has been a popular place of resort for hundreds of travellers during many years. Nearly every place in America possessing unusual natural scenery has its legend, and a most tragical one is located on the site where this stone building now stands. Monteagle, a young chieftain of the Miami Indians, loved the daughter of a mighty chief among the Iroquois. His wooing, unlike that of Hiawatha, was not received with favor by the father chief, and hence he was compelled to resort to the usual method of abduction and flight. The escaping pair were overtaken on the banks of the Niagara where the hotel now stands, and rather than submit to capture the lovers cast themselves into the cataract below. Their bodies were subsequently found at the mouth of the river clasped in an embrace which even the cataract could not sunder. Many occurrences since that time have tended to make the Monteagle famous, and it was with surprise that it was learned a short time since that the edifice was to be entirely transformed, re arranged and refurnished for the benefit of tourists and especially invalids.

Feeling that this is a subject in which the public would take unusual interest, especially at the National Park question is being so strongly agitated, a representative of this paper visited Niagara Falls yesterday and learned the following facts:

Dr. W. R. Crumb, who is about undertaking this important task, is a gentleman who is well known throughout the land, having successfully practiced medicine in the city of Buffalo for nearly thirty years. He is exceedingly well preserved, though nearly 60 years of age, while his energy and ambition are something wonderful. In conversation with the reporter he said:

"I anticipate great success here, although a few years ago I should not have dared undertake it, for I was then what people call 'a dead man.'"

"How was that, Doctor? How did it occur?

"It was brought about, as such troubles usually are, by mental and physical depression, arising out of troubles and reverses. The mind has a remarkable effect upon the body, and when one meets with misfortunes financially, or in any other form they are likely to be accompanied by misfortunes physically. Such, at all events, was my case. I was irritable, restless and feverish. I had a heavy and irregular pulse, my food did not assimilate, my heart would throb violently and then stop and the fluids I passed were profuse, high-colored and thick with deposits. I was obliged to abandon my practice, and also to suspend pushing my valuable invention, known as 'Crumb's pocket inhaler,' for the cure of catarrh and asthma."

"How long did this continue?"

"For about two years. I realized that I was quite sick but like everyone else I felt it would only be temporary. The majority of people drift along the way a man might who knew nothing about these great Falls and was floating with the current. It is so easy to drift, you see. At the end of a year, however, my condition became simply horrible. I had a serious irritation of the throat, a hard, sluggish pulse, a swelling of the limbs and numbness extending down the thighs. I had terrible night sweats and my urine was loaded with albumen and acids. I called in several of the most skillful physicians but I continued to sink rapidly. I was the victim of Bright's disease of the kidneys, and I looked forward with almost certainty to a few weeks of terrible agony and then — death!" * * * It is painful to describe this experience and it is sufficient to say that I am entirely well and that my life has been saved by means of Warner's Safe Cure, which arrested the disease, effected a cure and has preserved me in health ever since."

"Then it was this remedy that saved your life, doctor?"

"Yes, I can testify from a grateful heart that it is invaluable for men or women who are depressed by reason of disappointments and reverses; who are losing flesh and strength and who must find relief or a fatal termination awaits them. I prescribe this great remedy to my patients constantly and the wonderful effects I observed in my own case I see repeated in their experiences. It is this that makes me certain I can endure the cares of the great Sanitarium I am about to establish."

English Cheeses.

Pro. Sneldon has written the following interesting article for the Rural New Yorker. Now that cheese making and cheese exporting have become such important branches of business in Canada the subject is one of much interest to us.

We have many distinct kinds of cheese made in England, some of which have a world-wide reputation. With one single exception, they are all of the class known as "hard cheese," in distinction from the many kinds of "soft cheese" which are so generally made in France and Germany and which are now being imported in rather considerable volume into London. That one exception is the Slipcote cheese, and it is made in Rutlandshire. There is an odd conjunction of littleness about this cheese made in England, it is made in the smallest quantity, and its home is in the smallest county of the Kingdom. There is, of course, cream cheese, which is also very small, but it is not a cheese properly so called, because it is made from cream only and it is not coagulated artificially and it is made in small quantities in various counties.

The Slipcote cheese is made from milk, which is coagulated in the ordinary manner by the aid of rennet; the coagulum is placed in a strainer to drain, and afterwards in quantities of about one pound each, on plates, where it drains still more, and next it is placed between cabbage leaves, which are regularly changed, and there it ripens. The ripening takes from one to three weeks, according to the weather, and is completed when the cheese begins to ooze out a thick, curdy liquid, and when the skin or coat is ready to slip off—hence the name of "Slipcote." This singular cheese is purely local and has a very limited reputation. Few people in England have heard of it, and fewer still have seen or eaten it. It has been on exhibition once or twice at our London Dairy Shows.

Cream cheese is made by pouring cream into muslin which is placed in a small box or wicker mold; here the cream coagulates by reason of its own accumulating acidity, and forms itself into shape as the whey drains from it. It is ready for consumption as soon as it is firm enough. A limited demand exists for it in London and elsewhere, but it will propably give way to the Camembert, the Neufchatel and other Continental soft cheeses.

The Stilton is at once the most modern and the most famous of English cheeses, and has no antiquity to compare with that of the Cheshire, the Derby, the Gloucester, the Wilts, or the Cheddar. Records appertaining to our ancient methods of cheese-making are, unfortunately, very scanty, and only incidental allusions are made to them in a few old books here and there. It is a matter for regret, in this age of interesting investigation, that so little is known about the habits and customs of our agricultural forefathers; and yet it is probable that a good deal might be learned from the musty and mildewed parchments on which the archives of counties and ancient families are inscribed, if only a search were made. The search, however, would involve enormous trouble, and practically, could never be completed; for in many places such archives are not accessible, while in others they are probably more or less illegible. We must be content, therefore, to rely on the nebulous tale of tradition, the rest being buried in the grave of the centuries.

But in any case it is tolerably certain that several of our systems of cream-making, as we have them to-day, date back to a very early period, and these systems, owing to local practices and to the influence of soil and climate in given localities, are well defined and clearly distinct from each other. It may be said, moreover, that certain kinds of English cheese, to wit, the Stilton, the Cheshire, the Derby, the Leicester, the Wilts Truckless, etc., can only be produced in integrity of character, flavor, and quality in the districts to which they are peculiar. The cheese of Leicestershire, when we get a good sample of it, is probably the best cheese in England, and it has certain pecularities which, so far as my observation and inquiry go, have not been successfully imitated in any other sections of the country. This is true also of the Cheshire cheese, which, like the Leicester, cannot be made with complete success on any other soil that the bunter sandstone and the keuper marl. It is true also of the Derby cheese, which is made from a carboniferous limestone soil, and of the Gloucester, which belongs to the oolitic formation. It is true most of all, perhaps, of the Stilton, which belongs to the deep marly clay of Leicestershire—a soil which communicates a quality and flavor that, so far as I am aware, cannot be obtained in any other soil, be it never so rich. Stilton cheese is made in various parts of England, and in other countries too, but I have yet to find any sample of it equal in all respects to that made in the Melton Mowbray district.

FARM ITEMS.

SEED POTATOES.—Rural New Yorker says: Of upwards of 100 different kinds of potatoes raised last season, only two seed-balls formed on those from which it was desired to save seeds. Our plan for raising seedling potatoes, as has been stated several times, is to sow the seeds in flower pots now; transplant when three or four leaves have formed to little (three-inch) pots, turning these out in open ground with the soil intact when there is no longer any fear of frosts.

AMERICAN AGRICULTURE.—At Washington, recently, the House Committee on Agriculture completed the agricultural appropriation bill. The aggregate amount appropriated is $530,590, an increase of about $24,000 over the last appropriation. The bill differs from last year's appropriation in an increase of $24,000 for the Statistical Department, the appropriation of $3,000 for the propagation of tea plant, and the refusal to appropriate $10,000 for the reclamation of arid land by sinking artesian wells. The experiments hitherto made by the Government in this line have met with very little success, but two bills have been introduced into Congress for the formation of companies with very large capital to sink artesian wells for irrigating and stock watering purposes in the "arid region." The Senate may make some slight changes in the House appropriation bill, but such changes will probably be insignificant.

LIVE STOCK INSPECTION.—In consequence of the suspicion of allowing American cattle to be imported into England, because of the danger of infectious diseases, a good deal of attention has been given to the subject at Washington. A bill has been introduced into Congress, by Senator Logan, to provide for the appointment of inspectors of live stock, dressed meats and hog products intended for foreign shipment, the inspectors to be located in the custom districts where their services may be needed, but not more than six to be appointed in any district. The examination of meats is not to be compulsory; but on the application of a packer, and the payment of "reasonable fees and charges," the inspector will examine the products and furnish a written certificate setting forth the time and place of the examination and the condition and quality of the articles examined. It is expected that the meats, the sound condition of which is thus officially certified, will find such ready sale in the European markets that the cost of inspection will be easily repaid.

"Blinders," says a writer in "Our Damb Animals," "originated in the pride of persons who imagined their horses presented a finer appearance when provided with these senseless appendages. Custom and ignorance combined in perpetuating their use, so that to-day probably nineteen-twentieths of our horses are disfigured by these worse than useless contrivances, including multitudes of miserable, broken-down animals employed in the severer grades of labor, and which could not, from sheer weariness and lifelessness, be induced to shy, or run away, by anything short of a bomb bursting in their immediate vicinity.

"The unsoundness of that logic which insists horses are less frightened by objects which are screened from their view by blinders, but which they can hear (such, for instance, as locomotives), than when they can see just what the object is, is proven wholly false by the experience of all who have dispensed with blinders on their animals. It is the unseen object which most terrifies a horse. The animal who will become unmanageable when made to face away from an approaching train, will quietly stand its ground if allowed to face the object. I know this from personal experience with many restless horses.

"Blinders do not prevent horses from observing each object in front, and upon each side of them, as they approach it while travelling upon the road, and hence blinders can only serve to prevent their seeing objects overtaking them from behind, which is an end never to be desired. I have frequently seen horses shy so violently as to nearly overturn the vehicle on being passed from the rear by a noiselessly-gliding bicycle, which fright would have been avoided had the animal been unblindered, and thus aware of the approach of the machine.

"Blinders also much diminish the beauty of a horse, the eye being one of its finest features. But the greatest objection of all is the cruelty (and injury, as well) resulting from their use. The vast majority of blinders are made nearly flat, so that they commonly press directly against the eye-lashes and eyes of the horse, which causes pain to the animal, besides frequently destroying its sight.

"I strongly and earnestly wish there could be legislation to compel all horse-owners who insist upon using blinders, to use only heavily convexed ones, which shall not press in the present cruel manner against the eye-lashes and eyes."

Our Forefathers' Homes.

Bad as the dwellings of the poor are in cities, and in the country also, they are as a class far superior to those in which our Anglo-Saxon ancestors lived. If a serf, the Saxon lived in a hut not as genteel as some of our modern pig-styes, and far less comfortable.

If he was a gentleman, his home consisted of a hall, with little rooms on the outside surrounded by an earthwork. The rude walls of the hall were covered with some sort of hangings, on which were hung arms and tropies of the chase. The floor was of earth strewn with rushes.

In this rude hall he breakfasted at nine and dined at three o'clock. It was considered disgraceful for a gentleman to dine alone. Everybody was welcomed with a lavish hospitality.

The stranger brought news, no mean gift to an out-of-the-way country squire, who had no newspaper and couldn't have read it if one had been placed alongside of his breakfast plate, or rather bread-slice. For they used thick slices of bread, as plates were then unknown, on which to place portions of meat. These slices were called trenchers, because they were to be carved upon. Forks were unknown.

A Norman baron is reported to have been so hospitable that he turned the king's highway through the middle of the hall of his manor. He did so in order that no traveller might have an excuse for passing without partaking of his hospitality.

Seated on a high wooden seat, the Anglo-Saxon gentleman presided at his dinner of boiled bacon, which, with bread and vegetables, mead and beer, was the principal dish. Quantity made up for the deficiency in quality.

He and his guests drank heavily. Drunkenness and sloth marked his daily life. Drinking-cups were so made as not to stand upright. They had to be emptied at a draught. Buckets were used to carry the mead or oil to the guests. When the Saxon gentleman or lady slept, he rested on a bench upon which a sack filled with straw had been placed. Neither he nor his wife wore a night-dress.

The change from these rude customs into a more refined style of living was due to the Norman conquest. It polished the Saxons' manners, and infused into their sloth the energy characteristic of the English race. The transition required time. For a long period the Saxons resisted the advance of the refined Norman manners and customs, as reminding them of their servile condition.

The conquered, however, had his revenge—he forced his language upon his conqueror—The process was simple but effective. The unmarried Normans selected their wives from among the beautiful Saxon maidens, and these naturally taught their children their native tongue

Male education and female education in India, when compared with each other, present a striking contrast. The total female population is 99 500,000 and the total male population 103 000,000, but only 127,000 females are under instruction at school, as against 2,517,629 males. In one case the percentage at school is 84, in the other it is 16 28.

It appears from a work soon to be published by Louis Fagan, the author of a well-known life of Panizzi, that the British museum poesesses the only authentic manuscript of Raphael, the manuscript being a sonnet written on a sheet containing sketches for some of the figures in the "Dispute of the Sacrament," which was painted in the Vatican about the year 1508.

The North German Gazette replies to the "attacks of the Spanish republican Castelar on the elevated person of the German emperor" by as hearty an attack on the character of his assailant, ascribing his rancor to the fact that Germany was one of the first powers to recognize Alfonso XII. after the fall of the republic, and his motive to a desire to fish with selfish ends in the troubled waters of a new republic.

The treasury of the German empire has just undergone its annual inspection. Every year three important financial officials visit and verify the imperial funds kept in the Julius tower at Spandau, and divided into four sections—that intended for the expenses of fortifications, the share for pensions and invalids, that set apart for building the parliament house, and the war portion, which now amounts to $30,000,000.

Nothing whatever is known at the Vatican of the £500,000 said to have been left the pope by the late Mrs. Stapleton. It is safe to conclude that the report was a tantalizing invention of some "anti-clerical." Half a million pounds, or even francs, would be a welcome addition to the papal treasury, which is decidedly dry just now. The want of money to pay cardinals is said to be the chief reason for the long delay in creating new ones.

While the Austrian crown princess was driving recently through the Rothethurmstrasse, one of the most frequented streets of Vienna, a little boy of 5 years old ran against the wheels of her carriage and fell. He suffered only a slight abrasion of the skin on the nose, but was taken at once to the hospital. The crown princess, with her maid of honor, subsequently went to inquire about him at the hospital, and also called to reassure his parents.

A correspondent at Suakim writes:—While encamped lately near Osman Digma's quarters, some of our allied Arabs showed a perfectly ridiculous cowardice, walking about the camp on their hands and knees at the first sound of a musketry attack, which they piteously declared "caused them stomach-ache." One Arab officer also, in a late reconnaissance of the Turkish cavalry, behaved very badly, and another officer positively bolted. This gentleman has been tried by court-martial and sentenced to death, but the sentence will be most likely commuted by reason of the offender's youth, and because the Turks were themselves in the act of turning their backs.

A few days ago, says a correspondent at Nice, at the hour when all fashionable Nice was abroad, a great crowd assembled at the entrance of the Rue Adelaide, drawn thither by a crime then just committed, and now already forgotten. A woman of 57 years of age, who had made money by keeping a private grambling saloon, had married a young husband. This man made continual demands upon her savings in order to meet his own losses at the roulette-table of Monte Carlo, and she at length refused to comply with his requests, which became daily more exorbitant and imperious. In a moment of fury he first cut her throat and then shot himself through the heart.

The Atheræum club of Madrid recently inaugurated their new house, which has cost £30,000, raised by subscription among its own members. Though it is neither remarkable for its architectural merit nor for its comfort, it has a noble library with 30.000 volumes, and its corridors are hung with portraits of former presidents and of the greatest statesmen of all parties during the last fifty years. Its saloons, adorned with frescoes and fine paintings by modern artists, members of the club, and the lecture hall, with seats for 1,200 persons, were filled by the elite of Madrid society and the diplomatic corps. The king, queen, and princess honored the inauguration with their presence, at the invitation of Senor Canovas, who is at present president of the Athenæum, and who provided the inaugural entertainment. The king desired to be inscribed at the head of the list of 1,100 members.

According to the Militarische Nachrichten, the works for the construction of a canal which will unite the Baltic with the North sea are on the point of being taken in hand. The canal will commence at a point between Brunsbuttel and St. Margarethen, on the Elbe, will pass Rendsburg, and end at the bay of Kiel, near Haltenau, south of the great fortifications of Freidrichfort. The length will be ninety-seven kilometers; the canal will have a depth of nine meters at low water, and will be a hundred meters wide. The largest ships will be able to pass at all hours of the tide in both directions. The canal being entirely under the control of Germany, her men of war will be able to avoid the perilous passage of the belt, which Denmark is at present able to impede by her coast batteries and by torpedoes. When the Baltic is frozen over the ships can be utilized in the North Sea.

A whole family has been poisoned at Ofen (Buda), on the opposite side of the Danube to Pesth, by an escape of gas. The gas had penetrated into the house from a disused pipe buried under the ruins of another house at some distance, which had been burned down several years ago. The doctor was sent for, as everybody in the house felt ill. Symptoms of gas-poisoning were apparent, but as no gas was used in the house the doctor was unable to account for it, and left after administering medicine. The patients were relieved and went to sleep, but next morning five of them were found dead, and four others in a hopeless condition. Only a nurse and a child have recovered, being saved, probably, owing to their faces being buried in the bedclothes. One of the victims was the grandmother of the children who had come the night before on hearing of the illness of the family.

Harems in Morocco.

Yesterday we were guests in two Moorish harems. The inmates gave us a very kind reception. The gloomy appearance of the outer walls contrasted strongly with the inside of the houses. The halls were tiled. Marble pillars, bright colors, and rugs gave the rooms a bright appearance. Mattresses were laid on the carpets in apartments facing the court-yard. They were the bedrooms of the wives. There were no windows. Each wife leaves her slippers at the entrance of her bedroom. We saw no chairs and only an occasional cushion. The wives prefer to recline or to sit on the floor. One or two sat on sheepskins.

The second harem belonged to a rich Moor. We saw there several clocks and mirrors, evidently a recent importation from Paris, but they looked out of place. The Moor had only one wife, and she was just 13 years old. She had been married two years. She sat on the floor barefooted with three other women, who were either relatives or visitors. She was very pretty. With an engeging smile she metioned us to sit near her. She looked animated, gay and happy. Several servants in the Oriental attire were in attendance. The life of Moorish wives must, however, be very wearisome. They are shut up in apartments with grated windows, high above mankind, with only occasional glimpses of the great world without.

In the first harem I saw a widow with seven children, all girls. Two were playing cards and two were sewing. None of the girls had ever seen a man. On Friday only the widow is allowed to go to the Moslem cemetery to weep and to pray over her dead husband. We were offered coffee and cakes. Etiquette required that we should drink four cups of coffee and eat as many cakes. Our visit was made very early in the morning.

The poor wives seemed glad to see us. They admired our dresses and called each other's attention to what took their fancy in the way of jewelry. They were dressed gayly, but they had a slovenly look and had an ungraceful walk.—Tangiers Cor. New York Sun.

A Parisian Novelty.

Leaders of fashion in Paris deserve the rare praise of having discovered—not, indeed, a new pleasure, but a new variety of an old one. This is the very heart of the dancing season, Paris being in all things a month earlier than London; and after Cinderellas, fancy balls, and costume reunions, in which inventive eccentricity was to be confined entirely to (the outsides of) the heads of the guests, it seemed that nothing new in that line could be devised. Something new has been devised, and is now in the full swing of Parisian patronage and popularity. Dances are given in which the hostess assumes a nationality. The Parisienne is content for the night to be a Spaniard, a Pole, a Neapolitan, and as is the hostess so must be her guests. The mise en scene is rigorously correct. In one salon you might fancy yourself in Madrid, especially if you had ever been there. You have the sarabande and the bolero, the short petticoats, the gay flounces; and, where nature (or art) can supply them, the olive complexions, the lustrous locks, and the rather wanton eyes of the country of bull-fights; dark beauties are much admired and Spanish lace is in high request. A few doors off you are in Poland, Chopin's dreamy waltzes giving the music and the slow, swinging step so inexplicable to a Frenchman accustomed to teetotum gyrations. German manners and customs are not yet very popular; but there seems a craze for the Russian mode. On the whole, the boulevardier boasts with reason that after it has struck 12 he can make a tour of the world in forty minutes.—Pall Mall Gazette.

Nothing New Under the Sun.

A discovery has been made which again lays the honesty of our ancestors open to serious suspicion. The jerry-builder, it seems, was not unknown in the middle ages; in fact he must have flourished and waxed mighty, seeing that he occasionally got such a job as the building of a cathedral into his unclean hands. In the course of "restoring" Peterborough cathedral some insight has been gained into the ways of the builder of the "Norman" and "early English" periods. Like his successor, he was an adept at concealing the practices by which he, no doubt, amassed a considerable fortune. The walls of the lantern at Peterborough being carefully examined, it appeared that, though the outside facing was of good Barnack stone, beneath this thin surface there was nothing but rubble and "pit mortar." So, too, with the great central tower and the piers which support it, or rather do not support it any longer. The core of these piers "was nothing but dust," and even their foundations were of the shallowest and poorest kind. Under the circumstances it is astonishing that the work should have lasted so long.—St. James' Gazette.

DUELING IN GERMANY.

An Interchange of Opinion on Various Phases of University Life.

A Berlin telegram to the London Times says: In connection with the debate on the estimates of the ministry of public works in the Prussian chamber of deputies there were some interesting interchanges of opinion on various phases of university life. A prominent clerical member, Herr Reichensperger, opened the discussion by complaining of the idleness, the drinking and duelling habits of students, of the academic system of cramming, and of the clique existence led by the professors at some universities.

But it was on the subject of duelling that the conversation mainly turned, and it was not difficult to divine how the tacit sympathies of the great majority of the house tended. Even the remarks of Herr von Gossler, the minister of public worship, drew from Dr. Windthorst an expression of surprise that "while duelling had been made penal by law it was nevertheless defended in this place." The ultramontane leader here referred to a decision of the supreme court of Leipsic, according to which, as one speaker put it, a duel with sharpened blades or rapiers might, but not of necessity must, be held to be a combat with mortal weapons—which was opening a door of escape with a vengeance. And it was plainly a matter of secret satisfaction to most that this indulgent door of escape had been created. Dr. Windthorst, it is true, displayed more than the half-heartedness of his colleagues when he declared that "in contrast to the opinions of the herr minister uttered last year, he regarded duelling as a decided evil, and in no way beneficial to the human character," But other members openly and boldly advocated a moderate encouragement of the barbarous and brutalizing practice of the national universities.

To this very practice Prince Bismarck once ascribed the prevalence of that combative and party spirit in parliament which had caused him so much woe—a spirit that men learned and brought away with them from the fencing ground; but in legislative quarters the practice is still countenanced as much as ever, and when the legal decision above referred to was issued, there was even a movement among the members of all factions, as Minister von Gossler reminded the house, for mitigating the effect of the judge's dictum. Most deputies have themselves been students, and look back with affectionate remembrance to their university life with all its swaggering and militant pleasures; and they still continue to have a sneaking sympathy with a habit which has been discarded by most civilized countries except Germany.

The foundation of duelling is the feeling of honor, but the Germans have not yet come to see that the honor of a man can only suffer a taint by the actions of his own and not by the words or actions of another, or that the sure foundation of dishonor is not without, but within a man. Duellists, however, think otherwise, and so do the Germans, and as long as they do so, it is no wonder that they are so sensitive of criticism, (especially from France), and so quick to resent it.

Tyndall on Rainbows.

"I do set my bow in the cloud, and it shall be for a covenant between me and the earth." The sublime conception of the theologian exceeded that desire for exact knowledge which was characteristic of modern science. Whatever the ultimate cause of a rainbow might have been, the proximate cause was physical, and the aim of science was to refer a rainbow to its physical principles. The explanation of the rainbow was due to Descartes. Descartes looked at the drops of rain; he pictured one liquid sphere falling in the air; he pictured the rays of the sun falling upon a liquid sphere. he saw that certain portions of the light would be refracted, would be driven to the other side of the drop, back again, and would be again refracted on their emergence from the drop. He took a pen in his hand, and calculated the entire course of the rays through the drop and their direction after their emergence from the drop. He found that the vast body of the rays, after quitting the drop, diverged at one particular angle; they came out as a parallel sheaf. There was a certain form of emotion called intellectual pleasure. It might be caused by poetry, literature, nature or art, but he, (Prof. Tyndall) doubted whether there was a pleasure of the intellect more pure and concentrated than that of a scientific man, who looking at a difficulty that had challenged the human mind for ages saw that difficulty melt before his eyes and recrystallize as an illustration of a law of nature. Such pleasure he thought must have been that of Descartes when he succeeded in uncovering the laws which ruled the appearance of the most brilliant meteor in nature.

Elegant New York Homes.

New York is full of elegant homes, hardly excelled in the world. All our American cities abound in noble homes, but here, where wealth has been so bountiful, these homes are upon a scale hardly to be found in the world. The merchants and successful men of New York live like veritable kings and princes. In other countries society is organized round men: here the men serve the women, not only for seven years, like Jacob to Laban's daughter, but for seventy and seven. This is the golden age of women. Nowhere else are women without rank or quality maintained as if they were descended from princes. New York homes are replete with everything that money can buy. Almost every household has its special devotion; some run to prints, some to coins, some to elegant bindings of books, some to antique and venerable editions of books, some to rugs, some to placques, some to paintings. I venture to say that in this city if the private houses could be thrown inside out we would stand amazed at our own treasures. Sometimes the most magnificent tastes and qualifications are found in the most modest New Yorkers. Self-made men feel like ornamenting their homes with the treasures of their own occupations, pleasures, or origins.—Gath.

A fool may have his coat embroidered, but it will always be a fool's coat.

The Standard.

MARKDALE MAR. 6, 1884.

NOTICE.

Subscribers for the STANDARD who have in the past called at this office for their paper, together with those in the village whose papers haye heretofore been delivered, are hereby notified that after this week (21st Feb.) all such papers will be delivered in the post office. This will doubtless be more satisfactory both to publisher and subscribers, as the latter have to call at the P. O, for other mail matter and can therefore kill the two birds with one stone.

CONSERVATIVE CONVENTION.

The convention held at Flesherton to-day, (Thursday) was very largely attended, every polling sub division was fully represented. The following were nominated: Messrs. Thomas McKenny, reeve of Collingwood tp.; Thos. Kells, Artemesia; M. Richardson, merchant, Flesherton; Wm. Howey, ex-Reeve, Holland; Dr. Christoe, Reeve, Artemesia; John McArthur, Priceville; Cap. J. Rorke, Collingwood tp.; Thos. Andrews, miller, Thornbury; N. McColeman, ex-Reeve, Collingwood tp.; John Lyons, Markdale; N. McGirr, ex-Reeve, Osprey; Jas. Lamon, Lawyer, Dundalk.

A general feeling of unanimity prevailed, which was somewhat unexpected. The following withdrew from the list of nominations before a vote was taken: McKenny, McArthur, Lyons, McGirr and Lamon, leaving seven candidates.

The first vote gave N. McColeman forty-nine out of one hundred and sixteen votes, and the second gave him some twenty of a majority of the whole, when he was made the unanimous choice of the convention.

The prospects are that Mr. McColeman will have the largest vote ever polled in East Grey by one man.

HYGIENE.

Our objection to pastry, which is in such common use, and so highly prized by many, is simply that it consists of an almost indigestible compound of hog's grease and flour, the cause, doubtless, of a large proportion of the indigestions, dyspepsias, and liver diseases of which so many complain.

Children of a very tender age must be regaled on tea and coffee; vegetables and sauces must be peppered and spiced before they are supposed to be palatable. Well-meaning temperance people do not usually understand the effects of the habitual use of these articles in their families. The child commences with tea, not very strong at first, perhaps, but it creates a craving for a stronger infusion, next he must have his meats highly spiced, he must have a liberal allowance of animal food he cries for more and more of these stimulants until as he grows up something yet stronger is demanded, an appetite has been created for tobacco and ardent spirits. His nerves are rendered irritable and excitable, his blood is not in its normal state, his desires and passions are on fire, he has already made considerable progress in the downward career, when his friends have begun to fear that he has just commenced it. His parents have not the remotest idea of the cause or beginning of the mischief, or that they themselves with the help of a proper knowledge of the laws of hygiene might have prevented all this evil. Those, to be sure, who are gifted with rare self-control and favored by the elevating influences of intellectual and moral culture, good society and religion, may in a measure restrain and correct their perverted appetites, and escape. Few parents, however, understand that in allowing their children this highly stimulating diet, they are working most effectually against the cause they have so much at heart, that the child living in this way is in an irritable, abnormal, we might almost say feverish condition of the physical system, unfavorable to proper bodily growth and development, and which renders it difficult for him to avoid the course of the debauchee and the drunkard. Those who have the care of inebriate asylums tell us that after they have been deprived of tea, coffee, spices, tobacco, and animal food, they have then no great difficulty with the unfortunates they would cure of their inordinate craving for intoxicating drinks, but that so long as the milder and commonly, but erroneously supposed harmless stimulants are allowed them they cannot be cured of the appetite for ardent spirits.

Now let us ask is it wise after pulling infancy and youth and adult age through all this couse of stimulants, and after creating in the larger portion of mankind the necessity, or at least the habitual use of them, does it appear intelligent to set up a crusade against a single form of the abuse—the alcoholic—and proceed to wage war against it? Is this an intelligent warfare against this enemy of mankind? Is it not plain enough that reform must begin earlier and be more comprehensive? Evidently the great root of the evil has been entirely overlooked by workers in the temperance cause.

Flesherton.

From our own correspondent.

The entertainment given under the auspices of the A.O.U.W. in the town hall last Friday evening was fairly attended. Mr. M. P. McMaster occupied the chair, and after a few brief remarks entered upon the program. Messrs. Vanzant and McDowell rendered some sweet music during the evening on the violin and organ; Misses Christoe and Richardson sang a duet very artistically; Mr. M. Richardson occupied about ten minutes and gave some very interesting statistics relative to the Order. Prof. Watson, of Toronto, was present and sang a number of songs in character. Mr. Watson evinced some ability as a comic singer but a number of his selections were below par with a Flesherton audience. Our popular Scottish vocalist, Mr. J. R. Anderson, was present, but owing to illness was not able to use his vocal powers, much to the dismay of many in the audience.

A few weeks ago a communication from a Flesherton correspondent to the Dundalk Herald came under the critical eye of the editor of the Advance, and probably feeling a little chagrin that any one in Flesherton should send spicy, newsy letters on current events and topics of general interest, to an outside paper, while his own proverbial dull sheet was neglected, he scanned the letter carefully over and at length found one small typographical error, a misplaced date figure, and from this he took a text for a paragraph in his own paper in his usual vulgar style. To this the Herald correspondent replied in a letter which would have made any man in the Advance editor's position smart, if at all sensitive. To this the Advance replied in a paragraph principally composed of such epithets as fool, blockhead, thickhead, &c. Again the Herald correspondent gave him the lash and laid it on so effectually as to smart even through such a tough hide as his subject can boast of. The editor of the Herald, Mr. T. Hall, a gentleman well and favorably known, made a few remarks in a half playful manner on the correspondence, but in doing so neither forgot what was due to gentlemanly courtesy to his own profession nor his own self respect. At this the Advance comes out in an article vulgarly abusive, personally vindictive, but perfectly in accord with the character of a vulgar, ignorant bully. It commences with "the little local preacher who makes a pretense of editing that insignificant sheet dignified by the title of the Dundalk Herald" and goes on to call him little "sucker," an "ignoramus" and other such approbrious epithets. Now when it is known that this same Fawcett, Advance editor, professes to be a member of the Methodist church, in the service of which Mr. Hall has been a successful, useful, honored and acceptable lay preacher for many years. The bad, nay even brutal taste of the writer of this scurrilous paragraph is singularly apparent, but when he styled Mr. Hall an ignoramus he floundered out of even his own shallow waters, as the wide gulf between the intelligence, education and general ability of the two men is so apparent and well known that comparisons are odious. But when he called Mr. Hall a "sucker" he chose a term that so well and appropriately defines his own character that it is mere folly to send it from home. It never did and never can fit the spunky 'ittle man that edits the Herald, but if the word sucker defines a man without means or brains who imposes himself on a suffering community and who has not got enough sense to hide from the public gaze his own scanty mental furnishings, but assuming the role of an editor, exhibits weekly his lack of intelligence and glories in his shame, then the word will accurately designate the editor of the Advance. A more respectful bearing to a gentleman so well and favorably known as Mr. Hall will better suit the columns of the Advance and tend more to promote its interests.

THE social in the Methodist parsonage, on Wednesday evening, was largely attended and a most enjoyable time was spent. The esteemed pastor and his affable lady were eminently successful in their efforts to make the company feel at home. Special credit is due those who got up the social for the excellent quality of the tea. Over one hundred and twenty five were in attendence, and all appeared to realize that "it is good for us to be here." A varied and interesting programme was ably rendered after which the party returned to their homes highly pleased with their evenings enjoyment. Proceeds $19.

FOR ALL AGES.

The aged, debilitated and infirm will find renewed vigor and strength by taking Burdock Blood Bitters. The young hastening to early decay will also find in this revitalizing tonic a remedy worth trying.

DANGER TRAPS.

Neglected colds are the fatal traps that ensnare many a victim beyond possibility of of rescue Take a cold or cough in time and it is easily conquered by that safe and pleasant vegetable remedy, Hagyard's Pectorial Balsam. Asthma, bronchitis and pulmonary complaints generally soon yield to its healing influence.

All things have some kind of standard by which the natural goodness of them is measured. We do not, therefore, esteem a ship to be good because she is curiously carved, painted, and gilded; but because she is fitted for all the porposes of navigation, which is the proper end of a ship. It should be likewise in our esteem of men who are not so much to be valued for the grandeur of their estates or titles, as for their inward goodness and excellence.

The Dundalk Brass Band intend giving a concert in the Orange Hall, Markdale, on Tuesday, March 18th. This promises to be a rare musical treat for Markdale people, and everyone should avail themselves of the pleasure of listening to the band, which has acquired some notoriety for the excellence of their music.

An impotant enquiry.—Are you threatened with consumption? If so, the cause may be in the blood. Impure blood and scrofula are close companions, and scrofula and consumption are still closer related. Rejuvinator Bitters cure all forms of scrofula by cleansing the blood and regulating the secretions. Sold by Smith the Barber.

The remarks of the editor of the Advance in last weeks issue of that paper anent Mr. T. Hall, of the Dundalk Herald were entirely uncalled for and most ungentlemanly. Such a course cannot but recoil, and in this case lower (if such is possible) the writer in the estimation of the public, while it does not affect the interests or standing of the one for whom the injury was intended.

The Evangelistic services in the Methodist Church still continue. The congregations are increasing this week, and the interest is in no respect abating. Last evening 69 testified that they had been blessed during the series of meetings. There were a number of others absent and many still seeking. All who attend the meetings seem religiously impressed, and the order from the beginning has been very commendable indeed.—O. S. Advertiser.

A steam boiler explosion took place in the flour mill of N. Reynolds & Co., Stayner, on Wednesday last, killing one man named John Reynolds, and seriously wounding William Panton and Joseph Knox. The mill was damaged to the amount of $11,000.

What about that proposed saw mill in Markdale. There is a felt want for one in our midst, and we have no doubt it would prove a profitable investment for a pushing man. There is yet a large quantity of various kinds of timber within easy reach, all of which would find a ready market. The advantages of a mill close to the railway over those a few miles out are many. In the first place the great bulk of timber sawed, is shipped by rail, and the prices paid for logs in the village would be but little if any more than that paid a few miles out, while there would be a very material saving in having the lumber convenient to load on the car instead of having to haul it on wagons and perhaps lose a profitable sale by not having it ready for shipping. Then there is the slabs which are almost valuless in the country, which, when cut up always find a ready sale in the village for fuel at a fair price. There are other advantages and we hope to see a good business man take advantage of this excellent opening forthwith.

Every one who has lived long in the south of Europe knows how amusing and innocent anecdotes of the confessional abound there, anecdotes which reflect neither upon priest nor penitent, yet which have the peculiarly piquant flavor—inherent in a joke which touches thoughnever so lightly—upon forbidden subjects.

One of these was told to the writer by an earnest, active priest, unsparing of himself and of others. Padre——is from the north of Italy, and quite unused to the unspeakable and unconquerable laziness of the Roman peasant. It happened therefore, that on the occasion of the first confession it fell to his lot to hear after his appointment to the church of San———, in Rome, he was astonished to find that it behooved him to do the penitent's work as well as his own, and that he had to question and suggest and question again until fairly wearied out. So, being a conscientious man, he called the peasant back after he had given him absolution, and said, 'You must come better prepared next time. You must see that to day it was I who made the confession, and not you. You had evidently made no examination of conscience; and so I warn you the next time you come I shall ask you nothing until you yourself have begun your confession. It is your duty to think over all you have done and left undone, and to make your own examination of conscience; then I can aid you with questions; but it is not right or for your good that I should do it all." The peasant sulked and shuffled, but made no reply to this harangue. However, it was not very longs before he came again, and Padre ——, who is nothing if not thorough, placed his watch before him, and allowed himself twenty miuntes to wait for the confession to begin. The minute-hand crept round to five minutes,—ten,—fiften,—seventeen,—when the penitent said, in an injured and irritated tone, "Ebbene tu non mi dice niente?" ("Well, have you got nothing at all to say to me?")

Quite different was good and gentle Father O'B——'s method of procedure. He was never in Rome, and lived and died in the great republic. His penitents used to say of him that if they confessed any sin he was wont to say hastily, in a distressed tone of voice, "There, mee chyeld, there I I know ye didn't mane to do it. Pass on to the next p'nt."

"Oh, yes, but I did intend to do it. I did it knowingly, Father O B——."

"Oh, mee chyeld, I hope not. I hope ye didn't,—for that would be decaytful, ye know, and unkind. I think ye didn't mane to do it. Pass on to the next p'nt mee chyeld."

Even a better story is told of Father Mc B——, a Dominican monk, and a good, energetic, but absent-minded man. It fell to his lot to return to Ireland after an absence of many years, and to hear confessions on saint's day in the chapel of a small village in the neighborhood of Cork. Several of the villagers had already confessed and were kneeling quietly in church, waiting for mass to begin, when the door of the adjoining chapel (where Father McB——— heard confessions) burst in, and the good father rushed in, his habit flying behind him, exclaiming in a loud voice, "Every one who has confessed to me this morning and that 'flayed the shingle over the roof' last night must come back to me directly!"

When the morning services were over, some one ventured to inquire, "What was the matter with Father McB———, now?"

"Faix," said Barney O Brien, the village ne'er-do-well, with a twinkling eye, "faix, I'm just thinkin' it's meself then, I'd made me confession like the rest of yez; and as to what I said, that's neither here or there, but I'm willin' to tell yez all that I wound it up wid sayin' that I'd flayed the shingle over the roof.—'What's that? says Father McB—, with a start that had like to make him fly out of the confessional.—'Well, thin, yer riverence,' says I, 'it just manes that I got rearin' drunk night before last.' And thin, 'Wait a bit,' says he, and flies into the church as if the divel himself was behind. It's a —— onaisy pinance he's put on me," continued Barney, with a rueful countenance; "and I c n only hope the rist of yez has got the like,—for yez know we flayed the shingle together, boys."

Spanish literature abounds with droll confessional stories. The best, probably, is that of a gypsy, who, coming to confess, and finding the priest's gold watch and chain lying in a room adjoining the confessional, coolly pocketed it, and began his confession with, "Father, I once stole a watch and chain."

"Very well, my son," replied the priest; "then you must restore it to its owner."

"Do you want it?" answered the gypsy.

"I? No, certainly not," said the priest.

"But, father," continued the gypsy, "I offered the watch and chain to their owner, and he refused to accept them."

"And you confessed the theft to the owner?" persisted the priest.

"Oh, yes, father."

"And still he refused to accept the watch and chain?"

"Yes, father, he refused absolutely,"

"Then, my son, you may keep them with a clear conscience. Go in peace."

The Provingal stories are rather more irreverent. The most amusing and famous is called "The Turtle-Dove's Nest," and is as follows:

"Poor Alari de Gigounda, who is something of a simpleton, went to confession. When he had finished, the priest said as usual, 'Now, my son, collect your thonghts and reflect whether you have confessed everything.'

"'Monsieur le cure, I don't remember——'

"'Come, my son, courage; tell everything you know; do not fear—'

"'Well, Monsieur le cure, if I must tell you everything, I have found a turtle-dove's nest, full of young doves; it is mine——'

"'I hope you didn't steal it?' interupted the prist.

"'Steal it? oh, no, Monsieur le cure; but I found it; it is in the olive orchard of Ferrut fils, on the fifth tree of the second row; and I shall have a fine set of doves to all.

"The next day it happened that some children who were playing in the olive-orchard caught sight of the nest, stole some doves and killed others, and tore the nest to pieces; so that when poor Alari came to see his treasure, as he did daily, doves and nest were gone.

"'But who has taken my nest? Oh, my poor nest! Who has spoiled my nest?' cried the simpleton. 'Oh, sacred name of heaven! it can only have been Monsieur le cure!'

"When Christmas came round, however, Alari went again to confession, and again the priest said, 'Now, my son, collect your thoughts and tell all you have done.'

"'Mon pere, I have been making love——'

"'With a view to getting married?' interrupted the priest.

"'Eh, yes, Mon pere; what else should I make love for? She is a good girl, and a pretty, and——'

"'And of this village?'

"But here Alari's patience failed. 'Ah, coquin of a cure, do you think that I will tell you who and where she is?' he cried. 'Last Easter I confessed to you that I knew where a turtle-dove's nest was, and you robbed my nest and killed my doves. If you should kill my Anois!'"

Of a different color is the following story, also Provengal:

"Every one in Carcassonne and the arrondissement loved the good Abbe Radoni, and rejoiced at the sight of his tall figure, wera soutane, and big hat, as he came walking along with great strides, having a friendly word and smile for every one, bonbons for the children, and ready sympathy in joy or sorrow for all who claimed it. At the fireside he was gay and simple as a child; before the altar, solemn and serious as an archangel. He was a true priest du Bon Dieu, such as is only made by suffering and conquest of earthly affectioos and appetites and by fasting and prayer.

"Good and patient as he was, however, there was a fault for which the Abbe found no pardon. He hated gossip as he hated the devil, and when in the course of a confession a penitent happened to reveal the faults of another, the grated window of the confessional box would slam sharply, and the Abbe would say sternly, 'You have discharged your own load. Leave your neighbors to discharge theirs.'

"Now, it happened that one day when he had confessed a great many penitents, a certain Mise Tres-Estello, a rich bourgeoise of Carcassonne, presented herself and began a confession which was endless, and which dealt—as was the good lady's wont—with the peccadilloes of all the arrondissement. Bang went the grating of the confessional, with the customary exordium. Mise Tres-Estello, very angry and humiliated, resolved to leave the Abbe Radoni from that time forth, and therefore presented herself at the confessionals of several other churches in Carcassonne with a tale of her wrongs. Everywhere, however, the grating of the confessional was shut in her face, so that after a time she returned to her own parish. The good Abbe heard her confession and gave her absolution in a quiet matter-of-course way, as if nothing had happened. This mortified her pride extremely, and, meeting him the next day in front of the cathedral, she said graciously, 'I hope, Father Radoni, you were not offended that I went to another confessor?'

"'Not at all, my child; not at all.'

"'But why, Mon pere?'

"'Eh, my child, if you had a neighbor who was in the habit of strewing ashes in front of your door, and it pleased her suddenly to change and strew them in front of your neighbor's door, would you be offended? Neither am I offended that you chose another confessor.'"

Once a simpleton, who had been in the idiot-asylum near Arles, was engaged as a servant by a charitable lady. It pleased her one day to go to confession, and the priest, to whom she was a stranger, began with the inquiry, "Are you maid, wife, or widow?'

"Nenni, answered poor Catharine.

"Are you married?'

"Nenni."

"Unmarried, then?"

"Nenni."

"A widow?"

"Nenni."

"Then what in heaven's name are you?" said the priest, losing patience.

"An idiot and an orphan, please your reverence."

Selling a Wife.

Some time ago a sensation was caused in the coal-mining district of Ruabon, North Wales, by the elopement of a miner with the wife of his comrade. It was ultimately discovered that after some wandering the pair had settled in the colliery district of Tyldesley, Lancashire. From this place the following letter has been received by the deserted husband: "Are you willing to give Sarah up into my hands, to take her as my own wife, and to marry her? for I have asked her many times to go back, and she answers every time, 'I would rather suffer death.' So you now understand she will not come back. Therefore, if you are willing, kindly wire a note signed by your own hand stating you are willing for me to make her a comfortable home and the children, and I will forward you ten shillings in cash for New Year's gift after you do me that kindness." The husband has replied, stating that matters having reached such a climax, his correspondent is welcome to his wife at the price named.—St. James's Gazette.

For tunes in Germany.

What does Vanity Fair mean by stating that "large fortunes are rare in Germany?" On the contrary, there is no country where there are so many large fortunes among "the territorial aristocracy." In Germany proper there are twenty-six estates which are larger than any in Great Britain, with the exception of the duke of Sutherland's domain; but an enormous number of acres of his Scotch estate are a trackless waste. The landed possessions of Prince Schwartzenberg (in Austria and Hungary) covered 420 German square miles, Prince Lichtenstein's extend over 104 square miles, Prince Esterhazy's 80, and Count Schonborn's 60. There are numerous estates of 50 square miles. Vanity Fair is quite mistaken, too, in stating that Count Redesen "made his fortune in the service of the court," and the said fortune, instead of being £1 500,000, considerably exceeds £3,000,000.— London World.

One of the surest ways to lose your health is to keep drinking other people's.

A SCRAP OF PAPER.

How it Convicted a man of Murder—A Remarkable True Story.

"Speaking of circumstantial evidence," a gentleman from Contra Costa county yesterday, to a reporter of the Independent, with whom he had been talking about the Markey murder trial, calls to my mind the conviction of Robert Lyle in my county, last January, of the murder of Patrick Sullivan, and I consider it the strangest case, and one on which there was the best detective work done that it was ever my fortune to meet with. It is a famous case, and has occupied the courts since the year 1881, and gave the officers more trouble to secure a conviction than a dozen ordinary murder cases. They had hardly anything to work on at first, but stuck to it with the persistence of bloodhounds on the track of a victim, finally securing a conviction almost wholly on the finding of a small piece of newspaper."

The reporter became interested and suggested that the gentleman give an account of the affair, which he did in the following language.

THE CRIME.

'Sullivan was a prosperous farmer and stock-raiser, living on Wildcat Creek, in the southern part of Contra Costa county, and Lyle was a near neighbor. The latter was always getting into trouble with his neighbors and going to law, particularly with Sullivan. In these suits he was generally on the wrong side of the question, and, of course, got worsted, which enraged him to such a degree that he was injudicious enough to make threats against Sullivan's life, at one time telling the latter's son that his father would fail to come home some night. On the morning of the day of the murder Sullivan left his home with his team and went to town, where he had a trifling lawsuit with Lyle before a justice of the peace, in which he was beaten. The prophecy was fulfilled, for Sullivan never returned home alive. The next day he was found dead with his team in a field not far from his home, his arm hanging over the whiffletree and his body lying upon the ground. The first conclusion was that the team had run away with him, thrown him out, dragged him and broken his neck. This theory was strengthened by the fact that there was a plainly-marked trail for two hundred and fifty yards, evidently made by his body. No marks of blood were on his clothes, and no evidence that a crime had been committed. At the inquest when the clothes of the dead man were removed, it was found that he had been murdered by some one who had SHOT HIM IN THE BACK.

Several of the shots had entered his body, one of them penetrating the heart and two of them imbedding themselves in the back of the waggon seat. I attended the trial and took a great interest in it. He was heard to pass the house of a man named Davis about nine o'clock on the night of the murder. The road passed the house of Lyle, so that if the latter so desired he could lie in ambush and kill him.

"When the officers examined the spot where the murder was committed they found the footprints of a man leading to and from Lyle's house over the ploughed ground to the place where Sullivan had fallen out of the waggon. They at once suspicioned that Lyle had something to do with the crime, and went to his house, where he was found eating his dinner. They told him that he was suspected of murder, and that they were there to make an investigation. 'I have expected this,' said Lyle, 'because I have had so much difficulty with Sullivan.' He then told the officers to go ahead and make their search and that they would not find anything criminating about his place. On two pegs on the wall the officers found a double-barreled shot gun, one of the barrels of which was moist on the inside, and had evidently been recently discharged. Some buckshot was found, although Lyle denied having any, and on a shelf by the buckshot was found a crumpled piece of the San Francisco Call, a part of which was torn off. Lyle was arrested and lodged in jail at Martinez, after which one of the officers took the prisoner's boots and went to the scene of the supposed ambush, where he found in the brush alongside the road the imprints of a man's knees. The boots were found in the soft ground perfectly, and at this stage of the investigation the Alameda officers offered to hand over the case to the Contra Costa officers, but were detailed by the District Attorney to work it up.

"The officer continued the weaving of the chain of circumstantial evidence, and again returned to the scene of the murder. He went to the place where the tracks of the man's knees had been found, and about thirty feet from that spot found a small piece of paper that had evidently been used as wadding for a gun. It was a bit of newspaper, crumpled and powder-burned, but not be plainly read. At the trial the business manager of the Call identified the piece of paper as a part of an advertisement that had been printed in the paper on the same day and date as the paper found in Lyle's house. This little innocent-looking piece of paper was what completed the chain of circumstantial evidence, and consigned Lyle to San Quentin. It was further shown that on the night of the murder, between the hours of eight and nine o'clock, a woman's screams and entreaties had been heard issuing from Lyle's house. It is supposed that it was Mrs. Lyle, who knew that her husband was starting out to kill Sullivan, and tried to prevent his going. Notwithstanding the plain evidence in the case, it took three trials to convict the cold-blooded murderer, and the last jury found him guilty of murder in the first degree, a verdict that caused great dissatisfaction. I don't generally believe in hanging a man on circumstantial evidence, but that chain was so strong that no doubt could be entertained of his guilt. As a strange case it beats anything in California's circumstantial history."

It is not the necessities of life that cost much, but the luxuries; and it is with the major part of mankind as it was with the Frenchman who said that if he had the luxuries of life, he could dispense with the necessities. Mere living is cheap, but as the hymnologist says, "It is not all of life to live."

HOW BAKER WAS DEFEATED.

Full details are given by the London papers of the defeat of Baker Pasha, briefly reported by cable. It appears that on Sunday evening, Feb. 3rd, Baker's force, thirty-six hundred strong, encamped two miles from Trinkitat. The night passed off quietly, and before daybreak on Monday morning, at half-past 7, three hundred baggage camels were laden and ready to move forward. The guns moved in advance of the column, the infantry following them, and the greater part of the cavalry were scattered round in a circle of skirmishers, a halt mile or so from the column, thus effectively protecting it from any sudden attack. The Turkish cavalry were in reserve. "Shortly after 8 o'clock," says the special correspondent of the London Standard, "parties of the enemy were sighted. These retired slowly upon the approach of cavalry skirmishers, but showed more and more thickly as we advanced. At half-past 8 the column halted. A Krupp gun was brought forward and unlimbered, and a few rounds of shell were fired. It was hardly to be expected that any execution would be done upon the scattered parties of the enemy, but the effect was to cause them again to fall back. About 9 o'clock the enemy again approached, this time in considerable numbers. The guns of the attacking party opened fire, and the force was ordered to advance. When the cavalry skirmishers came up with the enemy they were soon hotly engaged. Presently about a dozen Arabs riding bareback-ed on wiry little horses, appeared from behind a hillock and coolly galloped around our right flank within three hundred yards of our cavalry on that side, running the gauntlet of the latter's fire. They passed scatheless, and as they still kept along parallel, to our column with the evident intention of gauging its strength and disposition, the general ordered the Turkish cavalry to CHARGE THEM AND CUT THEM OFF.

After a hot chase the enemy escaped, but as the Turks rode back again toward the column they again appeared, and this time time galloped across our front and around to our left. While our attention was distracted from the front by this incident, a sudden commotion arose in the midst of our cavalry skirmishers on our left flank. The enemy must for some time have been lying concealed close to them, and they now sprang to their feet, and with wild cries charged the Egyptian horsemen. These at once turned rein and came galloping in in a wild and disorderly fashion. The order was then given for the infantry to form square--a manœuvre in which they had been daily drilled for weeks. At this crisis, however, the but half-disciplined mass failed to accomplish it. Three sides were formed after a fashion, but on the fourth side two companies of the Alexamdria regiment, seeing the enemy coming on leaping and brandishing their spears, stood like a panic-stricken flock of sheep, and nothing could get them to move into their place. Into the gap thus left in the square the enemy hotly poured, and at once all became panic and confusion. The troops fired, indeed, but for the most part straight into the air. The miserable Egyptian soldiers refused even to defend themselves, but, throwing away their rifles, flung themselves on the ground and groveled there,

SCREAMING FOR MERCY,

No mercy was given, the Arab spearmen pouncing upon them and driving their spears through their necks and bodies. Nothing could well surpass the wild confusion which the mass presented—camels and guns mixed up together, soldiers firing in the air, with wild Arabs, their long hair streaming behind them, darting among them hacking and thrusting with their spears. The right side of the square was not at first assailed, but kept up a continuous fire toward their front, which killed many of our cavalry.

"When the charge had been made by the enemy on the left flank Gen. Baker, with his staff, were out with the cavalry in front. Upon riding back they found that the enemy had already got between them and the column. They at once charged them and cut their way through, but not without several being killed, among them Abdul Rusac, the chief Egyptian staff officer. His horse was hamstrung, and as it fell he was instantly speared by the Arabs. On nearing the square the general had to run the gauntlet of the fire of the Egyptians in his front, who, regardless of what was going on around them, were blazing away in their front. When the general reached the square the enemy had already broken it up, and it was clear that all was lost. Gen. Sartorius, with his staff, had been in the inside of the square when the enemy burst into it. They in vain tried to rally the panic-stricken Egyptians, and were so cooped in by the huddled mass of soldiers that, for a time, they were unable to extricate themselves. When, at last, the Arab throng of spearsmen had thinned the throng of Egyptians, they succeeded in breaking out and in cutting their way through the enemy.

IT NOW BECAME A TOTAL ROUT,

the shattered column streaming across the plain toward Trinkitat, preceded by the flying cavalry, the enemy pressing hotly on the rear of the infantry and slaughtering at will, All mounted men unable to ride well were dismounted by the rush of the flying horsemen and killed. When last seen, Dr. Leslie, Morice Bey, and Capt. Walker, with drawn swords and pistols, were standing in a group surrounded by the enemy, close to the guns in the front face of the square. There also the Turkish battalion and thirty-six Italian policemen were annihilated, scarcely one escaping. So for five miles the flight and pursuit were kept up. The Massowah black battalion behaved well, and for a portion of the distance retired steadily, firing volleys into the enemy. Zobehar's blacks were undrilled and hardly able to fire their rifles, not having arrived long enough before the advance to enable the officers to get them into any shape. They therefore bolted as promptly as did the Egyptians. When the earthwork was reached, where we had encamped the night before, the general made great efforts to protect the rear of the flying fugitives by a charge of the Turkish cavalry with a few Egyptian horsemen, whose flight had been stopped by the officers, but nothing could induce them to charge. Half a regiment of Indian cavalry would have swept the plain of the scattered enemy with the greatest ease. However although the general could not induce the Turks to charge, he got them to form in line at the earthwork and to halt facing the enemy. The pursuit then ceased, the enemy doubtless, being afraid of the ships but, in fact, no gunboat was in the harbor, the admiral having ordered away the Decoy on the previous day. When the pursuit ceased the weary fugitives, horse and foot, with many riderless horses here and there among them, made their way across the two intervening miles of deep mud to Trinkitat. On reaching the shore they would have crowded into the few boats there and swamped them had not the English officers, revolver in hand, kept them back. Then they stood huddled together on the beach like a flock of sheep, and had the enemy come on the whole would have been butchered as easily and with as little resistence as so many sheep might have been. Gradually, as it was found that the enemy had really ceased in their pursuit, the panic subsided."

A writer in a scientific monthly asks: "What is a meter?" "Oranges should never be eaten in company," says an authority. We have noticed the disadvantage of eating oranges, too, and have come to the conclusion that the only way to really enjoy an orange is to retire to some sheltered spot in the grove, strip, seize the orange and go in swimming in it.

Need of Economy.

One of the hardest lessons in life for young people to learn is to practice economy. It is a harder duty for a young man to accumulate and save his first $1,000 than his next $10,000. A man can be economical without being mean, and it is one of his most solemn duties to lay up sufficient in his days of strength and prosperity to provide for himself and those who are or may be dependent upon him in days of sickness or misfortune. Extravagance is one of the greatest evils of the present age. It is underming and overturning the loftiest and best principles that should be retained and held sacred in society. It is annually sending thousands of young men and young women to ruin and misfortune.

Cultivate, then, sober and industrious habits; acquire the art of putting a little aside every day and for your future necessities: avoid all unnecessary and foolish expenditures. Spend your time in such a manner as shall bring you profit and enjoyment, and your money for such things as you actually need for your comfort and happiness, and you will prosper in your lives, your business, and will win and retain the respect and honor of all worthy and substantial people.

The family man resembles an oyeter on the half-shell. The shell is known at home, the soft side abroad. Some men carry this resemblance in their faces. A great many men have countenances like oysters.

Ned Clopper's Little Game.

OF LOVE AND LUCK.

BY C. M. FARMER.

IN TWO PARTS—PART II.

(Concluded.)

Sorrow broods in the Clopper household, now minus one of its members and half the contents of the family savings bank. The hay had been harvested and gathered into the barn, but not by the aid of Clopper junior. His chair was empty and the barn yard and pigstye knew him no more. Not because he had carried into execution his late fire resolution to quit the farm summarily on being rejected by his fair enslaver and to fashion his passion and his patrimony together. No bloody weapon or empty poison bottle was picked up on the bank of the mill pond, and no new straw hat discovered floating sadly on its surface. No coroner's jury encountered four abreast through the hayfield, or made a smoking room of the best parlor, and no police detective rendered the usual delicate attention to the mistress of the house by poking his nose into her secret closets and cross examining the cook with her chin between his thumb and finger. Nothing of the kind. And yet sorrow brooded in the household; for young Ned, the future hope and mainstay of the family name and estates, was gone.

"My poor boy!" sighed Mrs. Clopper, "I hope he won't get into bad ways in that awful city. I'm told New York is an awful bad place for young men—so many wicked young woman and other sinful temptations, as parson Taggart says—and he's seen em himself. Poor Ned!"

One time poor Ned, seated one drizzly Sunday morning in his seven by twelve chamber on the third floor of his Bowery boarding house, scanned with profound interest the "want" column of the Herald to find some opening to the speedy fortune he had determined to amass without loss of time. There were plenty of them, and from among them he picked out one that looked the most promising:

"Wanted—A young and active man of good address and neat appearance to take orders in this city and Brooklyn. Ten to twenty dollars a day easily made. Address A. S., box 17,963 Herald office."

"Just the thing for me," said Ned to himself, as he proceeded to answer it. "What a turnip I have been to waste my time the last two years on that precious old farm, instead of coming to New York and pocketing the greenbacks and enjoying myself. Oh, Angelica—if I only had a castle on Murray Hill and money enough to keep it up, how happy we both might be!"

He hadn't quite got over it yet, but pretty nearly. Remembrance of that dimpled face and those brown curls, those bright eyes and berry lips—would often come over him like a warm perfumed bath, but the prospect, so close at hand, of making lots of money and being recognized a city man—even of throwing Van Dyke Nostrand in the shade, and mayhap supplanting him in the heart of pretty Angelica Bruce, soon over ore all other considerations, and he began to feel as if he had the first installment of fortune already in bank.

Two days afterwards he received a postal card invitation to call on the long eared proprietor of box 17,963 at his office in Park Row, and straight way sought the interview. A lank, sallow-faced man, with blue spectacles on his nose and a scant crop of very red hair on his head, sat at a low desk covered with pamphlets and prospectuses, who greeted our bucolic hero with an inquisitive stare, beginning at his straw hat and ending at his boots, and then asked him through those where he hailed from, how old he was, what his father did for a living, how many besides himself were in the family, if he smoked cigars, drank lager, or played poker, and propounded several other pertinent interrogatories touching his qualifications as a young man of business capacity, to all of which Ned returned satisfactory answers.

"See here then," said blue spectacles, selecting a pamphlet from a pile at his elbow and handing it to Ned—"Here's a specimen of my great work on Electro-Biological Longevity, and the Science of Transmogrification, illustrating the Evolutionary Progress of the Adipose Tadpole into the Succulent Bullfrog; together with didactic, acrobatic, hydropathic and sporadic essays on Anthropological and Ethnological subjects. All you've got to do," said blue spectacles, taking breath, "is to get the prospectus by heart and—and take as many orders as you can. Price ten shillings C. O. D., and your commission ten per cent. payable every Saturday night."

Ned remarked that he'd think of it, and left. The greenback prospect didn't look so right as it had looked—seemed to fade into an air castle as far as his approach to it was concerned. And Angelica stocks had gone down several points below par. He went to his room and reflected on the situation. He read the advertising column again and arrived at the conclusion that humbug was the watchword and in life's game. A brilliant notion struck him. He would invest half of his capital in printer's ink and call in the aid of forty millions of the American people. The next Sunday's Herald contained the following tempting morsel:

"Corns in the feet effectually and permanently cured in one hour. Recipe forwarded to any address in the United States or Canada on receipt of ONE DOLLAR. Address Dr. Edward Clopper, New York city."

In the course of the next twenty days bushels of letters, each containing the required remittance, were poured down at Dr. Clopper's feet. Genius is equal to any emergency. He didn't pocket the greenbacks and depart by steam to a foreign shore as might be supposed. But he again called in the printer's and stationer's aid, hired half a dozen rapid writers at two dollars a week, and every day the outward mails groaned under the loads of closely sealed envelopes containing the following laconic formula in black letter type:

One day a stylish looking gentleman in blue broadcloth with bright gilt buttons and a military cap with gold lace scroll work on the front, and carrying under his arm a short stout mahogany-colored cane, walked into Ned's office (he had of course taken an office in an upper loft of a down town building.) and remarked in suave and kindly genteel manner that a certain little game had better be stopped. He didn't like to interfere in a gentleman's business, and far be it from him to dictate, but he thought it would be safer for all parties (without specifying the parties) that the litle game be stopped. He was a gentleman of friendly and persuasive accents, and Ned being open to conviction under the argument, it was presently agreed between them that it was perhaps better for all parties to stop the little game.

Ned concluded that he would quit business for a season—take a holiday, and see the sights of the town. He therefore closed his office, discharged his clerks, adorned himself in fashionable attire, and went one evening to the theatre. In one of the boxes close before him sat an old gentleman, a young gentleman, and a young lady. What! Not Squire Bruce, Angelica and the devoted Van Dyke Nostrand? No doubt of it. Ned could not stand it. He did not care any more for the play, and went home, leaving his dollar in the play house treasury and his heart in the proscenium box. Oh, Angelica!

He tried another species of dissipation next morning, and went into a gay looking saloon in the Bowery and called for a brandy smash. The barkeeper, who was reading the morning paper behind the counter, rose to wait on him. What! Not the gay and festive Van Dyke Nostrand with a castle on Murray Hill and a cottage at Long Branch? None other, by all the gods of mythology! Instead of white kids, and dazzling jewellery and generally perfumed operatic case of the previous night, he now wore a calico shirt and checked linen apron.

"I beg your pardon," said Ned, when he had sufficiently recovered from his surprise to speak, "but do I address Mr. Van Dyke Nostrand, the betrothed lover of Angelica Bruce?"

"I—really—well—I don't exactly understand you, sir," stammered the mixer of drinks.

"Now look here, old fellow," said Ned, "you're pretty sharp, I've no doubt. But you're a little too sharp to last. I expect to marry that young lady myself in a few months (he didn't expect anything of the kind) and though I have no castle on Murray Hill and no cottage at Long Branch, I think my claim will be preferred to yours—especially when you write and tell her that circumstances over which you have no control will prevent you seeing her again. Write it at once, and I'll take it to her. I respect your feelings as a gentleman, and while I'm compelled to trip you up in this little game of yours, I'll not expose you to the squire who would cut your throat on sight and hunt you all over the town to do it."

* * * * * * * *

"The infernal scamp! Where is he?" roared Squire Bruce, "I'll murder the vagabond—I'll ruin him!"

"Gone to Salt Lake," quietly answered Ned. "He has seven wives there and they have been rather urgent of late for him to come home and take care of the babies."

"Oh, good gracious me!" cried Angelica sinking back on the sofa in her father's parlor. "To think he should be such a—oh my—the idea!"

"Hold on, cried Ned, stepping forward and grasping the squire's hand, "Hold on. No harm's done. I'm your natural born son in-law. I've saved you from an awful disgrace. Angelica never loved the fellow—she told me so this morning when I brought her his letter. I've no establishment on Murray Hill, but I've got a few dollars in bank and can take care of her in an honest sort of way. What do you say, old man?"

"Ned Clopper," replied the old man in a sudden burst of friendship, "you're a brick! Take her if she's willing, and God bless you both!"

"Angy," said Ned turning to the little beauty and holding out both hands, "will you have me?"

"I don't mind," answered Angelica "you're a good sort of boy, and I always liked you. But goodness gracious me! The idea of being so fooled."

"I've played a little game of Love and Luck," said Ned, "And have won—"

"What?" asked Angelica, looking up into his face with the sweetest of smiles.

"A wife!" said Ned.

THE CUP THAT CHEERS.

A Short Crop and Heavy Speculations.

There is a large speculation in Japan tea in progress, and within a few days the transaction at the Importers' and Grocers' Board of Trade, in New York, have involved 4 250,000 pounds. A short time ago the sale of 50,000 pounds was considered quite a large business. Now the speculation is so brisk that 1,800,000 pounds are sold in a single day. The trading in black tea is not so large, yet 585,000 pounds have been sold within three days. Prices have been advancing steadily, owing to the speculative excitement, and are now three to four cents a pound higher than recently. Besides the business on the Exchange, fully 30 000 chests of oolong have been sold to speculators within a short time.

"An advance of three cents a pound in tea," says a broker, "means a rise of $1 25 a chest, and if a speculator has 10,000 or 20,000 chests on hand it is an important matter. The advance is not due to fears of prolonged trouble between France and China, whereby the great tea ports of Shanghai, Amoy and Foochow might be closed by blockade. The season is over there, and there is no tea to export. It is due solely to a marked decrease in the crop. Last year the exports of black tea to this country from China were 22,129,992 pounds; but while we received 80,000 chests of Amoy oolong, only 40,000 chests will be sent here this year. There will also be some decrease in the supply of Japan, of which 34,314,000 pounds were sent here last year. Some think the quantity will be 2,000,000 pounds less. But it is in green that the largest decrease is expected. Last year we received 18,000,000 pounds: this year only 12.000,000 pounds are expected. Less green tea is being raised in China, partly because of the exclusion of the Pingsuey tea that excited so much complaint here last year, and principally because of the extreme cheapness of tea in this country. Chinese planters say there is too little money in tea at the present prices.

Food and Brain Work.

An organism which is doing brain work as well as muscular work requires higher food than an organism in which the brain is comparatively idle and only the lower centres and the muscles do the work. Undoubtedly the effect of brain work is to strengthen the brain and render it less likely to become abnormal in its structure or disorderly in its activity than if it were idle. Such exercise as the brain receives in education, properly so-called—that is, development of the faculties—stimulates nutrition, and in so doing increases the need for food. Excessive activity with anxiety is not good at all, and ought to have no place in the educational process. Worry is fatal to good work, and to worry the growing brain of a child with work is to maim and cripples its organization, doing irreparable, because structural, mischief, the effects of which must be life-long. "Tension" in work is not a proof of strength, but of weakness. A well developed and healthy grown brain works without tension of any kind. The knit brows, straining eyes, and fixed attention of the scholar are not tokens of power, but of effort. The true athlete does not strain and pant when he puts forth his strength. The intellectual man with a strong mind does his brain work easily. Tension is friction, and the moment the toil of a growing brain becomes laborious it should cease. We are, unfortunately, so accustomed to see brain work done with effort, and to regard "Tension's" as something tolerable, if not natural. As a matter of fact no man should knit his brow as he thinks or in any way evince effort as he works. The best brain work is done easily, with a calm spirit, an equable temper, and in jaunty mood. All else is the toil of a weak or ill-developed brain straining to accomplish a task which is relatively too great for it.

Bulwer's Gambling.

Early one morning Bulwer, the novelist, returned to his hotel from a gambling-house, where he had been passing the last hours of the night. For the first time in his life he had played high; and, with the insidious good fortune so frequently attendant on the first steps along what would otherwise be the shortest and least attractive pathway to perdition, he had gained largely. The day was dawning when he reached his own rooms. His writing-desk stood upon a console in front of a mirror; and pausing over it to lock up his winnings, he was startled and shocked by the reflection of his face in the glass behind it. The expression of the countenance was not only haggard, it was sinister. He had risked far more than he could afford to lose; his luck had been extraordinary and his gains were great. But the ignoble emotions of the night had left their lingering traces in his face, and as he caught sight of his own features still working and gleaming with the fever of a vicious excitement, he, for the first time, despised himself. It was then he formed a resolution that, be the circumstances what they might, no inducement, whether of need or greed, should again tempt him to become a gambler.

Dr. Moffat's Ammoniaphone.

A remarkable discovery is reported on the authority of a fellow of the Royal Meteorological society, to which the attention both of the faculty, and of the society, can not be too speedily directed. Dr. Carter Moffat, cousin of the late Dr. Robert Moffat, claims to have invented, after nine years' study, an instrument known as the ammoniaphone, which contains an absorbent material saturated with peroxide of hydrogen combined with condensed ammonia and other ingredients, through which a current of air is drawn into the lungs. This is said to be in reality a highly concentrated artificial Italianized air, in an extremely portable condition. Dr. Carter Moffat's voice was originally very weak, harsh, and destitute of intonation. By the use of the ammoniaphone it has now become a pure tenor of extraordinary range. He noticed that after experimenting on himself for only fourteen days an expansion of the chest took place to the extent of over half an inch, with a feeling of increased lung space and power of voice, which has since been msintained. Experiments have been made upon choirs in Scotland with extraordinary success. As there are a good many choirs in England, to say nothing of the opera companies, which stand in great need of improvement, the ammoniaphone is certain to be in great demand.—Pall Mall Gazette.

An Inconstant Moon.

An account of the halting, for pecuniary reasons, of two stage-coaches in Texas says that a passenger named Moon levelled a pistol at one of the three robbers "but desisted from firing upon discovering a Winchester pressed against his own ribs by a highwayman." A little son of John Spinks, Toronto, had his foot crushed by a G. T. R. express train some time ago. Two doctors attended him without benefit, and amputation was proposed but Hagyard's Yellow Oil was tried, which gave prompt relief and effected a speedy cure, even removing all stiffness of the joint.

At a recent party; Anxious young man—"Miss B., may I have the sixth dance with you?" Miss B.—"As we have no pencil I cannot mark it," A. Y. M.—"O, well, leave a space there and you'll understand." Miss B.—"Very well, then; when I see a vacant spot I shall know it is you." Exit anxious young man.

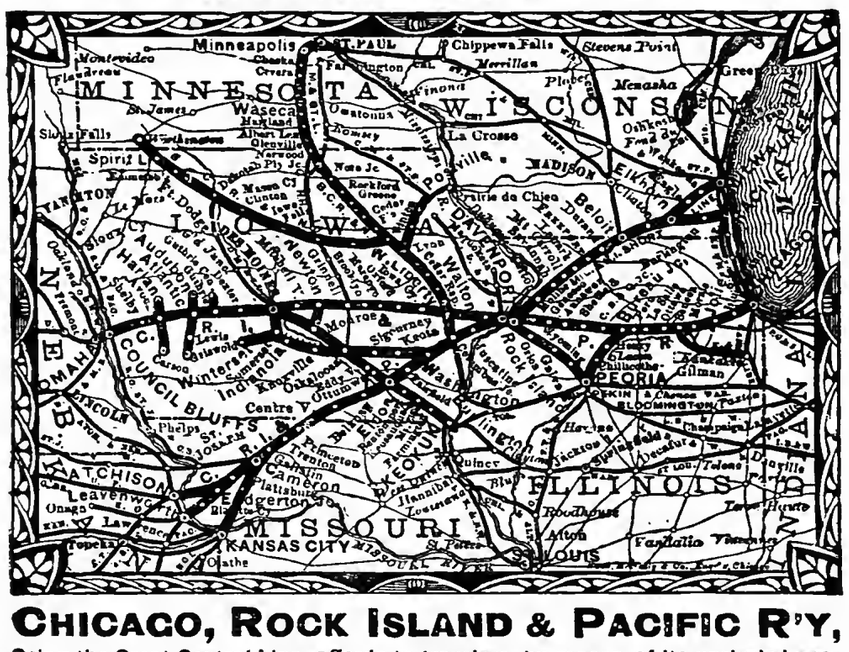
THOUSANDS SAY SO.

Mr. T. W. Atkins, Girard, Kan., writes: "I never hesitate to recommend your Electric Bitters to my customers, they give entire satisfaction and are rapid sellers." Electric Bitters are the purest and best medicine known and will positively cure Kidney and Liver complaints. Purify the blood and regulate the bowels. No family can afford to be without them. They will save hundreds of dollars in doctor's bills every year. Sold at fifty cents a bottle by A. Turner & Co. 3

"Backward, turn backward, O Time!" Papa—"According to this new standard, Minnie, we must set the clock back about ten minutes, eh?" Minnie (still in the market)—"Four minutes! Put it back lots, papa. Nothing less than ten years will do me any good!"



A DOUBLE BENEFIT.

James Moore, a prominent resident of Leamington, writes that he cured himself of dyspepsia of a year's duration by one bottle of Burdock Blood Bitters, and two bottles cured his wife who who had been for years a sufferer from the same disease. He conscientiously recommends it to all suffering from similar troubless.

New Customer—"I don't so much care what the things are made of, you know. All I want is to look like a gentleman." Tailor (with uncalled-for diffidence)—"Well, sir, I can assure you that I will do my very best."

Money-Lined Dresses.

HOW AN OLD LADY STORED AWAY FIFTEEN THOUSAND DOLLARS.

(From the Toronto News.)

Detroit. March 1.—Isabella McWean, an elderly woman living at Essex Center, Ont., for the last thirty years died. It was rumored that the old lady was the possessor of a large amount of money. She never associated with any of the neighbors. After her death the dwelling was searched, when the drawers of the bureau were found to contain a number of purses filled with bill. Bills were also found in her trunk and pinned to the lining of dresses. Hard lumps were felt in her bed, and upon cutting open the tick several bags of silver were found. When all the money was counted it was found that she was worth about $15,000. Most of this fortune will go to John McWean, a cousin of the old lady, who came from Scotland about a year ago.

The Methodist Union Bill passed the Private Bills Committee of the House of Commons without amendment.

Orangeville has passed a by-law separating the liquor trade from grocery stores. And Mount Forest is moving in the same direction.

The Spring Assizes for the County of Grey will commence at Owen Sound on the 15th of April, Chief Justice Wilson presiding.

A Hanover girl left her shoe out in the back yard last spring. The rain came and after a while the shoe was filled with water. Twelve families have since been supplied with soft water, and now that it is frozen over a company has been formed and money subscribed to roof it over for a skating rink.

The new post office at Tara has been completed, and is a credit to the village. The total size devoted to Her Majesty's mails is 32x16 feet; the waiting or delivery office is 16x18 feet. The whole office is lighted by large plate glass in the front. There are 250 boxes in all—30 of which are supplied with patent lock.

Good for Owen Sound.

Ottawa, Feb. 27.—The assistant traffic manager of the Canadian Pacific railway announces that lake steamers owned by that company will make Owen Sound, and not Algoma Mills, their eastern port. Traffic is to pass over the Ontario and Quebec road to Toronto, thence by the Toronto, Grey and Bruce railway to Owen Sound, where it will be placed on steamer for Prince Arthur's Landing.

A FAVORITE EVERYWHERE.

Wherever introduced Hagyard's Yellow Oil finds friends. It is the old reliable household remedy for external and internal use in all aches, pains, lameness and soreness of the flech. A. L. Green, a prominent druggist of Belleville, says: "It is a great favorite here and has a good sale."

FACT STRANGER THAN FICTION.

It is a fact that Alonzo Howe, of Tweed, had a fever sore that afflicted him for thirty-five years. Six bottles of Burdock Blood Bitters cured him, which he considers almost a miracle. It was but the natural result of the remedy restoring pure blood and perfect secretion.

Spelling Reform.

LECTURE BY W. HOUSTON, M.A., BEFORE THE CANADIAN INSTITUTE.

At the usual meeting ov the Canadian Institute, on Saturday evening, W. Houston, M.A., gave a prelection on "Old English spelling and pronounciation," with a view to the promotion ov the speling reform movement. After sketching briefly the history ov the language, he gave a number ov ilustrations ov the diference between the pronounciation of the Elisabethan period and our own, for the purpose ov showing that pronounciation is not fixed but changeable. He argued that as written language is but the dres ov spoken language, speling ought to change as pronounciation changes, and earnestly protested against alowing ourselves to be forever controled by the capricious speling fixed by printers and lexicographers in the eighteenth century. He cited Ellis and Skeat as authorities for the statement that in old England speling was intend to be fonetic, and that the variations in speling were due chiefly to local diferences ov pro nounciation. This statement was ilusirated by numerous specimens ov the speling of Milton, Spenser and stil older writers, those selected being men who would oven at the present day, but for their speling, be regarded as exceptionaly good scholars, though their indiference to uniformity in writing words would cause them to fail at an Ontario high school entrance examination. The lecturer closed with a brief statement ov the fonetical importance ov the speling reform movement in relation to common school education, and pointed out that a very large proportion ov the pupil's time is wasted, while his intellectual powers are often injured by the terrible drudgery ov lerning to read and spel. In the course ov the subsequent discussion, Mr. Houston was askt what limits he would assign to the reform ov speling. In reply he stated that the subject thus broached was too extensive to go into at that time, but ofered, if the council ov the institute had another Saturday evening to spare, to take it up and discus at length the history and objects ov the speling reform movement, and the relativ feasibility ov the various remedies proposed for the admited defects ov our English orthografy.

Kimberly.

From our own correspondent.

Times here are lively and building operations will be brisk when spring opens.

Prof. Mason, phrenologist, visited this place a short time ago. I understand Dr. Campbell, phrenologist, will also come this way shortly, so you see we will have ample means of finding what we are good for. Some of us were of opinion that there might be a Wellington, Pitt, or Burns among us who would only require practice to develop the latent talent. Prof. Mason was unsuccessful in finding one, Dr. Campbell is a man of more extensive experience, perhaps he will succeed.

Our hotel-keepers' habits seem to clash with the Crook's Act.

In election matters there is considerable speculation as to who the coming man will be. Some say Myles is not just perfect, yet to take him all around he has, perhaps, as many good points as any in the field.

Flesherton.

From our own correspondent.

The Flesherton monthly cattle fair was largely attended on Monday last. A large number of bovines were on the market. A good number changed hands at good prices, the effect of which seemed to be felt in business. The business places were crowded with customers the most of the day.

Some days ago Mr. John Pedlar, a farmer a short distance from the village, had the misfortune to loose a valuable horse, caused by the playful conduct of its mate by kicking, striking it on the leg and breaking it. The wounded animal had to be shot.

Dr. Campbell, Phrenologist, is still kept very busy, large, attentive and appreciative audiences attend his very interesting lectures, given in the Town Hall most every evening.

Dr. Christoe is to-day (Wednesday) prostrated with a severe attack of inflamation on the lungs. A number of medical men were in the village yesterday attending the nominations. We understand they all paid our respected Dr. a friendly visit.

How is it going? Who will be elected? Hurrah for Cameron? Hurrah for McColeman, and such like salutations grated one's ears as they passed to and fro through our village until Tuesday, when the time of the Cameron men suddenly ceased, Mr. Cameron having withdrawn from the field, much to the dismay of many of his friends and supporters. It now leaves Mr. McColeman and Mr. Myles for the contest. But we think Mr. McColeman will have an easy walk over the course, Not much sympathy appears to be expressed in these quarters for the poor fellow, Robert, who is sitting on the fence trying to look both ways, and wanting to see which way the wind blows. We think the intelligence of East Grey will elect him to stay at home.

Dr. Sproule, our popular representative for East Grey in the Commons, is steadily increasing in influence and ability as a speaker. having made, on Tuesday, nomination day, what was considered, by friend and foe, one of the soundest, most forcible and telling political speeches that has ever been given in East Grey.

A STARTLING DISCOVERY.

Physicians are often startled by remarkable discoveries. The fact that Dr. King's New Discovery for Consumption and all Throat and Lung diseases is daily curing patients that they have given up to die, is startling them to realize their sense of duty, and examine into the merits of this wonderful discovery; resulting in hundreds of our best Physicians using it in their practice. Trial bottles free at A. Turner, & Co's. Drug Store. Regular Size $1.00. 4

Dundalk.

From our own correspondent.

The coming election causes very little excitement here. Possibly after the visit of the candidate, which takes place this week, there may be more enthusiasm. The part Mr. Myles took in the late county valuation will prevent him from receiving much support from Osprey and Proton.

CHAPTER XIX.

Mr. Rayner was right. I was very tired; and the next morning I overslept myself, and did not come down-stairs until breakfast was more than half over. It had been unusually punctual, and, to my surprise, the brougham came round to the door as I went into the dining-room, and I found Mrs. Rayner in outdoor dress at the table.

"Well, Miss Christie, we have all got tired of you; so we are going to leave you all alone at the Alders," said Mr. Rayner, when he saw my astonished face.

And, when he had amused himself a little longer by all sorts of absurd stories about their departure, I found that he was going up to town for a few days, and that Mrs. Rayner was going with him as far as Beaconsburg station. He was going on business, he said; but he should combine pleasure with it—go the round of the theatres, and perhaps not be back until Saturday. This was Tuesday.

"Would you like to go to Beaconsburg with us? You have no lessons to do, as Haidee is still in bed. And I dare say you have some little purchases to make; and you can change the books at the circulating-library, and Mrs. Rayner will have a companion to drive back with."

Mrs. Rayner did not receive the proposal with enthusiam; but he told me to run upstairs, put on my things, and be down before he could count thirty; and I was in the dining-room again, panting and struggling with my gloves, in scarcely more than the prescribed time. There was plenty of room for me on the little seat in front of them in the brougham but I had great difficulty in dissuading him from sitting outside by the coachman in order to give us more room.

When we got to the station, we found we were there a great deal too soon. Mr. Rayner walked up and down, talking to the station-master and the people he knew, telling every one where he was going, and asking those among them who had been to London lately what were the best plays to go and see, and if they knew of a really good hotel, not too expensive, within easy distance of the theatres. He said to me once, when I was standing beside him—

"If anything should happen while I am away—if Haidee should get worse, or Mrs. Rayner frighten you, or anything—telegraph to me at once at the Charing Cross Hotel. I don't know whether I shall be there; but if you send it there it will reach me. You will find some forms in my study, and you will just write it without saying a word to anybody, and take it right to Sam, and tell him to go to Beaconsburg with it at once. Mind to Sam; don't trust any of the women-servants."

I wondered he did not entrust this duty to the all-important Sarah; but I accepted the charge without comment.

"What shall I bring you this time?" said he, just before the train came up. "Roses are out of season. Some more paste to match your pendant?'

'Oh, no, no!" answered I. "You know I can't wear it, Mr. Rayner; and it only makes me vain and makes me wish for more."

"Ah! though so!" said he, half to himself, maliciously. "Well, wishes always come true if one wishes them hard enough. I shall bring you some garnets. That is the most expensive red stone, and very pretty."

"Oh, I think I would rather not! I really don't want any jewellery, Mr. Rayner," declared I.

But the train had come up. He said good-bye affectionately to his wife and kindly to me: and we saw him off, and then made our purchases and drove back to Geldham. It was rather an uncomfortable drive, for the only remark Mrs. Rayner made was, when I said it was cold—

"Then you had better order them to light the fire in your room early, Miss Christie. Mr. Rayner will upset the whole household if you take cold while he is away.'

Then she shut her eyes and went, or pretended to go, to sleep, and I looked at her and thought what an unpleasant person she was, until the hollows in her face and the suffering expression about her mouth touched me. Why did she shut herself up and persist in being miserable, instead of returning her husband's love and changing the melancholy Alders into the cheerful, bright place it might be?

I spent a dull day; for, when I went to see Haidee, Mrs. Rayner instantly left the room, and I could not help seeing that it was to avoid me; so I was obliged to resist the sick child's entreaties for me to stay, and to go back and wander by myself about the house and garden, too miserable in my thoughts about Laurence and his cruel desertion of me to be able to read or work.

At tea-time Mrs. Rayner did not appear. Sarah said that Haidee was worse, and that her mother would not leave her. The evening was very cold, and, as Mrs. Rayner had rather ostentatiously told Jane to light Miss Christie's fire directly after dinner, I went up to my own room as soon as I had finished tea, and sat on the hearthrug, and nursed my sorrow where at least I could be warm.

It was about seven o'clock when Jane came up to say that Haidee was worse, and was crying out for me

"I think she is going to die, miss—I do indeed," said kind little Jane sobbing. "They won't let me in there; but I've been listening, for Mr. Rayner's away, and Sarah's out, and I don't care not that much for Mrs. Rayner!"—and she snapped her fingers contemptuously. "I heard Miss Haidee a calling for you, miss; and I don't believe she knows what she's saying, poor little dear, and they ought to send for a doctor; but I don't suppose they will. Sarah don't care, and Mrs Rayner, don't dare—that's about it, miss."

And Jane gave me a nod and an expressive look as I went out of the room with her. I knew the servants, one and all, looked upon their mistress as a poor-spirited thing while they had some admiration and a great deal of respect for their master. The few orders she gave they filled in a spirit of condescension or neglected altogether, while a word from him acted like a spell upon any one of them.

Thus, he having ordered that Mrs. Rayner, being an invalid, was not to be disturbed by sweepings, and dustings, and noises in the passage leading to her room, no member of the household ever dared to enter the left wing but Sarah, who had charge of the long corridor, bed-room, dressing-room, and store room which it contained, although it was shut out from the rest of the house merely by a heavy baize-covered swing-door with only a bolt, which was seldom, I believe, drawn in the daytime. So that Jane felt like a heroine after having ventured on the other side of that door; and, when we came to it, she stood looking first at it and then at me, as if to touch it again was more than she dared.

"Oh, miss," said she, as I stepped forward to go through, "suppose Mr. Rayner was in there?"

"But Mr. Rayner is in London" returned I, laughing.

"Ah, yes, miss! But he do come back that sudden sometimes he might be a ghost. Of course it's all right for you, miss; but, if he was to know I'd been in there, oh, miss, I should die o' fright! When he's angry, he just speaks fit to cut yer head off."

I laughed at Jane's fears, and pushed open the door, not without difficulty, for it was very heavy, and, Jane's courage having evaporated, she dared not help me. My teeth chattered as I went through this passage, it was so cold; and what was my surprise to find, when I got to the end, that the window had been left open on this chilly, and wet October evening? I took the liberty of shutting it, and, returning to the dressing-room door, I tapped softly at it. I could hear Haidee's voice, but I could not hear what she said, and Mrs. Rayner was sobbing and calling her by name. I went in softly, and with a shriek the mother started up from her knees; she had been on the floor beside the bed. Haidee knew me, though her cheeks were flushed and her eyes bright with fever, and she wandered in her talk.

I sat on the bed and tried to make her lie down and keep the clothes over her, for the room was as cold as the corridor. Mrs. Rayner was clinging to the rail at the bottom of the little bed and watching me with eyes as glittering as the child's. I felt just a little tremor of fear. Had I trusted myself alone with a sick child and a madwoman on the verge of an outbreak of fury? Her bosom heaved and her hands clutched the rail tightly as she said—

"What right have you to come here? Are you not snug and warm up-stairs in your turret? Why must you come and exult over me? You were welcome to my husband. Then you took my child. Can you not spare her to me now she is dying?"

I had heard that one must always talk to mad people as if one thought them sane; so I said—

"Not dying, Mrs. Rayner; don't say that. I came down just to see if I could be of any use. Why don't you take her into your own warm room? It is so cold in here. And wouldn't it be better to send in for Dr. Maitland? Oh, I forgot! He is away. But you might send Sam to Beaconsburg for Dr. Lowe."

Her manner changed. As she looked at me, all the anger, all the little gust of defiance faded out of her great eyes, and she fell to sobbing and whispering—

"I dare not—I dare not!"

"May I take her into your room, Mrs. Rayner?"

"No no."

'Then, if you will allow me, I will take her up into mine. You won't mind her being so far away from you, if you know it is better for her, will you?" said I persuasively. "It is so beautifully warm up there that it won't matter if she throws the clothes off her, as she can't help doing, poor little thing; and I'll wrap her up well, so that she shall not take cold on the way."

Mrs. Rayner stared at me helplessly.

"Will you dare?" she asked fearfully.

"Certainly, with your permission."

"You know very well that my permission is nothing," sobbed she.

"And I don't wonder, you poor spiritless thing!" I thought to myself. But I was very sorry for her; and I asked if she would like to have my room for the night, to be near the child.

But she was frightened at the idea; so I wrapped the child up well in a blanket, thinking I would put her in my own bed until her little one could be taken up-stairs. I was rather frightened myself at the thought of giving such an order to the awful Sarah, and, just as I was debating with myself whether she would be likely to obey it, she entered the room. I attacked her at once.

"Sarah, I want you to bring Miss Haidee's bed up into my room, if you please. This is too cold for her. Jane can help you if it is too heavy."

She seemed not to be quite sure whether to be insolent or submissive. She decided for the former.

'And by what authority, miss, do you give orders for moving around the furniture?"

"Your mistress wishes it to be done."

"My mistress! And pray who is that, miss?"

"You know—Mrs. Rayner."

"And is that all the authority you have, miss?"

"No," said I boldly; "more than that—Mr. Rayner!"

The women both started, and Sarah took up the bed and without a word went out of the room. I turned to Mrs. Rayner.

"Don't be alarmed about Haidee," I said gently. "I'll take great care of her. And, if you will just give your consent, I will send for a doctor on my own responsibility."

"Heaven bless you, Miss Christie!" she murmured; and, turning away, she sank down upon an empty space where the bed had been, and burst into a flood of tears.

She would not listen to the few incoherent words I said to comfort her; and I was obliged to leave the room with tears in my eyes, and carry my patient up stairs. I could not go very fast, for the burden was rather heavy for a small woman like me; and by the time I got up-stairs the bed was ready, and Sarah had disappeared.

And now how to get a doctor? For I was seriously alarmed about the child. To expect any more help from Sarah was out of the question. I went down to the nursery, called Jane, who was just going to bed, and asked her where Sam slept.

"In the village," said she.

Nobody slept at the stables now that Mr. Rayner was away, except the old gardener, who would certainly never reach Beaconsburg before daybreak if I sent him out at nine o'clock at night. Jane was too young to be sent all that way alone at night, the cook too old. There was only one thing to be done; I must go myself.

"Go and ask cook, if she is not asleep, to lend me her big round water-proof cloak, Jane," said I, "and bring me one of Miss Haidee's Shetland veils."

She ran away, astonished, to fetch them; and then, seeing I was in earnest, she helped quickly and well to make me as like a middle-aged countrywoman as possible by buttoning my cloak, fastening a garden-hat round my head like a poke-bonnet, and attaching my veil to it. Then she tied up my umbrella like a market-woman's, and let me out, giggling a little at my appearance, but promising faithfully not to leave Haidee till my return, and to "stand up to Sallie" if she interfered.

I felt rather frightened at the boldness of my undertaking as I heard the hall door close upon me, and I realised that I had nothing in the world but my umbrella and my wits to protect me all the long three miles and a half of road to Beaconsburg. The moon was at the second quarter, but did not give much light, for it was a cloudy night, raining now and then. I was not sorry for this, as I was the less likely to be recognised, and it was not the sort of weather to encourage late loiterers. I passed two or three villagers, only one of whom walked unsteadily; but none of them took any notice of me; and I had got past the last of the Geldham cottages, and on to a piece of straight road up a hill, where there was no houses in sight, when I heard the sounds of a vehicle coming along at a good pace behind me. It slackened to come up the hill, and I, to keep up my character, bent over my umbrella and walked more slowly. But this subterfuge had an undesired effect.

"Hallo, my good woman! Would you like a lift up the hill?" cried the driver; and my heart leapt up, for it was Laurence's voice.

In a moment I felt like a different woman; my blood seemed dancing for joy, my pulses beat more quickly, and the spirit of mischief came into me so that I wanted to laugh aloud.

"Ay, ay!" I grunted out slowly; and, waiting until the cart came up to me, I climbed with his help and with seeming difficulty, carefully keeping my cloak over my hands, on to the seat by his side.

"All right?" said he; and again I grunted "Ay, ay!" and on we went.

Oh, how happy I felt to be again by his side! But it was rather hard not to be able to take the hand that was nearest to me, and nestle up to his shoulder, and tell him how miserable I had been since last night, when he had rushed away with the dreadful threat of not seeing me again. Well, now he should see me again; he could not help himself. I felt rather nervous as to what he would say when I did discover myself. Was he still angry? Would he insist upon getting down and going the rest of the way on foot? Or would he say more unkind things to me? Or would he be pleased to see me, and forgive me?

He was not in a very conversational mood. Was he thinking of me, I wondered, or was it only that in my disguise I did not promise to prove an entertaining companion? He asked me if I was going to Beaconsburg, and I said "Ay, ay!" again. I knew very well that a real countrywoman would not say "Ay, ay!" and I was surprised that it did not strike Laurence himself as a strange sort of answer.

I began to get impatient for him to know me. I looked at him furtively; he was evidently not at all curious or interested about his companion. But he looked very grave and thoughtful; and presently, to my exceeding comfort, he pulled down over his wrists two little uncomfortable woollen cuffs that I had made, that he had bought of me at the sale. I remembered them quite well, we had had a struggle to get them over his wrists, as I had made them a convenient size, too large for a woman and too small for a man. It seemed to me that he handled them lovingly. Upon this encouragement I spoke.

"Aren't you going to talk?" said I in my natural voice.

We had passed the hill, and were going along at a good pace; but he gave the reins such a jerk that the horse stopped.

"You won't be cross with me again, will you?" said I, anxious to pledge him to good temper while he was in the first flush of his joy at meeting me; for it was joy.

He slipped the reins into his right hand, and put his other arm around me and kissed me, Shetland veil and all. And so we made it up without a word of explanation.

I told him my errand, and he told me his. His father had gone up to town that day to arrange for the disposal of some shares in order to purchase a farm for Laurence a few miles off, which was to be stocked, according to his promise, while his son was away. He was to return by train which reached Beaconsburg about ten o'clock, and Laurence was on his way to meet him.

"We will call at Dr. Lowe's first, and then you shall go on with me to the station and see my father," said he.

I protested a little that I ought to go back with the doctor; but of course he carried his point.

"What do you want a farm for, Laurence?" I asked, as we waited outside the station.

I remained in the cart holding the reins, for fear my quiet appearance should excite curiosity regarding young Mr. Reade's companion if I got out and went into the station with him. But he stood by my side holding my hand under my cloak while we talked in a low voice.

"What do I want a farm for? Why to have a home for you and a something to live on, of course! I know something about farming, and it doesn't matter if I do lose a little just at first."

"But why did you want to go on preparing a home for an 'accomplished coquette,' whom you said last night you were never going to see again?"

"One isn't always answerable for what one says to a tormenting little witch like you," said Laurence, laughing. "You did'nt suppose I was really never going to see you again, now did you?"

"I shouldn't have cared," said I.

"Ah, I was right about the coquetry! You wouldn't have told such a story before you went to Denham Court. I was coming to see you to-morrow evening. I've had to be away all to-day over at Lawley, and I have to be there again to-morrow with my father; but in the evening I shall call at the Alders and ask boldly for Miss Christie. So mind you are not out."

"I shall not promise."

"And we will have a good long talk together, since, thank Heaven, Mr. Rayner is away; and I will give you an address where a letter will reach me."

We were so intent upon our conversation that I did not notice that there was a man standing very near us during the last part of it. As Laurence finished speaking, he turned his head, and suddenly became aware that the train had come in while we were talking.

"By Jove! Wait for me, darling," he cried hastily, and then dashed off so quickly that he ran against the man, who was dressed like a navvy, and knocked his hat off.

When he returned with his father, who greeted me very kindly, he looked pale and anxious.

"Do you know who that man was I ran against?" he whispered.

"That navvy?"

"It was no navvy. It was Mr. Rayner."

"Laurence!" said I, incredulously.

"I tell you it was—I swear it! What was he doing, skulking about in that get-up? He came down by this train. He must have overheard what we were saying. Now mark what I say, Violet—I shall not see you again."

"But Laurence, how could he prevent it? You will come to the house and ask for me ——"

"Listen, Violet," he interrupted. "If you do not see me to-morrow night before seven o'clock, be at your 'nest' without fail at half-past."

"Very well, I will, Laurence—I will. I promise,"

But nothing would reassure him.

"I tell you it will be of no use, my darling—of no use. We must say good-bye to-night, for I shall not see you again!"

CHAPTER XX.

During the whole of the drive back to Geldham it was old Mr. Reade who talked to me, and not Laurence, who drove along, silent and grave, pulling my cloak affectionately up to my throat every now and then, and watching me as I talked to his father, but scarcely speaking himself at all. When we got to the gate of the Alders, he jumped out, carefully lifted me down, and, telling his father to drive on home, as he would walk the rest of the way, he came inside of the gate with me.

"Violet," he said very gravely, "I am afraid I have been foolish in agreeing to my father's wishes, and I am more anxious about you than I can tell. The Alders is no fit place for you. I can see quite well now what I could not when I was blinded by my passion last night, that you are so good and innocent that evil seems to have no power over you; but yet—— And—and it is just that which makes you so sweet; and I don't want to spoil it, opening your eyes, and all that." He was playing nervously with my hand, holding it against his breast, and looking into my eyes so miserably, poor fellow! "Look here, Violet!" said he suddenly, as if struck by a happy thought. "If any man, while I am away, tells you you are nice, and tries to make you think he is very fond of you—no matter who it is—Mr. Rayner or—or my father, or any other man—don't take any notice, and don't believe them."

But poor Laurence was more innocent than I if he thought I did not know what he meant. He was jealous of Mr. Rayner, and I could not persuade him how absurd it was.

I said, "Very well, Laurence;" but he was not satisfied. He went on trying to justify himself—not to me—he wanted no justification in my eyes—but to himself.

"What could I do, when my old dad offered to do so much for me, but let him have his way? But it was wrong, I know. Our engagement ought to have been open from the first; and his weakness in not daring to face my mother was no worse than mine in giving way to him. And now I am tortured lest my weakness should be visited on you, child; for I cannot even write to you openly, and, if I enclose letters to you to my dear old blundering dad, you will certainly never get them."

"Why not send them to Mrs. Manners, Laurence? Then they would be quite safe. And you don't mind her knowing, do you? I think she guesses something already," said I, smiling, remembering how she sent me to the gate to meet him on the previous Friday evening, the very night he first told me he loved me.

He caught at the suggestion eagerly.

"That is a capital idea, darling! I'll go to her before breakfast to-morrow morning and ask her to look after you as much as she can while I am away. I don't think she is very fond of my sisters—I wish they were nicer for your sake, darling, especially Maud. I wish some one would marry her; but no one is such a fool."

"Oh, Laurence, she is your sister!"

"I can't help that; I wish I could. Alice, the little one, isn't half so bad; it is only being with Maud that spoils her. If you ever get Alice alone, you will find her quite nice."

I had already had proof of that, and I told him so.

'But one can't confide in her, because she would tell everything to Maud, and Maud to my mother. You have no idea what the tyranny of those two women are like; my father dreads and I avoid them. My mother thinks she holds my destiny in her hand; but she is mistaken; and within the next six weeks she must find it out; for if she wishes to stay abroad longer, she will have to stay alone. By the third week in November I shall be back in England, and before the month is out you must be my wife, my darling."

"Oh, Laurence, so soon!"

A young Glasgowegian being on a visit to Dundee for the first time was taken through the "lions" by his friend, a native of the town. Nothing he saw, however, seemed to interest him, and after gazing about for a time as if something was lacking, he exclaimed, "But whaur's yer Green?" "Oh, we have nae Green here," replied his friend, "but we have——" "Dear me," broke in the son of St. Mungo, "hae ye nae Green? Then whaur on earth dae ye gang tae fecht?"

NAPOLEON THE GREAT.

(Syracuse, N. Y., Courier.)

"How long has he been in public service?"

"Before the memory of the oldest inhabitant."

"And he has kept his name untarnished during all that period?"

"Absolutely!"

"He is a man I should like to meet."

The above conversation occurred between two gentlemen at one of our leading hotels. The interrogater was from abroad, the other a resident of this city. The conversation had drifted into politics and Hon. Thomas G. Alvord was the man whose record and qualities were being discussed. To trace the history of public men who have grown old in the service is a task both interesting to the investigator and entertaining to those who read his investigations. It was with this truth in mind that the writer set out to call upon the man, about whom those politicians were so earnestly talking, at his spacious residence on Turtle street.

Mr. Alvord, who has been and is, familiarly known as "Old Salt," owing to his advocacy of the salt interest, is now well advanced in years, being on the shady side of seventy. He has long, white hair and a snowy beard which give him an appearance both dignified and grand. His voice is full and clear and the moment any stranger comes into his presence he cannot but be impressed with the inherent power of the man. Indeed he was endowed by nature with an unusually strong organization, both mentally and physically, which all the strain of public life, both as speaker of the Assembly and Lieutenant-Governor, failed, for many years, to in any way undermine.

It was during the year 1881, while Mr. Alvord was a member of the Assembly at Albany, that he first began to feel, most peculiar sensations. At that time he was in the midst of very important work, which was seriously interfered with by reason of the mysterious troubles which seemed to assail him. He felt unaccountable nausea almost constantly, accompanied by occasional violent retchings. History recounts that Napoleon the Great, while in the midst of his public career, was frequently attacked by an enemy greater than any he had ever faced, which came in the same insidious yet violent manner as the terrible troubles that overtook Mr. Alvord, and are to-day menacing so many thousands of others. In speaking on this subject to the writer, Mr. Alvord said:

"This same bitter experience came to me again in 1882 while I was a member of the Assembly, with symptoms identical to those I had felt the year before. I believe it was largely caused by my advanced years, for I had a 'worn out' feeling that was terrible. This conclusion is evidently the correct one, for I was again attacked last Summer while away from all cares and recreating at my Island in the St. Lawrence River. I experienced a painful sense of fullness in the lower portion of the body, accompanied by sensations of feverish heat or chilling shudders. All efforts to move my limbs or body were followed by intense weariness or exhaustion. Those who have reached my years can appreciate my sensations."

"And did neither yourself nor the physicians understand the cause or nature of these troubles?"

"It seems not entirely, for the physicians failed to relieve me and I kept growing worse. I suffered intensely and the only relief I could possibly obtain was by lying upon my back and this was only temporary."

"But you are looking well and strong now, Mr. Alvord. How did you bring about the change?"

"By using a remedy which is very popular and which I have found wonderfully efficient—Warner's Safe Cure. Indeed it has proven remarkable in its power over me. I believe in it and therefore recommend it to others, especially to those who are advanced in life; who feel a breaking down when there is no necessity and whose lost vitality and manhood remind them of their increasing years."

The interview then drifted to other topics but as the reporter gazed at the man whose experience is so ripe and who has seen so much of the different phases of life, he could not but wish that those who are suffering from the various forms of physical ailments and especially those persons who are advanced in years, might see and converse with the veteran whose experience and knowledge have been so rich and who is a firm a believer in the efficacy of the remedy that cured him. There is no excuse for shortening life, as so many have done as are doing. There is no necessity for "breaking down" early in years. Premature decay and death are a disgrace to our modern civilization. They are wholly needless and men or women who permit them when they can be so easily avoided should blame no one but themselves.

Chas. Snowdon and others shipped to Europe some time ago by the Guion line some cattle. In a storm which caused the ship to roll violently one hundred and fifty-six head died. Snowdon sued the Guion company and recovered judgment. The General Term recently reversed the judgment on the ground that the rolling of the ship was a peril of the sea, against which the defendant did not insure the plaintiff.

Before the British renew their attack upon the rebels, Osman Digma will be offered a conference. Five thousand rebels who fled from Tokar when the British entered on Saturday joined Osman Digma. Only one thousand of them were Sondanese, the rest being fanatics sent from Kordofan and Darfour. If Osman Digma refuses to surrender it is expected the rest of the tribes under the sheikhs will express a desire to come to terms.

Despatches from the scene of the late battle say that from rebels taken prisoners some significant information is being obtained in regard to the cause of the revolt against Egyptian rule. One of the natives told a correspondent that the rebellion was made inevitable by the grinding tyranny of the Khedive's tax collector. The people had no quarrel with the English. Indeed, it appears from statements by other prisoners that the rebels were not aware that they were to meet the British soldiers until they saw the white faces of their opponents approaching. They murmured against their chiefs for concealing the truth, but were none the less determined to fight to the death against renewed subjection to their oppressors.

SCIENTIFIC GOSSIP.

Good shellac varnish is made as follows: Take of very pale shellac 5 pounds, mastic 1 ounce, and alcohol 5 or 6 pints, and dissolve in the cold to prevent the evaporation of the alcohol, stirring the mixture meanwhile. This is a good varnish for furniture, and it is much employed in France by cabinet-makers.

Many very old and are silver coins in excellent preservation were lately found on a rock in a burn near Portree, Scotland. Antiquarians consider the "find's a very interesting one. The authorities have come into possession of about 53 of these relics. Some of the coins are of the reigns of Elizabeth and James IV., and bear dates ranging from 1574 and 1602.

If the expressed belief of some Cornish miners regarding the probable development of the tin mine of Cajalco, California, turns out to be verified ater on, it will prove of vast importance. hey are of opinion that the vein struck will ncrease in richness as it increases in depth. Lately the mine assayed 13 1 per cent, om the ore, of a purity of 0.98.

Herr. C. Schneider, of Dresden, has invented a dry galvanic battery. It consists of two cylinders, the larger one of copper and the inner or smaller one of amalgamated zinc. Both cylinders are open at each end, and the space between them is filled in with a mixture of Plaster of Paris and a saturated solution of chloride of zinc containing 7 per cent. of chloride of sodium.

The estimated total cost of fires and insurance companies of the United States is $150,000,000 a year. Commenting on this, the American Architect says that every man or woman in the community who is paid for his or her labor works one week in every year as a gratuitous contribution towards paying the salaries of insurance agents and the fire losses caused by carelessness or crime.

Iron sulphate is a good manure for certain kinds of crops. A plot of land to which the sulphate had been applied by Mr. A. B. Griffiths, of the Chemical Society, London, yielded 56 bushels of beans. A plot similar in other respects which had not been so manured gave 35 bushels. The ash of the plants from the first plot contained more iron and phosphoric acid than those from the second plot.

Frenchmen are beginning to outstrip both the English and the Americans in the ingenuity of their advertising dodges in the endeavor to attract attention to their discoveries. The following will serve as an example: A certain inventor of a face wash improves the shining hour of a family party to invite a reporter, who carefully inspects the physiognomies of the inventor's wife, daughter, and mother-in-law, and prints his impressions in praise of said concoction, giving the names of all the members of the family.

A solution has been attempted by M. P. de Gasparin of the remarkable sunsets which have excited the wonder of the world. For many reasons he discards the hypothesis that they were due to the action of falling stars, and considers that the luminous effects were produced by the light of the sun falling on an atmosphere charged with particles of matter, in a state of minute subdivision, at a great height above the earth, the exact nature and origin of which dust had not yet, however, been determined.

These are some of the results of the exploring expedition conducted by M. Alphonse Milne-Edwards, at the instance of the French Government, in the Atlantic Ocean on board the "Talisman." They were communicated at a recent meeting of the Academy of Sciences, Paris. The ocean to the west of Morocco and the Desert of Sahara is of almost uniform depth. Fish abound at a depth of 1,000 to 1,500 metres. Between Senegal and the Cape Verde Islands the nets of the exploring party reached a depth of from 3,200 to 3,655 metres and brought up many living specimens which have not hitherto been known to exist elsewhere. In these depth the fecundity of life is prodigious, and at one draught as many as 2,500 fishes were captured.

Miss Eva Mackay, daughter of the bonanza king, is at the head of a society of young ladies who go about doing what good they can among the worthy and deserving poor of Paris. It is a society that has abundant financial capital.

A new volume from Browning is promised. It will consist of one long poem, though the work will be about the same size as his latest volumes.

The traveller in Russian Central Asia pays for a camel about thirty dollars, for a horse from seven to fifty dollars, for a sheep from a dollar and a half to two dollars and a half, for a four-year-old cow five dollars and three-quarters, and for a luscious water-melon two cents.

A movement in England has for its object the abolition of the action for breach of promise. Such suits are alleged to have become so numerous that their influence is demoralizing, and the justice obtained by the action has become insignificant in comparison with its demoralizing results.

The State lottery in Saxony is an important source of revenue for that country, as it yields an annual surplus of $1,024,000, after deducting an outlay of $225,000. In the Imperial Assembly it was lately urged that all gambling enterprises were immoral, but the vote was against abolition.

At the tricycle exhibition at the Floral Hall, London, the machines of Starley and Sutton of Coventry carried away the prize. The "Imperial Club" machine of the former and the "Meteor" of the latter were to the front.

A lawyer pleading before Sir John Byles, recently deceased, said: "I would refer your lordship to a work in my hands—'Byles on Bills.'" "Has the learned author given any authority for his dictum? If not, I would not heed him. I know him well," interrupted the Judge.

Another old London landmark, dating from the time of Shakespeare and Justice Shallow, will shortly be swept away. The rumor which was current last year that Clement's Inn had been sold is now confirmed, and the quaint old building has been disposed of for about £50,000 to a private speculator.

There are groans over the prodigious expense of the London School Board. It has cost $25,000,000 to provide school buildings for 286,276 pupils, and even now a large proportion of the poorest children have not been reached. About 6,000 parents have been summoned to police courts annually for not sending their children to school.

John Brennan and Patrick Ford were drinking together in a saloon in Denver, Col. Patrick had played several practical jokes on his friend. Inspired by their memory, he stepped back to the stove, seized a kettle of boiling water, and poured it over Brennan's face and head "just for fun." Patrick is in jail. Brennan is still unable to see the joke.

The most adroit smugglers in the world are the smugglers of St. Gothard Tunnel, who carry tobacco in hollow loaves of bread, and coffee and jewellery in hollow cabbages, pears, apples, potatoes, wheelbarrow handles, and bedstead legs. The custom-house officers do their best, but confess that the women smugglers, by reason of their keener wit and more voluminous garments, are often too much for them.

Bicycle and velocipedes are allowed to roll through the streets of Paris, Munich, Pesth, Brussels and, other large European cities, subject in some of them to more or less regulation and restriction on the part of the police authorities; but in Vienna they are rigidly excluded on the streets. Several Viennese clubs devoted to bicycle and tricycle propulsion are now agitating for a repeal of the regulations, and are getting up petitions on the subject.

The Liverpool rowdy has a peculiar style of dress. The jacket, vest, and trousers are made of a thick, undyed cotton cloth called moleskin, which has something of a velvet smoothness and softness on its right side. The jacket reaches just below the hips and buttons to the throat over a scarf or muffler, and the number of its buttons is great. The trousers fit tight to the knee, from whence they hang with a rakish looseness and nearly cover the boot. Crowning all is a round worsted cloth peak cap, with a little round knob on the top, that makes a very suitable finish to the whole man.

Visitors at the Crystal Palace, London, are now amused and instructed with a giant electric microscope and a powerful electric light installation, which show a large number of familiar articles, such as snuff, lace, cheese, vinegar, water, and beer. A drop of water presents the most extraordinary monsters imagination can conceive. Serpents, crocodiles, worse dragons than St. George had to deal with, whirl about through their liquid element, striking terror to the hearts of all beholders. Salt and sugar are exhibited as densely populated, and even the most carefully filtered water is filled with black specks, which float rapidly about, giving an occasional eddying whirl which suggests vitality.

In full season millions of dollars were often turned out in one night at Crockford's celebrated gambling club in London. The net profits of the season were $750,000, and yet the weekly expenses averaged $5,000. The fitting up of the house cost nearly $250,900. Crockford's was ostensibly organized as a club, and the committee elected the members, but any one who had a fortune to lose could easily obtain admision. The Duke of Wellington was an original member, but was never known to enter the hazard room. For ten years before Crockford's was started there was very high play at Watier's (the principal frequenters of which were hopelessly ruined), at Brookes', and also at White's, where the late Lord Granville was the great player. He is said to have been nearly a million to the bad at the end of his career, although at one time he had won $550,000. Lord Granville once lost $115,000 at hazard at a single sitting of seven hours, and $50,000 at one night's whist.

It is a remarkable characteristic of the waiters in Paris restaurants that no matter what you ask for, even if it be a fried piece of the moon they will invariably reply "Yes," and either bring it to you, or, on returning, assert with sorrow that unfortunately there is no more left. It is told of Mery, the author, that by way of trying this as a joke he peremptorily ordered of the waiter a Sphinx a la Marengo. "I'm sorry to say we have no more," replied the waiter. "What, no more Sphinx?" exclaimed Mery, feigning astonishment. The waiter lowered his voice and murmured in a confidential whisper: "We have some more, monsieur, but the truth is, I would not care to give them to you, as they are not quite fresh."

A remarkable instance of honest bankruptcy has occurred in England. In 1874 Mr. Samuel Osborne, a steel manufacturer of Sheffield, was compelled to file his petition in bankruptcy, with liabilities amounting to £70 866, and assests estimated at £50,000. He bought back the business from the creditors by a composition of 12 shillings in the pound, payable in three installments, the last of which was paid three months before it was due. Mr. Osborne determined to pay the balance of 8 shillings in the pound, and set himself ten years in which to accomplish this task. A sum of £28,000 was required, and the other evening the creditors received the intimation that Mr. Osborne was now prepared to pay the whole of their claims in full.

The electriclight is not everywhere considered an improvement upon the old fashioned modes of illumination. One of the latest and best systems was recently introduced into the Court Theatre at Stuttgart, and it was supposed that the orchestra would find it very satisfactory. Instead of welcoming the change, however, they have just petitioned the management for a return to the old-fashioned oil lamps that they had been using previously. They say that the electric illumination has proved objectionable, because its brilliancy, with many, unpleasantly affects the nerves. They also assert that they now find it more difficult to follow the guidance of the leader. A committee of experts composed of oculists and disinterested musicians, has been appointed to examine into the matter.

WIT AND WISDOM.

Why is a railroad train like a vision of the night? Because it goes over the sleepers.

"Alice," said Mrs. Petulia in a subdued tone to her little girl one evening at supper, "you must eat bread with your jam." "But, mamma," protested Alice, "it's plenty good enough without bread."

"What a blessing it is," says Pat, slightly muddled, "that night niver comes on till late in the day, when a man is all toired out, and he couldn't work no more anyhow, at all, at all, not even if it was morning."

A little German lad who wanted to intimate his dissatisfaction at his having to put up with the worn cut clothes, toys, and picture-books of his elder brother Frank, said to his mother, "If this sort of thing goes on, mamma, I shall some day have to marry Frank's widow."

A Highlander taking an open-mouth pull in the morning at a running burn was accosted by his comrade with the question—"What are ye daen there, Donal?" "She's makin' toddy." "And where's ta whusky?" "She'll took it last night whatiffer I"

In the gardens of a certain nobleman's country house there happened to be fixed up at different spots painted boards, with this request: "Please not to pick the flowers without leave!" Some wag got a paint-brush and added an s to the last word.

A man at the Car Shops kindles the fire in his stove while under the blankets in his bed. He pulls a string. String explodes a cartridge. Cartridge sets fire to the wood, wood sets fire to the coal. Result: Mr. Man gets up in a warm room every time.

A very considerable hotel-keeper, at Geelong, advertising his "Dublin XXX" concludes the advertisement in the following manner:—"N. B.—Parties drinking more than four glasses of this potent beverage at one-sitting carefully sent home gratis; in a wheelbarrow if required."

An Englishman and a Scotchman, both commercial travellers, were bragging about the importance of the firms they respectively represented. 'You may judge of the extent of our business,' said the Englishman, 'that we spent two hundred and sixteeen pounds a year in ink for our correspondence!' 'That's nothing,' said the Scotchman,' my firm saves twice that amount yearly by not dotting it's i's or crossing its t's.'

A man who had been enjoying the New Year on returning late thus describes to his wife his impressions of a bird (which turned out to be an owl) which had flitted in a noiseless manner past him in a dark part of his journey, home:—"Guidwife (confidentially) I hae seen the nightingale on the road.' "Ye hae seen mare than yae gull the nicht, my guidman." "A weel, it's no a bonny bird. It had a face like a cat and a body like a doo, and it aye said, 'Hoo! Hoo!'"

A man told a story about a flock of rooks nine miles long, so thick that you could not see the sun through it. "Don't believe it," was the reply. "Wal," said the narrator, 'oou're a stranger, and I don't want to quarrel with you. So to please you, I'll take a quarter of a mile off the thinnest end!"

A man may become his own Grandfather thus:— A widower and his son marry; the father marries the daughter of a widow, and the son marries the young lady's mother, thereby becoming father (in-law) to his own father, and consequently grandfather to his father's son—that is, himself.

Force of Habit.—"Well, Tibbie, how do you feel to-day?" enquired Mrs. Aird of an old woman, who in former years had been in her service, and still gave a helping hand when occasion required. "Thank ye," said Tibbie; "I daurna compleen, in case I sud be waur; but losh, mem, its awfu' cauld weather." "It is indeed cold; but are you not aware there is nothing awful but the day of judgment?" added Mrs. Aird, smiling. "Deedless ye're richt," was the reply; "deedless ye're richt; but I hae got a most awfu' gait o' sayin' sae."

Floods and Forests.

It is not a matter of theory, but of demonstrated fact, that forests are the conservators of the water supply, acting, in effect, as does the bulk-head of a dam. In truth, however, the forests are more than bulk-heads, they are a whole board of public works acting to provide for the storage, maintenance, and proper distribution of an adequate supply of water for the entire surface of the earth. Agriculture, commerce and health wait on the preservation of the forests; famine, pestilence, flood, and drought wait on their destruction.

All of this has been demonstrated in the Old World, which, having spent centuries in the destruction of its forests, is now as anxiously guarding what remains, and vigorously replacing a portion of what has been taken away. In Germany, it is not too much to say, every individual tree has an official existence. Wood necessary for fuel or building purposes is supplied in abundance, but not until provision for an equal supply has been made by planting on reserve ground a number of trees, at the least equal in number to those cut down. By this judicious management several desirable results are brought about. The wood supply of Germany is greater than for centuries past, forest acreage is greater, available tillable land is constantly increasing in both value and quantity, floods in Spring and draughts in summer are of marked infrequency, and climate is more stable and salubrious.

In France, where the rivers Rhone, Saone, and Durance, particularly the latter, had for nearly two centuries caused great destruction by flood, an experiment was tried. It was asserted that the cutting away of the forests had not only caused floods, but what was even worse, had resulted in the carrying away of the rich surface soil of the hill-sides, thus giving over to starvation thousands of farmers, who could not coax crops from land once fruitful. In the Haute and Basse Alps, where the Durance and its main tributaries rise, the most wanton destruction of forests had taken place. The Durance, a sickly stream in summer, was a fearful, roaring torrent in spring. Farming land all about it was of little value. In 1860 the first steps were taken; the mountains were generously replanted with trees. In 1875 the disastrous floods in the south of France occurred. Theretofore the Durance had been the most dangerous of the tributaries of the Rhone; that year it flowed placidly on its way. It had already become a river in summer, and was no longer a torrent in the spring. The experiment was successful.

Two states of Europe are belated in the matter of forest preservation, and the results are plainly to be seen. In Russia, selecting one example, the Volga is so scantly supplied with water as to have decreased alarmingly in volume. The Caspian Sea has, in consequence had its level materially decreased. The Russian Government is doing something, but not much, to preserve its forests, which are proportionately more necessary to Russia than to any other country of Europe. Spain is even more derelict than Russia, and one writer on the subject does not hesitate to say that Spain's sad political condition is due to her neglect of the forests.

But even if the necessity for the preservation of forests were purely theoretical, it is so logical a theory that it ought to be given a trial. Rain falling on a forest trickles by way of leaves, twigs, branches, and trunks down into the soil among the roots, and finds its way to the natural underground reservoirs which supply the springs, which, in their turn supply the little streams. Rain falling on the bare side of a hill flows immediately off, and as it increases as it goes, finally is strong enough to carry away some of the rich surface soil. Thus the spring or winter floods carry off the water intended to be stored for the summer's use. Then, again, rain always falls more frequently over forests than over uncovered land, partly because the greater coolness of the forest tends to the condensation of passing clouds, and partly because the already charged clouds are attracted by the lofty trees. When rain has fallen on a forest, from one-half to one-third of the water is held by the leaves, and is given off again by evaporation, thus producing clouds which will soon give up the moisture again. At the same time, the water which reaches the earth is not retaken by the heat, but sinks into the ground. Finally, temperature is more equable in the forest than in the open, and consequently tracts of forest land exercise a tranquilizing influence to a great distance about them.

Another and sufficient reason for the preservation and regularation of forest is found in the fact that the wood supply of a country depends thereupon. By a proper system of replanting, the details of which several European states have carefully worked out, a plentiful supply of wood is compatible with forest preservation. Here is a sort of protection—self-protection—which the governing power of a nation may well interest itself in.—Harper's Weekly.

Hot Water for Dyspepsia.

A gentleman who is in business in this city, has cured himself of a chronic and ugly form of dyspepsia in a very simple way. He was given up to die; but he finally abandoned alike the doctors and the drugs, and resorted to a method of treatment which most persons would laugh at as "an old woman's remedy." It was simply the swallowing of a teacupful of hot water before breakfast every morning. He took the water so hot that he could only take it by the spoonful. For about three week this dose was repeated; the dyspepsia decreasing all the while. At the end of that time he could eat, he says, any breakfast or dinner that any well person could eat—had gained in weight, and has ever since been hearty and well. His weight is now between thirty and forty pounds greater than it was during the dyspepsia sufferings; and for several years he has had no trouble with his stomach—unless it was some temporary inconvenience due to a late supper or dinner out, and in such a case a single trial of his ante-breakfast remedy was sure to set all things right. He obtained this idea from a German doctor, and in turn recommended it to others—and in every case, according to this gentleman's account, a cure was affected.—American Paper.

The Standard.

MARKDALE MAR. 13, 1884.

—The practical work of Methodist Union goes smoothly on, and the prospects are that the final consummation will take place next June without any serious difficulty. The fearful ones, who so much admired the "principle" but who so much trembled at the many lions in the way of the plans submitted, are likely to be dissapointed,—happily or otherwise as the case may be. The legal difficulties are now being overcome by special Acts being passed both at Ottawa and Toronto. legalizing the titles of all church property in the new united church. Some oppositionists have been trying to make their influence felt in regard to the Bill at Ottawa, but they are evidently too weak in numbers to accomplish much. –Truth.

—There are a good many people in this country who take pessimistic views of the future of the Canadian Confederation. Most of these people have regarded the secession resolutions introduced at the farmers' convention at Winnipeg the other day as an indication of the speedy dissolution of the Confederation. The News pointed out the fact that the towns and cities would be almost unanimous in supporting the Dominion, even if the farmers did rebel. This statement has been borne out by a mass meeting of Winnipegers which was held Saturday night, when the secession resolutions were unanimously denounced. Some people seem to forget that Winnipeg is just as much of a Canadian city as Montreal or Toronto. Saturday night's meeting showed that it is just as loyal to Canada.—Toronto News.

BETTER TIMES AHEAD.

Quite an interest is manifested by farmers in the direction of having cheese factories established in various neighborhoods through the county, and too much encouragement cannot be given in that direction. If we take the experience of districts where factories have been established for a number of years, it cannot but give enthusiasm to those interested in this county. There are districts in the older settled portions of Ontario where the majority of farms were heavily mortgaged, before the introduction of cheese and butter factories, and very few years had elapsed after the attention of farmers had been directed to stock raising and dairying, until the mortgages were paid off, and agriculturists were comfortable with a balance to their credit. In fact many have become wealthy. The advantages are many: The expense is materially decreased, farm work is divided over the year more evenly, the fertility of the soil is much improved, and weeds and thistles more effectually exterminated. Our farmers are becoming fully alive to their best interests in this respect, and we have no doubt the change for the better in the near future will be even greater than even our most sanguine expectations.

GOVERNMENT ECONOMY.

That there is a superabundance of representatives in our County Councils, as well as in the Local and Dominion Parliaments, none will question, but how to remedy the felt evil is a question surrounded with difficulties. We believe, however, the time is not far distant when a reduction will be made in the representation throughout. Mr. Drury, member for East Simcoe, last week moved a resolution for a committee to consider the desirability of so amending the Municipal Act that the number of members in county councils may be reduced, and to collect evidence on the subject. He does not contemplate action being taken this year, but very properly appreciates the growing agitation in some counties where the county councils have proved to be unnecessarily large and expensive. The Committee's labors will no doubt serve to enlighten the public as to what means can be taken to reduce the expensiveness of such councils, and will doubtless result in material modifications in their constitution.

This is the commencement of a much needed reform which will, we hope, before many years, reduce the number of representatives one-half in each of the three parliaments, County, Provincial and Dominion. The probabilities are that there will be an Act passed the present session of the Dominion Parliament extending the franchise to the female sex, or those of them who have the property qualification which now entitles the male sex to a vote. This will largely increase the number of votes, which will in turn, under the present system, multiply the representatives in the various legislative departments very materially; be this as it may, there is room for improvement, and we believe public opinion is ripe for such a change. Grey Co. has already expressed its willingness to adopt such a reform, and doubtless other counties which have not yet tested the question will be found strongly in favor of reducing the number of their representatives, What say the press? We would like to hear.

Correspondence.

NOTICE.—We wish it distinctly understood that we do not hold ourselves responsible for the opinions expressed by our correspondents.

To Editor Standard:

SIR,—The Editor of the Advance grows furious in reference to my letter in the STANDARD of the 28th ult., which he styles a "Lying letter," and stoops to use threats against me if I venture another epistle.

He says I have "Left for other parts." I may here say those other parts are not many miles from Flesherton.

I am prepared to prove the truthfulness of my last letter in every particular, and would further state that had the editor of the Advance kept his word and forwarded the printed matter, it would have been paid for long since, but he failed to do so, hence the trouble. In reference to an item in last week's Kimberley correspondence to the Advance insinuating that I had left a small board bill unpaid, I give it a flat denial. It is evident the writer of the Kimberley correspondence to the Advance is possessed of a liberal portion of the spiteful nature which is so largely developed in the editor of the Advance. I presume it runs in the blood.

CRUSHED BY THE CARS.

A little son of John Spinks, Toronto, had his foot crushed by a G. T. R. express train some time ago. Two doctors attended him without benefit, and amputation was proposed but Hagyard's Yellow Oil was tried, which gave prompt relief and effected a speedy cure, even removing all stiffness of the joint.

ENTERPRISE EXTRAORDINARY. — Our respected townsman, Mr. Shanahan, manufactured and sold more vehicles last year than any other carriage maker in this county; but this season he is going to eclipse the past altogether. He has stock on hand for 115 wheeled rigs, 45 of which are now well advanced in course of construction. His stock is by far the best ever brought into this district, while his mechanics are thoroughly master of their business, so that the public who patronize him can fully depend on genuine satisfaction. It is a pleasure to us to speak a word for a business man when such is merited, and in this case we cannot speak too strongly or recommend too highly. Mr. Shanahan took orders last Monday for twelve wheeled vehicles, and will doubtless dispose of the whole number, for which he has the material on hand, before the season is very far advanced.

DANGER TRAPS.

Neglected colds are the fatal traps that ensnare many a victim beyond possibility of of rescue Take a cold or cough in time and it is easily conquered by that safe and pleasant vegetable remedy, Hagyard's Pectoral Balsam. TEA-MEETING.—The entertainment given in Lyons' Church, town line appointment, on Wednesday evening last was a decided success. The church was packed full, and all appeared to thoroughly enjoy themselves. The refreshments were certainly a credit to the ladies of that neighborhood, both as to quality and quantity. After this important part of the evening's exercises was completed Mr. Bowes of Markdale, was voted to the chair, which position he filled admirably. The programme was at once entered upon and well sustained throughout. The choir, which has been but recently organized, did their part with very great credit to themselves, and acceptance to the audience, rendering appropriate selections in a manner which would be a credit to more pretentious communities. A dialogue by Miss B. Logan and Miss Ellie Wiley was exceedingly well rendered, as also a recitation by Ethel Moore. Mr. Joseph Hawkins, Sr., gave an appropriate and earnest address in his usual happy mood. C. W. Rutledge, a recitation; W. A. Brown, an address on "Sociability"; Rev. J. S. Corcoran a speech, and the chairman of the district, Rev. D. C. McDowell, gave a very interesting address, after which the entertainment was brought to a close by the singing of the national anthem. Good order and genuine sociability were leading features in the assembly. Proceeds $34, to be appropriated to circuit funds.

CONCERT.—A concert will be given by the Dundalk Brass Band, in the Orange Hall, Markdale, on Tuesday, the 18th inst. Those who wish to enjoy a musical treat will have the worth of their money, by attending the Band Concert on the above date. We had the pleasure of attending their final dress rehersal in Victoria Hall, Dundalk, and know, from what we saw, that it will be a great success. A good string band will be in attendance. Go and enjoy yourselves. Admission 25 cents, Children 15 cents.

FACTS FOR FARMERS.

Prepare for Early Vegetables.

Plants sufficient for the family garden can be easily raised, usually of better quality than in a hot-bed, as generally managed, and they will interest the young people who always like to see things grow. Boxes for the purpose are made of half-inch stuff well nailed together. Their length should be suited to the width of the window, a foot wide, and the depth of three or four inches. In modern houses window sills are rarely wide enough to hold such a box, and it is well to suspend it by means of a wire at each end. Drive in a screw near the upper edge of the end of the box, and near the side farthest from the window, and a corresponding screw in the window casing. A piece of copper wire twisted around the screw in the box, and its other end made fast to that in the casing, will hold the box securely. Those who regularly use such boxes provide the soil for them the autumn before. The lack of such provision need not deter any from trying to raise plants in this manner. Earth from the woods is a most excellent material for filling the boxes. This collects in the hollow places, and can usually be gathered in a mild time, even in winter. If woods-earth is not to be had, take advantage of a thaw, and scraping up some garden soil, place it in a heap in the cellar until it is dry enough to use. If at all heavy, it may be made porous by adding sand, or what is better, fine moss. Procure some sphagnum or peat moss, such as nurserymen use for packing; dry it thoroughly, and rub it through a coarse wire sieve. One part of this fine sifted moss to four or five of soil makes an excellent material for seed boxes, and it will not become packed by the needed waterings. As a rule the seed should be sown in them about six weeks before the plants can be safely set out in the open ground. When the seedlings are large enough to handle, usually when they have made two rough leaves—those are the seed leaves—they will need transplanting into another box of similar soil, setting them an inch apart each way. Plants in the boxes must have water as they need it, and on warm days they may be set outside in a sunny, sheltered place, bringing them in before the air becomes chilly. The vegetables usually started in window boxes are early cabbages, cauliflowers, lettuce and tomatoes; in April egg-plants and peppers may be thus sown.

Agricultural Value of Sewage.

There is no one who will deny that it is a great pity that so many millions of dollars' worth of fertilizing materials are annually allowed to go to waste through the sewers of our towns and cities, and yet very few are ready to believe that this waste could be economically saved and applied to the land for raising food either for man or beast.

If reports are true, the new town of Pullman, near the city of Chicago, has solved this question in a most satisfactory manner. Pullman is built upon level land, where it would be impossible to secure perfect drainage by natural flow. To overcome this difficulty, the drains were all carried to an artificial well sunk deeply enough to receive all the sewage of the town. From this well the drainage water is pumped by steam power, through a large pipe which delivers it upon farm lands three miles away, where it is utilized for the production of ordinary farm crops. It is claimed that the arrangement proves highly satisfactory in every respect, and that the investment pays a good annual interest.

If the market gardeners around Boston are finding it profitable to erect costly apparatus for watering their ground with pure well water, pumped from the bowels of the earth, why might not the city and country make a gain at both ends by joining in erecting pumping apparatus for delivering the richer waters of the sewers upon or under the cultivated fields in the suburbs? It is believed now, that the true way to water gardens and fields is through the porous pipes, laid enough below the surface to be entirely out of the way of cultivation.

This question of modern civilization how to get rid of its own wastes, is but just beginning to attract public attention. With our present light, it appears like a great question, but the time is rapidly coming when it must be met, and we doubt not it will be met successfully. The most that country people can do at present is, individually, to take the best care possible of their own house drains and cesspools. The problem is much more easily solved in the country than in the city or large town.—N. E Farmer.

FARM NOTES.

Ashes and gypsum have proved very beneficial to potatoes in many sections.

No excess of animal matter should be given to poultry, either in the shape of meat scraps or pressed cake.

Rye will grow at a low temperature and continue to grow later and start earlier than most other grains.

One acre of ground in lawn and garden is sufficient to maintain the family cow in any village or rural locality.

Professor Cook says light Brahmas have proved even better layers in winter than his brown Leghorns; their eggs are finer in quality, larger and of richer color.

The Country Gentleman recommend evergreen boughs as being the best protection to the strawberry bed in winter, saying they never smother or otherwise injure the plants.

The want of pure and fresh water accounts in many instances for the lack of eggs during the winter season. Fowls require a constant supply of water, and without it will not lay.

One of the best methods, says M. H. de Gasparin, of preventing the ravages of the phylloxera is to keep the soil of the vineyard continually moist, and in the south-east of France this is effected by keeping the vineyard submerged during the winter.

For the comfort and well-being of the sitting hens they have should have space in which to turn and flap their wings, and scratch and take all needed exercise, provided the weather is favorable. But if cold, do not tempt them to remain too long from the nests.

Says the American Cultivator: In the winter, while the ground is covered with snow and the soil is frozen deeply, it is sometimes curious to note the effect of openings leading down to deep under-drains. The snow will be melted away by the warm air coming up from the unfrozen earth. Even in an uncovered drain three feet deep, a little straw or loose earth will generally protect the bottom from severe freezing.

If you are going to set a new orchard next spring remember that it is an excellent way to prepare a plan of the orchard, showing the position of each tree, its variety, etc. If a tree dies it can be replaced by one of the same sort. Some fruit raisers keep a book in which they register the age and variety of every tree in their orchard, together with any items in regard to its grafting, productiveness, treatment, etc., which were thought to be desirable.

Married to a Lunatic.

Judge Phelps, at Baltimore, passed a decree declaring void a marriage celebrated January 24, 1883, between Helen A. North and Francis W. North. The bill alleges that the husband at the time of the marriage was a lunatic and not competent to contract a marriage. It appears from the bill of complaint and evidence before the court that the couple were married without the knowledge of their friends and only after three weeks' acquaintanc. Mrs. North was boarding at a hotel where young North, who was travelling South for his health, stayed. They took a bridal trip to Cincinnati, where the bridegroom began to act queerly, and thinking him unwell, Mrs. North suggested that they proceed to Cleveland, where his uncle was living, which was done.

North suddenly became possessed of the idea that he was being pursued by some immaginary foe who wanted to separate him from his wife and threatened that he would kill her rather than part with her. The uncle telegraphed to Mr. North, sr., who lives in Utica, N. Y., and he came at once to Cleveland with several officials of the Middleton insane asylum, where his son had been imprisoned before, and forcibly carried him off. Mrs. North, attributing the supposed abduction to another cause, attempted to follow on the same train, but, according to her own statement, was roughly ejected therefrom by Mr. North, sr., having a narrow escaped from being run over. Realising his condition she was compelled to abandon her efforts and then sought to have the marriage declared void. Her husband's family are said to be wealthy, but decline to recognize her, as they considered their son's marriage as the freak of a madman.

Living, yet Dead.

In Germany, every man, from the lowest to the highest, is obliged to serve in the army nominally for twelve years. He must be in the standing army for seven years, from the close of his twentieth year until he is twenty-eight. Of these seven years three must be spent in active service, and the remaining four in the army of reserve. After leaving the army of reserve he must form a part of the Landwehr,—or practically the militia. After his active employment in the army he can engage in civil life. But if war breaks out, he is again called upon to resume his place in the ranks.

The theory on which this law rests is that every citizen ought to aid in defending his country, and that to do this efficiently, he requires the training of a soldier.

A young Prussian doctor, having served his time in the ranks, was placed among the "reserves." He went to Paris, and in a few years built up there a lucrative practice. In the height of his prosperity Prussia engaged in war, and the doctor was summoned to return home and fill out his term of service.

After much trouble he hired, for a large sum, a man to serve in his place. The substitute was killed on the battle-field.

A few years after this event, the physician received another summons from his Government to return and engage in military service. He protested that as he had, in the person of his substitute, died once, the Government had no more claim upon him for additional service than it had upon any other dead person.

The case was referred to high authorities, and after long and learned discussion it was decided that in the eyes of the law the physician was dead.

The business of detecting crime in London is admitted to be badly done. The precincts of the Savoy and Thames Embankment are not safer now than Hounslow Heath in the days of Jonathan Wild. One hundred and twenty-four persons disappeared in London last year, of whom no trace has ever been found, and each week numbers of dead bodies, known as "stiffuns," are brought in by toilers, of the Thames with marks of violence on them. Since the time of the late Inspector Field, no one of the detective order has won an established fame but Druscowitch, and he ruined a great career by being inveigled into the De Gancourt betting funds.

The lady who recently left $2,000,000 to the Pope had several near relatives living, and they remain in extremely poor circumstances. It is said Pius IX, when he had been left a large sum in similar circumstances, relinquished $500,000 for the benefit of the poor relatives. Pope Leo, it is suggested might do the same.

Rosa Bonheur is now quite well again and has removed to her favorite Chateau de By, Fontainebleau, where she has already set to work at her unfinished pictures.

M. Mace the great French detective and the terror of the Paris evil doer, is just about five feet tall, if it be proper to use the term tall as applied to such a stature. He has been thirty years in the service.

The Emir of Bokhara, in Toorkistan, receives visitors in a robe of rose-colored velvet studded with precious stones. He is gracious in his manners, but his reception rooms contains no furniture, and its floor is covered with European carpets. His favorite gifts to the most distinguished guests are beautiful horses.

Queen Victoria has sent to the Sailors' Home at Portsmouth a portrait of herself, with autograph, in a carved oak frame. The picture is from a drawing on stone by Karl Staub, taken from the portrait by Angeli which was painted in 1877, and which hangs in the private dining room at Windsor Castle.

The Maharajah of Cashmere has spared no cost in the effort to make fine wine and brandy, and it seems now that he has succeeded, as the samples of both at the Calcutta Exhibition are highly praised. It is thought that this industry may compensate for the great falling off of late years in the demand for shawls.

The Emperor of Germany, now in his eighty-eighth year, is not the only oldest inhabitant. On his hunting trips he frequently meets some hale old pensioner who tought in the war of liberation or marched against the French at Waterloo. The severe military discipline of Prussia does not seem to shorten the lives of her subjects.

"When I was at Constantinople," remarked the Hon. G. J. Goshen, "I had a conversation with a Turkish pasha, who said that the female slaves were treated with exceedingly great kindness in Turkish families, and that their morals were looked after much more satisfactorily than those of female servants in any European communities. I did not entirely agree with him.

German papers record the discouraging fact for book collectors that the library of M. Korch, the former editor of the St. Petersburg Gazette, who recently died at Heidelberg, was sold by auction for the ridiculous sum of 25 roubles, although it consisted of about 5,000 volumes. If most of the books were in Russian the melancholy fact might, in some degree at least, be accounted for.

The late Abraham Hayward, the brilliant reviewer and conversationalist, was, like Disraeli, of the Hebrew race, and brought up in a solicitor's office. He had the most bitter personal hatred of Disraeli, which was as intensely returned, and in the Morning Chronicle, of which he was editor while it was the organ of the Peelite party, wrote articles against him of the most virulent acerbity.

"For the last five or six years," observed a distinguished American architect, "I have been occupied almost exclusively with public buildings. I could count on the fingers of my right hand the private houses I have erected. My temper in consequence has been comparatively sweet, for nothing is so trying to an artist's soul as to be subjected to the æsthetic whims of charming women who desire his professional services."

Julia Hatcher, of Marnhull, near Salisbury, England, has received a medal for her bravery in rescuing a boy who was being tossed and gored by a bull. The presentation was publicly made by the rector of the parish, the Rev. R. K. Kennard, described as "the well-known breeder of short-horns." Mr. Kennard, after praising the girl's courage and self-devotion, said that in risking her own life she had "established the most characteristic principle of Christianity."

Simeon Shorter, a Birmingham workman, who presented Mr. Gladstone, with an axe, has receeived the following letter: "Mr. Gladstone desires me to express to you his best thanks for the detailed account of the making of the axe which you kindly presented to him. Although Mr. Gladstone is loath to deface its polish in any degree, he feels bound to contemplate making a trial with it, in order to see the effect of an axe wholly of steel."

The climate of tropical Africa is deadly to the white men. At four missions recently established in that country more than twenty white missionaries have died within the last five years, and almost every month news comes of severe illnesses; but during the whole of that time the colored missionaries from this country have been able to live and work there. Lord Shaftesbury uses this fact to support the late Rev. Robart Moffat's assertion that "Africans must go to teach and save Africans."

An English newspaper prints illustrations of Gen. Gordon's terse speeches. When he entered upon his duties as Governor-General of the Soudan it was expected that he would make a long address, but he dismissed the assembly with the single sentence: "I will try to hold the balance even." When his views on the Soudan appeared in the columns of a newspaper he remarked, "A shot has been fired." When he was sent to the Soudan he, "I have received orders to cut the dog's tail off, and I will do it."

The Earl of Abingdon, who has just died, was in his youth a wonderful mimic, and could personate Dr. Keate, the head master of Eton, in a marvellous maner. He did this on one occasion when at school, summoning the boys at a tutor's house to prayers, having first donned a master's gown, and in the dusk of a summer evening his identity was not discovered. Once, in the House of Commons, a member could not find some papers to which he wished to refer, and kept on fumbling among a mass of them. The House grew a little impatient, and suddenly a voice in Keate's tones—well known at that date to half the House—was heard to say, "Never mind, stay afterward," which was Keate's way of intimating to a delinquent that he would be flogged for ignorance or carelessness. Once, at Nuneham, Lord Abingdon was dressed up as a girl, and made desperate love to an elderly gentleman, who genuinely reciprocated, and wanted to follow up his suit with a view to matrimony. The thing was for some time kept going by letter, and the would be suitor was terribly chagrined when he learned the truth.

One Thousand Wives.

Do what they may, no Mormon leader will ever equal the Sultan of Morocco, Sidi Muley Hassan, who has just added the thousandth wife to his harem, and has celebrated this unique millenary by a brilliant feast given to the other 999; or, rather to the other 600, for 400 are either dead or pensioned off. Like the Mormons, the Sultan does not keep all his better halves at one place, but distributes them among his winter and summer residences at Fez, Morocco, Tafilet, etc. Even then, unless he has more palaces than fall to the lot of most Emperors, there must be enough in each house to seriously interfere with harmony now and then. We wonder if he felt as much pride and satisfaction when he added the thousandth to the number as Baron Tauchnitz did when he published his thousandth volume of his convenient "Collection of British Authors." For we imagine that after a man has married his three or four hundredth consort—though on this point we must speak with the doubt arising from a total lack of experience—he cares very little for a new wife, and regards each further addition much as a collector looks upon a new Elzevir, or a new specimen of Japanese pottery, or another pipe, when he does not care to smoke, or another violin, which will hang upon his wall untouched. It is the pleasure of the man who heaps up stores; a pleasure which, in this line of hoarding, only one man in the modern world fortunately, is allowed to have. It is curious however, to observe that while what might be called the physical wonders of the "Arabian Night's Entertainments"—the carpet or the horse that traveled a month's journey in a day, the talisman that conveyed one's words at once to the distant lover—that while these and the like are coming true by the power of modern science, the social wonders, as they seem to us Occidentals, are beginning to fade away. A son of this very Sultan, the Prince Muley Edris, not long ago married an Italian governess, who did not give up her religion, and who stipulated that she should be the only wife; and a brother of the Sultan, the sheriff of Wezdan, has an English wife.—(Boston Advertiser.)

CATASTROPHY AT THREE RIVERS.

Two Children Perish in the Flames—A Brave Fireman.

Advices from Three Rivers, Que., convey the sad information of the death of two young children which occurred under the most distressing circumstances. Mrs. Chas. Caron, living on the second and third flats of a house situated on Notre Dame street, left her domicile for a few moments, recently, locking in her two young children, Flora aged four and a half years, and Henri, aged two and a half. It is thought that immediately after their mother left, the children went to play with matches and set fire to the house, for she had been gone only a few moments when the cries of Fire! fire! were heard in the street. The poor mother rushed to her house, but she fainted going up stairr and had to be carried away. In the meantime, the fire was making rapid progress inside and before the brigade arrived the poor little ones could be seen knocking on the window with their tiny fists. The firemen had arrived by this time and no time was lost in trying to effect an entrance into the burning building. After much difficulty, one of the men, Louis Hamel, penetrated into the house at the peril of his own life and soon came out again carrying in his arms the dead body of the little boy who had already been suffocated and partly burned. All hopes as to the little girl had been given up, when suddenly the crowd was terror stricken by the most appalling and piteous cries from the interior of the building, and Mr. Caron, the father of the children, appeared at one of the windows holding the inanimate body of his young daughter Flora, who also had been suffocated and partly burned. The poor exhausted father was helped down a ladder with his precious burden, and the bodies of the unfortunate little victims were taken to the residence of their grandmother, Mrs. Dauphinais.

GRIP'S PRINTING HOUSE

The Grip printing and publishing company have settled down in their new commodious premises at 26 and 28 Front street west, Toronto, and can now boast with pardonable pride of having the largest and best equipped establishment of the kind in the Dominion of Canada. The building is admirably adapted for the purposes to which it was put. It has five flats and basement, the dimensions of each being 120 ft. It is well and substantially built and supplied with all the latest improvements in the way of ventilation, fire escapes, hoists, conveniences, etc.

Entering off Front street the visitor finds himself in the business office, which is fitted up in a new and improved style. The veteran and energetic manager, Mr. S. J. Moore, has a private room, nicely furnished, and supplied with electric bell and communication to every part of the building. The clerks have separate compartments, somewhat the same as in banks. A nicely printed placard informs you what department the business the clerks are devoted to, so that there is no trouble in knowing where to go. The office is roomy, and well arranged, and the furnishings are of the best.

The composing-room is on the second flat and occupies the full depth and breadth of the building. Large windows in the front and rear supply it with abundance of light, and the ceiling is high. All the typesetting is done in this immense room. While it is stated that there is over twenty tons of type in the room, all of which is more or less handled every day, the public can form an idea of the amount of work carried on there. Here, as in every other department, there is no crowding for space, and one is struck with the order and cleanliness that prevails. A compositor can put his hand on the style of type he wants in a moment, and everything is so handy and convenient that work is expedited much more speedily than it otherwise would be. A practical man would at once put it down as a model composing-room.

The press room on the third flat also claims attention. The idea of having presses any place but on the ground floor or basement is something new, but it is found to work well. The room is as clean as it possibly can be kept. There are no less than eighteen presses on this flat, and they are kept running pretty much all the time. A section of the room has been partitioned off and has been christened by Manager Moore the novelty museum as it contains some machines of a most unique description. Among other specialties the company manufacture the paragon blank leaf combination check book for use in stores and other business places. The book is worked off on a little press which prints, cuts, perforates, numbers, folds and delivers 5,000 an hour. With this wonderful machine an order that took a fortnight to fill can now be filled in a day. The company operate two of these presses, and hold the patent for Canada. Another wonderful machine is the label press, which prints, cuts, and delivers a quarter of a million gummed labels a day. Next to this is a press which prints in two colors at the impression 25,000 sheets an hour, the work of ten ordinary Gordon presses. These machines are all automatic and print at a terrific speed, at the same time turning out cleaner and better work than the slow-going machines seen in many fashionable printing offices. It will be seen that the company's press room is no small affair.

Up another flat you find a department which has not another competitor in Canada. It is where ink etching is done. By this process lithographing or printing from wooden blocks, both very expensive, is dispensed with, and brilliant and well executed work can be done at a reasonable rate. The artist's work is transferred to a plate of polished zinc, which is then subjected to the treatment with different acids, the result being that in twelve hours the plate comes out a perfect counterpart of the original drawing. With this specialty, which no other house in the Dominion possesses, Mr. Moore says they can compete in colored labels, wrappers, every description of railway printing, etc., with the best establishments on the other side. This is something to be able to boast of, and already the company are reaping the reward of their enterprise in obtaining orders which were formerly given in the United States.

The above is enough to show the public that the Grip printing house takes the lead in their business. Their facilities and equipment are complete for doing everything and anything, promptly and in the highest style of typographical art. Besides doing the Ontario government printing, they do the work of a number of legal and commercial firms and large corporations, as well as publish several periodicals for outside parties. Grip itself is also being advanced at a rapid rate. The circulation has been increased over 3,000 during the past few months and new subscribers are coming in at the rate of over 100 a week. An enlargement to sixteen or twenty pages is contemplated at an early date. With a capital of $100,000 and ably and energetically managed the company are bound to succeed.

Figaro gives the following account of the arrest of five members of the Salvation army: The sidewalk of the "Boulevard des Italiens" was blocked yesterday afternoon for more than an hour by a dense crowd that had gathered around two of Miss Catharine Booth's lady "colonels" and five men with badges fastened to their coats in private in the same force. They were peddling copies of their newspapers, the Salut Avant. As it is against the law to do so without a license, the police after vainly begging them for a long time to "move on" lost patience, and at five o'clock in the afternoon the two "soldiers" were marched to the station-house in the Rue Drouot by a detachment of "guardians of the peace." Ten minutes later three "guardians" came back for the "Meeses Anglaises," who offered no resistance and seemed much pleased at the excitement they created. The prisoners were taken before the police magistrate of the arrondissement, who, on their failure to show a license, committed them for trial.

Scientific Experiment.

Tom Wilkinson had looked forward to the evening of the 17th of December with some amount of pleasure. He was to spend it at the house of his friend Jack Spencer of Guy's. Not only that, but Spencer's aunt, who kept house for him, had been kind enough to ask Amy Durant, Tom's fiancee, to come as well. Tom had but few opportunities of meeting Amy, so he naturally was glad of this one, especially—but the reason why will soon be manifest.

However, for some reason or other, he did not greatly enjoy himself. Miss Spencer, having taken the somewhat bold step, for her, of inviting the lovers to her house, did not see fit to leave them alone for an instant.

Jack Spencer scarcely saw the fun of having Tom up to spend an evening trying to be alone with Miss Durant; so, after an hour's insipid music, and more insipid conversation, he drew Tom out of the room on a very weak pretext, and dragged him off to his den.

"Look here, Tom, I've had enough of that cackle. Come and have a smoke."

"I don't care if I do; but I'm afraid Amy won't half like my leaving her."

"Quite a mistake; don't flatter yourself so grossly. Besides, you'll see plenty of her when you're married. She'll get on very well with my aunt now they're alone, and it strikes me you weren't getting on very brilliantly. Now what's your particular weakness—Scotch or Irish?"

"Irish, please."

"Ah, I thought so."

"Why?" asked Wilkinson; "I generally take Scotch."

"Yes, I know," replied Spencer, without volunteering any further information.

In a few minutes they had put on easy jackets, mixed their whiskey and water, and settled down in easy chairs.

"Now," said Spencer, "what will you smoke?"

"I've some rather good cigars," was Wilkinson's reply; "Let me offer you one." He put his hand in his pocket.

"Confound it!" he exclaimed; "I must have left my case in my great coat."

"Never mind, old man, try this pipe; it's a beauty, got it from an American, whose leg I helped cut off for him at the hospital."

Wilkinson took it, thinking at the same time the recommendation was a strange one.

"What a jolly den you have!" he said as he lit up.

"Not so bad. Don't let my aunt hear you call it a den, though; it's a study."

Wilkinson laughed.

"By Jove, though, Tom, I do study now, and no mistake. I'm one of the coming men, I can tell you. I'm going in for medicine on a new theory."

"And how about your practice while you are perfecting your theory?"

"Oh! my aunt will buy me a practice fast enough. Yes, my boy, I'm going to revolutionize medicine. No more doctoring up a man's body; that's a vast mistake."

"What are you going to do then?"

"Doctor up his mind."

Wilkinson smiled; he did not quite see what his friend was driving at. However, he had considerable interest in science, and still more in Jack Spencer's progress, so he asked to be further enlightened.

There was nothing that Spencer wanted so much as an appreciative listener. He launched out under full sail.

"It's a perfect mystery to me, Tom, and a few other men, why such marvellous phenomena as we hear of occasionally in the domain of electro-biology, as it's called, obtain so little scientific attention."

"Of course there is, but it has a sound basis of fact. The science is in its infancy as yet, but it must grow. It is a known fact that one mind can influence another even at a distance, is it not?"

"I once saw a mesmerist, and certainly he seemed able to do anything, but I thought he was only a conjuror."

"Empirical generalization, unworthy of you, remarked Spencer. "I won't quote cases, though I might do so for a week, but look at those books, they are full of well-authenticated, scientifically conducted, experiments."

He took down from a shelf Darwin's "Zoonomia," Machish's "Philosophy of Sleep," and several volumes of the "Revue Scientifique."

"Now," continued Spence, "it is proved that the mesmerizer can control the will, the actions, even the belief of his subjects; if he gives him a draught of water he can make him believe it is champagne; if he gives him an ink bottle, he will smell it and think it a lovely rose."

"Have you seen these experiments?" asked Wilkinson.

"Seen them? Why I've made them.'

Wilkinson looked up astonished.

"Yes," said Spencer, "that's why I feel such an interest in this business. I possess the power of mesmerizing to a considerable degree, and cultivate it every chance I get. Have a little more whiskey?"

"Thanks, I will."

"Of course you will," replied Spencer with a satisfied smile. "I decided that while we were talking. Influence of one mind over another, you see."

Wilkinson made a hasty exclamation. He was rather averse to being experimented on in this way.

"How is all this going to help you in doctoring?" he asked.

"Simply enough. Induce a state of trance give your patient some water; make him believe it is the medicine he requires, and it will have the same effect. Or if an operation is required you can perform it during the trance, as he is quite insensible to pain."

"But can you always induce this trance?"

"That's a weak point, but in time we shall get over that. I can influence four people out of five. Miss Durant, for instance, would be a very good subject."

Wilkinson sat silently smoking for a few minutes. Apparently the mention of Amy's name had turned his thoughts into another channel.

He half wished he were back in the room where she was sitting. Then he thought of recent events, and determined that he would show that he could enjoy himself without her.

The two friends were soon in the midst of an animated discussion of their former subject. Spencer told of various curious experiments in which the operator had questioned his victim on all sorts of subjects, obtaining replies to everything, even when the question was one which he could not have wished to reply to if conscious.

This made Wilkinson remark that the possession of this mesmeric gift placed a vast power in the hands of the operator.

"Yes, it undoubtedly does. Fortunately scientific men are the last in the world to take advantage of it for private ends."

Wilkinson looked at his friend.

"Did you ever try it from personal motives?"

Spencer looked as if he wished the question had not been asked.

"I don't mind telling you, Tom—I did once. You remember Nellie Fletcher?'

"Yes; I thought you liked her at one time."

"So I did, but I wanted to know if she liked me. I put her into a trance, with her consent, and made her an offer. She refused me."

"Didn't she remember anything about it afterward?"

"Not an atom. The best of it is that the subject can't help answering absolutely truly uninfluenced by etiquette or anything of that sort. You're a lucky fellow, Tom, to have been safe in proposing to Miss Durant without having to experiment first."

"Yes," was Tom's laconic reply.

"No doubt about her liking you?"

"I hope not, as we're engaged."

"You're a lucky dog, she's a charming girl."

Wilkinson naturally assented, but did not feel altogether pleased when Spencer began praising Miss Durant somewhat enthusiastically.

He felt still less so when Spencer ended by saying:

"You don't know what a debt of gratitude you owe me, Tom. I could make her think you the meanest scamp on the earth, and I forbear."

"What do you mean?"

"I mean she is a splendid subject. I could easily gain complete control over her mind and continue the influence in the waking state."

Wilkinson began to feel uncomfortable, and changed the subject abruptly.

"Did you have a good time at the Kesterton's dance the other night?"

"Splendid," replied Spencer, warmly. He was not so wrapped up in science that he was unable to enjoy the lighter pleasures "I'm afraid you didn't though; you looked as if you had the blues."

Tom could not say he had passed a pleasant evening. The truth was that Amy had, on that occasion, danced several times with Bartlett, a cousin, and a reputed old flame of hers. Tom was of a very jealous disposition, and had taken offense at it without explaining his reason. Consequently there had existed during the last few days decided coolness between the lovers, and Tom had hoped that on the present evening he might have a chance of making matters smooth again.

However, Amy had not felt called upon to allude to her conduct, and he had not done so.

He wanted a confidant, and so he began to monopolize the talk; it was his turn. He told Jack the whole story, confessing his jealousy of Bartlett and asking his advice.

"My dear boy," said Spencer, "there's only one course open to you. You are making yourself miserable by this uncertainty; why not decide once for all whether Miss Durant cares for you, and you only?"

"How can I?"

"Easily enough. We will get her in here; I will mesmerize her, and while she is in the trance we will ask her if she cares two straws about Bartlett."

"It's all very well for you to talk in this easy way; you don't know what it is to be jealous.

"Don't I," exclaimed Spencer; "remember Nellie."

"But how can we get Amy here?" asked Wilkinson. "What possible excuse can we have for asking her?"

"We don't want one," replied Spencer, confidently; "all we have to do is to will that she shall come."

"I don't believe it."

"Let's try," suggested Spencer. "We may fail, I acknowledge; we can but try."

After a moment's hesitation Wilkinson assented.

"Now," said Spencer, "concentrate your mind and will strongly that she shall come."

Tom knitted his brows and willed. It would have been an amusing sight for any spectator. The two young men, with eyes fixed and hands firmly clenched, were bent forward in an attitude of intense suspense, doing apparently nothing.

"Are you willing?" asked Spencer, after a time.

"Willing as Barkis," was the response.

"Keep it up."

They kept it up for some time without result. Then just as Wilkinson was about to resign, Spencer exclaimed:

"Hark!'

"I shan't be long," said a voice in the distance.

Then came the sound of a door being closed.

The whiskey bottle and glasses were hastily smuggled into a corner, and the pipes shied into the fireplace.

Then came a gentle knock at the door, followed by a soft "May I come in?"

Spencer opened the door.

Promenaders in Washington often stop to look at a pair of high-stepping, black, blooded horses attached to a high road waggon, driven by a handsome, military appearing man of some fifty years, who is invariably accompanied by a handsome, matronly lady and two or three bright-eyed little girls. The driver is Jerome Napoleon Bonaparte, grandson of the Bonaparte's eldest brother Jerome, and who possesses, it is asserted, the first right to whatever claim the Bonapartes may have to the imperial throne of France. The lady is Madame Bonaparte, a granddaughter of Daniel Webster.

$5,000.00

IN VALUABLE REWARDS.

For Correct Answers to Bible Problems in "Truth" Competition Number 9, Closing April 7th.

THE QUESTIONS!!!

1st.—Who rebuilt a city (with fatal results to his own family) that lay under the curse of God?

These are the Bible questions that Truth propounds in the new competition just now opened. They are certainly difficult, but any clever Bible student ought to be able to answer them, and to secure one of the magnificent rewards offered. We will give them in detail, as it will, no doubt, interest our readers.

of the whole competition from the beginning to the end and the twenty-eight persons next following, who send correct answers, will receive the following prizes respectively:—

1.	One Solid Gold Stem-Winding and Stem-Setting Genuine Elgin Watch, valued at	$100 00
2.	One Lady's Solid Gold Watch, valued at	80.00
3.	One Celebrated Wanzer Sewing Machine	60.00
4.	One Triple Silver Plated Ice Pitcher, valued at	35.00
5 to 11	Seven Solid Coin Silver Watches, excellent value, at $25 each	175 00
12 to 19	Eight Solid Hunting Case Nickel Silver Watches at $17 each	136 00
20 to 25	Six Solid Nickel Silver Open Face Heavy Bevelled Crystal Watches at $15 each	90.00
26 to 29	Four Elegant Aluminum Gold Hunting Case Watches at $14 each	56 00

Should it so happen that there are an even number received—that is, that there may be two middle correct answers—then two gold watches will be given, above described as number one reward.

Then, not to disappoint even the last ones, a large list of consolation rewards has been prepared, which, as above, will be given in the order numbered to the last one hundred and twenty-one persons who send correct answers to these problems.

The letters must all be postmarked at office where mailed, not later than the closing day of this competition, which is April 7th.

The first prize in the consolation rewards, which will be given to the sender of the last correct answer is

1.	One Extra Fine Toned 12 stop Cabinet Organ, by the Dominion Organ Co., of Bowmanville	$250 00
2.	One Gentleman's Elegant Solid Gold Stem-winding and Stem-setting Genuine Elgin Watch, latest style Box Pattern Hunting Case, valued at	100 00
3.	One Fine English Double Shot Gun, finest Twist Barrels, Rebounding Locks, Pistol Grip, and all modern improvements, from C. Stark's Gun House, Toronto, retailed at	75 00
4.	Same Gun, only not quite so highly finished, valued at	60 00
5.	One Wanzer "F" Sewing Machine, from the renowned Manufactory of R. M. Wanzer & Co., Hamilton	55 00
6 to 11	Six Fine Hunting Case Solid Nickel Watches, valued at $12 each	72 00
12 to 19	Eight Open Face Heavy Bevelled Crystal Watches, valued at $10 each	80 00
20 to 25	Six Solid Aluminum Gold Hunting Case Watches at $10 each	60 00
26 to 31	Six Solid Nickel Renowned Waterbury Watches at $5 each	30 00
32 to 92	Sixty-one Volumes beautifully bound of Hood's Poems, at $2 50 each	152 50
93 to 121	Twenty-Nine Triple Silver Plated Butter Knives on Solid Steel at $1 each	29 00

Remember that all the questions must be answered correctly to secure any of the rewards offered. If you send a correct answer and one dollar for a half year's subscription to Truth, you will take your place in the order your letter is received at Truth office. We can assure our readers that all the rewards named above will be cheerfully and promptly handed over or sent to the successful ones as soon as it is known who they are after the close of the competition on April 7th. In every alternate issue of Truth will be given a complete list of the prize winners with their post-office addresses and rewards obtained in previous competitions, so intending competitors may be assured of the genuineness of the whole matter. We certainly would not have taken all this time to explain the plan in detail to our readers if we had not been certain that it was conducted in an honorable manner.

Real estate is said to be good security because it never runs away. This, however, is not reliable. We have known lands to slope before this.

Dr. Carson's Pulmonary Cough Drops. The prescription of an old Canadian Practitioner. The best remedy for the Lungs, in large bottles at 50 cents. For sale every where.

"Why, what's the matter this morning, Tom?" "Caught a cold, that's all." "Yes, I saw you after one last night, with your coat off; I thought you'd catch it."

A NEW PRINCIPLE — The principle upon which PUTNAM'S PAINLESS CORN EXTRACTOR acts is entirely new. It does not sink deep into the flesh, thereby producing soreness, but acts directly upon the external covering of the corn, separates it from the under layer, removes the direct pressure from the part, and at once effects a radical cure, without any pain or discomfort. Let those who are suffering from corns, yet sceptical of treatment, try it, and by the completeness of the cure they will be ready to recommend Putnam's Painless Corn Extractor to others.

It pays to plod! Don't make quantity more important than quality. The best work is work that takes time, and now-a-days the best work is the work that is wanted.

Do not wear faded clothes when a 10c. package of the Triangle Dyes will make them look as bright as new. All the popular colors. 10c.

A coloured woman, when reproved for undue expression of grief, said: 'Now, look here, honey, when de good Lord sen ds us tribulations don't you s'pose he s'pects us to tribulate?"

Beware of that Cough! it may kill you; cure it at once with Dr. Carson's Pulmonary Cough Drops, it never fails. Large Bottles at 50 cents. For sale everywhere.

There is joy in conflict, when the end of conflict is believed to be desirable. There is a species of excitement in wrestling against difficulties which, in itself, is no trivial source of pleasure.

PEMBROKE, Feb. 18th, 1884.

MESSRS. G. S. TICKELL & SONS, [illegible], Belleville, Ont.,

GENTLEMEN.—The Church goods have arrived, been inspected, and criticised. We have much pleasure in telling you that they prove eminently satisfactory. The Trustees and Committee of management are well pleased that they entrusted the work to you. The pulpit or rather desk and chairs, have been very flatteringly commented upon, and indeed, everything is universally admired. Pembroke people are very proud of their church, and strangers say that it is the prettiest church in the Ottawa valley, Ottawa included. The cost has been about $20,000. Yours respectfully,

JAS. BLAND & CO.

"The last word" is the most dangerous of all infernal machines; and the husband and wife should no more fight to get it than they would struggle for the possession of a lighted bombshell.

A gentleman said to one of his friends that for some years his wife had persisted in saying that she was only twenty years old. "Mine is more reasonable," replied his friend. "I have succeeded in making her enter the thirties, but I have failed to make her come out of them."

MERIT PROVEN.

Dollar upon dollar is frequently spent on the faith of recommendations for articles entirely worthless. Not so with McGregor's Speedy Cure; you are not asked to purchase it until its merits are proven. Call at Hill Bro's and get a free trial bottle, and if not convinced it will cure you of the worst forms of Dyspepsia, Compaint, etc., no matter of how long standing, it costs you nothing. Sold in 50c and $1 bottles. See testimonials from persons in your own town. F. & M.

An Indian mail courier employed in carrying the mails between Parry Sound and Little Current has been sentenced to five years in the Provincial Penitentiary for tampering with letters.

John R. Vert, Hamilton, says: "McGregor's Speedy Cure for Dyspepsia and Indigestion is cheap at fifty times the price asked for it. I am a commercial man, and travel continually, and would no more think of leaving home without a bottle of McGregor's Speedy Cure in my valise than I would of leaving my team at home and going on foot." Free trial bottle at Hill Bros. general store. Regular size, fifty cents and one dollar.

A young man advertises in the Boston Globe:—"Wanted, by a handsome, vivatuous man in easy circumstances, of brilliant talents, refined tastes, and loving disposition, situation as son-in law in a wealthy family."

A DOUBLE BENEFIT.

James Moore, a prominent resident of Leamington, writes that he cured himself of dyspepsia of a year's duration by one bottle of Burdock Blood Bitters, and two bottles cured his wife who who had been for years a sufferer from the same disease. He conscientiously recommends it to all suffering from similar troubless.

A FAVORITE EVERYWHERE.

Wherever introduced Hagyard's Yellow Oil finds friends. It is the old reliable household remedy for external and internal use in all aches, pains, lameness and soreness of the flech. A. L. Green, a prominent druggist of Belleville, says: "It is a great favorite here and has a good sale."

Two Frenchmen and an Indian stumbled over a bear while walking through the woods near Waubaushene last week, and while the bear hugged the Indian the Frenchman prodded the animal with knives, having no firearms. After an hour's desperate struggle the bear was killed and weighed 280 lbs. The men are expected to recover.

CRUELLY MURDERED.

In the Province of Ontario every year thousands are being slowly murdered by taking unsuitable, untried nostrums for such complaints as Costiveness, Indigestion Liver Complaint. Kidney Troubles. etc., who might easily regain lost strength and energy by using McGregor's Speedy Cure. To convince them that such is the case we will give them a free trial bottle at Hill Bro's Price 50c. and $1. See testimonials from persons in your own town. F. & M.

The floods having devastated the valley of the Ohio are now getting in their work farther south. When the dry land begins to appear down there Canada may look out for some spring freshets that will cause much loss of life and property, especially in the vicinity of London. The snow is very deep all over the country and unless there is a gradual thaw floods are certain.

James Brayley, Hamilton, says: "I read the testimonials for McGregor's Speedy Cure and found that I had not to go to New York, Philadelphia, Louisiana or Texas to find living witnesses of its value, we have plenty of persons right here to prove its merits I got a bottle and it helped me right away. I was as bad with Bilious Fever and Indigestion as I think any one could be, I have taken three bottles and am nearly well and can eat any kind of food without it hurting me. I may say that I am better than ever I expected to be. Free trial bottles at Hill Bro's F. & M.

Wholesale Attempt to Buy up Mowat's Supporters.

The Affair Exposed in the Legislature Last Night.

TWO OF THEM ARRESTED.

A Complete Exposure of the Conspiracy.

(From the Toronto World.)

The scene enacted last night on the floor of the legislative assembly was as exciting and memorable as any ever before enacted in a Canadian parliament. Though the intended revelation of a base conspiracy to buy up supporters of the Mowat government was known to a considerable number of persons, they kept their counsel well, and the explosion therefore came with stunning effect, not merely on the opposition, but apparently also on many members on the government's side, and on all the spectators, who got a spicier performance than they had bargained for. There was nothing in the proceedings of the afternoon or early evening to indicate that a storm was impending. The house, at eight o'clock, went into committee of supply and passed the estimates for "legislation." After this was over the premier, about half-past nine, moved the speaker into the chair and commenced to address the house on a question of privilege. His first words were

A BOLT OUT OF THE BLUE.

Without preface or circumlocution he asked the speaker to open two sealed packages which had in the course of the day been placed in his hands. Mr. Clarke did so. The first contained a written statement made by Mr. McKim of West Wellington, that J. A. Wilkinson had paid him the sum of $1000 as a bribe to induce him to go in opposition to the government. The thousand dollars—ten $100 bills—was counted by the speaker in the presence of the house. The second packet was from Mr. Balfour, of South Essex, who stated in his letter that "Big-Push" Wilkinson had paid him $800 to seduce him from his allegiance to the Mowat government, and once more the amount of the bribe was counted, in $100 bills, before the eyes of the assembled crowd. This little drama, which had been performed amidst breathless stillness, being over, Mr. Mowat arose and explained that Messrs. Balfour and McKim had acted in the matter with the knowledge and concurrence of the government. He then read the following declaration and resolution, taking upon himself the entire responsibility of the statements it contains:

THE RESOLUTION.

That the attorney-general, a member of this house, has from his place in the house stated that he is credibly informed and believes that divers persons named by him, including Christopher W. Bunting, John A. Wilkinson, Edward Meek, F. S. Kertland and one Lynch, have entered into a conspiracy to accomplish the defeat of the government in this house by corrupting members of this house to vote against the government and government measures.

That the first-named three persons are well known and active members of the party in this province opposed to this government, and that the last-named two persons are American citizens.

That for the purpose of corruptly influencing the votes of members of this house the said five persons have at divers times during the present session of this legislature approached several members of this house with money, offers of money, promises of offices in the gift of the dominion government, and promises of other personal advantages to such members.

That divers members of this house so approached being indignant at the criminal conduct proposed to them have deemed it to be the fitting course on their part, and a duty to their constituents and the public, acting herein with the advice and approval of members of the government, to seem for a time to entertain such approaches in order to secure detection, exposure and punishment of the persons guilty of making such corrupt attempts, and have in pursuance of their duty from time to time disclosed to members of the government the approaches from time to time made to them, and the several acts therein of the guilty parties; that among the members of this house in regard to whom such corrupt attempts have been made are Mr. Robt. McKim, member for the west riding of Wellington; Mr. William D. Balfour, member for the south riding of Essex; and John F. Dowling, member for the south riding of Renfrew; that in carrying out the objects of the conspiracy the said Wilkinson, to influence the vote of the said McKim repeatedly offered him money, and has at length delivered to the said McKim $1000; that Mr. McKim immediately on receiving the money placed it in the hands of Mr. Speaker, to be by him produced to this house; that both the said Wilkinson and the said Bunting for the same corrupt purpose undertook to pay to Mr. McKim a further sum of $1000 on a future day; that the said Bunting was a party to the payment of the former sum and to the promise to pay the latter sum for the corrupt purpose already stated, and that to secure the same corrupt object the said Wilkinson and Bunting further offered and undertook that the said McKim should be appointed registrar of Regina in the Northwest, with a salary of $1000 a year, that both the said Wilkinson and the said Bunting assured the said McKim that the dominion minister of the interior had pledged to them his word that their said promise of the said office would be carried out, and the said Bunting on his own part pledged his word to the same effect; that for the same corrupt purpose already mentioned, and to influence the vote of the said Wm. D. Balfour, the said Wilkinson repeatedly offered to pay, and did this day deliver to the said Balfour the sum of $800 in cash, and undertook to pay a further sum of $700 on a future day; that for the same purpose the said Kertland also offered to pay to him the sum of $1200; that immediately on receiving the said sum of $800 Mr. Balfour placed the same in the hands of Mr. Speaker, to be by him produced to this house; and that further to secure the same purpose the said Wilkinson undertook that the said Balfour should be appointed by the dominion government to a registrarship at Regina, in the Northwest; that the said Wilkinson, for the corrupt purpose already mentioned, and to influence the vote of the said John F. Dowling, offered him the sum of $2000 cash, and to pay him a further sum of $2000 at a future period; that the sum so offered to be paid down was exhibited to him by the said Wilkinson, and that there is reason to believe that other corrupt offers were made by the said conspirators to, and rejected, by other members of this house, and it is hereby

Resolved, That the charges and matters referred to and set forth in said statement of the information and belief of the attorney-general be forthwith referred to the standing committee on privileges and elections, with instructions to enquire and report thereon, and with power to send for and examine all necessary persons and papers in or concerning the premises.

THE AFTER-CLAP.

Mr. Meredith was about to address the house when Mr. Balfour rose to his feet, the silence becoming, if possible, more intense. In a few impressive sentences he stated that the efforts to bribe him had been very persistent, and that no inducement that could be held out would suffice to make him betray the government and his constituents. There was great curiosity to hear what the opposition leader would say about it. He agreed with the attorney-general that the charges should be promptly and thoroughly investigated, but held that the members who had been approached would have occupied a more creditable position if they had spurned the offers made them instead of appearing to accept them for the porpose of leading others into criminal acts. The dramatic interest of the scene was heightened by several members describing the efforts made to bribe themselves. One of the most conspicuous was Dr. Cascaden, who was offered money and an office, the latter to be either the registrarship of Regina or a customs post in British Columbia. Scarcely less so was Dr. Murray of North Renfrew, who almost immediately after the election, a year ago, was offered in Ottawa very strong inducements to break faith with the government and betray his constituents. Dr. Dowling said nothing, but he was prevented from receiving $2000 only by

THE ARREST OF WILKINSON.

The machinery of the law was put in operation on Sunday as soon as the first payment of money was made. The county attorney was notified and ordered the arrest of the strangers and the summoning of the home conspirators. Kertland was about the house during the afternoon, apparently unsuspicious of danger, and after tea he was arrested in the lobby just after the opening of the house for the evening session. Shortly afterwards Wilkinson was nabbed while on his way to buy up Dr. Dowling as above mentioned, and both were hurried off to spend the night in the cell of the police station. In addition to any penalty which the law may inflict on the offenders the assembly is empowered by its own constitution to keep them in confinement as long as the session lasts it is not likely that bail will be allowed even it is asked, as the evidence of the conspirators is wanted by the committee on privileges and elections as well as in the police court.

The penalty prescribed by law is two years in penitentiary and a fine of £500.

The detectives working on the case were Murray of Toronto, Wynn of Clifton, Rodgers of Barrie. They have taken a lot of baggage.

The centre of the conspiracy was in Meek's office in the Mail building, and the chief accessories were Bunting, Meek, Kertland and Wilkinson.

How She Gathered Him in.

Together they were looking over the paper. "Oh, my, how funny!" said she. "What is it?" he asked. "Why, here's an advertisement that says, 'No reasonable offer refused.'" "What's so odd about that?" "Nothing, nothing," she replied, trying to blush, "only those are my sentiments."

"So soon? Why it is a century off! I shall be gray-headed if we wait another week. I am not sure where we shall stay; but to-morrow night I will bring you an address that you can always write to. It is that of a friend of mine—I forget the number of the street, but you shall have it; and I shall be sure to get your letters. Now, if anything happens to alarm you, or you are ill, or anything, you are to write at once, and I will return to Geldham without delay. And, my darling——"

We were interrupted by the sound of a carriage coming up the drive; it was Dr. Lowe's brougham returning from the house. I went to the carriage-window, and he told me that Haidee was suffering at present only from a bad feverish cold, but that we must be careful with her, for it might turn to something worse, and he should call again to see her in the morning. He said that the child's chest was weak, that the damp place was the worst thing for her, and that he should like to see her parents to advise them to take her away to some drier climate, as soon as she was well enough to be moved.

"Mind, she musn't be moved yet," said he. "She is very well where she is—nice warm room, high out of the damp. But the lower part of the house strikes like a vault."

"What would he say if he could go into the left wing?" I thought to myself.

"There was only a silly little servant up there with the child. She says that is your room."

"Yes, Dr. Lowe."

"And is it true that Mrs. Rayner sleeps on the ground floor?"

"Yes, quite true."

"Well, then, you may think yourself lucky, young lady. For, if I lived in that house, I should let the people I wanted to get rid of sleep at the botton, and keep the top for myself."

"Ah, well, there is no accounting for tastes; and, if Mrs. Rayner has a fancy for building her sepulchre, why, there is nobody very eager to prevent her, I dare say!" said he drily.

The doctor was an old bachelor, famed for his rudeness as much as for his skill. Mr. Rayner did not like him, I knew; and on that account I had had at first some doubts about sending for him; but, as he was well known to be by far the best doctor in Beaconsburg, I had resolved to risk it. Now I began to repent having done so.

"Is that young Reade? Is that you Laurence?" said the doctor peering out of the carriage-window into the deep shadows of the trees behind me.

Laurence came forward.

"Yes, Dr. Lowe."

"Oh, ah! Come to inquire about the sick child, I suppose?"

"No, Dr. Lowe. I drove back from Beaconsburg with my father and this lady, after calling upon you, and I am saying good-bye to her, as I am going abroad and shall not see her again until a few days before she becomes my wife," said he, in a low voice, but very proudly, with his hand on my shoulder.

"Wife, eh?"—incredulously.

"But it is a secret."

"Oh, ah, of course!"—knowingly. "So this is the Miss Christie I've heard so much about!" And he deliberately put on his spectacles and stared at me in the faint moonlight. "Well, she wouldn't have turned the heads of the men when I was young."

We both laughed at the old man's rudeness.

"I have no doubt heads were harder to turn then, Dr. Lowe," said Laurence drily.

"Well, take care some one else doesn't turn her's while you are away!" said the doctor glaring at him ferociously; and he told the coachman to drive on, and drew up the window sharply.

This last hit struck poor Laurence as an evil omen; and when I told him that I must go in now, and that I should see him again on the morrow, he flung his arms around me in such distress that I did not know what to say to comfort him.

"See what clever Dr. Lowe thinks of your Mr. Rayner, Violet," said he, looking anxiously into my eyes. "Now listen, my darling. Don't trust him, don't trust anybody while I am away, and don't believe what anybody may tell you about me. What would you do if they showed you the certificate of my marriage to another woman, Violet?"

"Oh, Laurence, you are not going away to be married, are you?"

"No, child, no; and, if any one tells you so, you will know it is a lie. And, if you get no letters, and they tell you I am dead——"

"Oh, Laurence, don't."

"Why, that will be a lie too! I shall be alive and single all the next six weeks, and at the end of that time I shall come back and marry you; and, if you want me, I shall come back before, my own darling! God bye, good bye!"

He kissed me again and again, then tore himself from my arms, and dashed away without daring even to look up at me again, and, tearful and trembling, I turned to go back to the house. But Laurence's terrible excitement had communicated itself to me, and I staggered down the drive, hardly able to see where I was going; and, when I had got to the bottom, with only the lawn at the side and the gravel-space in front between me and the house, I stopped for a moment, and clung to a birch-tree for support while I dried my eyes before presenting myself at the front door. I had told Jane to come down and open it for me when she heard me ring; and I hoped with all my heart it would be she, and that that horrid Sarah would not have taken it into her head to sit up, for I did not want her to see my tear-stained face.

But, just as I was going to leave the shelter of the trees and cross the gravel-space to the portico, I stopped, for I saw in the gloom a figure making its way across the lawn towards the back of the house. It was coming from the path among the trees which led to the stable. I strained my eyes, but there was a cloud passing before the moon, and I could only see that it was a man, and that he was carrying what looked like a small trunk; and it seemed heavy.

Who could it be at this time of night? For it was now between eleven and twelve o'clock. Was it Tom Parkes paying a late visit to Sarah, knowing the master was away? Or was it the mysterious servant Gordon, thinking Mr. Rayner was at home? Or was it a burglar? But then a burglar, I argued to myself, would hardly be likely to carry things to the house he was going to rob, but rather to take things away; and the trunk he was carrying seemed to be heavy already. He had disappeared behind the back of the house by this time, and, as I was curious to know what would happen next, I waited, trembling, creeping in among the trees, and in a few minutes had the satisfaction of seeing him reappear, followed by Sarah. And, the cloud having passed over the face of the moon, I saw that it was indeed Tom Parkes; and then I would have given the world to know what he had brought her.

The impression which Sarah's talk with the stranger in the plantation had given me of Tom's desperate wickedness had faded a good deal from my mind by this time; but this strange sight revived it. What if Tom—placid, stolid-looking, honest-faced Tom, as I had once thought him—were in reality a thief? And what if Sarah, in her master's absence, had been persuaded by him to keep stolen property? There had been something stealthy in his manner of sneaking across the lawn in the shadow with his burden which had suggested this thought; but, on the other hand, was it not much more probable that he had been turned off at Denham Court, and had brought some of his own personal property, intending to take up his abode at the Alders for a few days, in the master's absence? The all-powerful Sarah might even dare that, relying upon her power to make herself unpleasant for the rest of the household to keep her secret.

They disappeared up the stable path, and I took the opportunity to dart across the gravel-space to the front door and ring as gently as I could. Jane came down in a few minutes, very sleepy, and let me in.

"Sarah's been asking where you were, miss, and, as I let the doctor in, I told her you came back with him. I guessed as you'd come back safe, miss, when the doctor said as how a young gentleman was with you," said Jane, with elaborate archness.

I told her to go to bed as fast as she could; and, when I had followed her up-stairs and seen her into the nursery, I went softly to the head of the kitchen stairs, and, as I heard no sound and saw no light, I slipped down with my candle. The side-door by which Sarah and Mr. Rayner used to go to and from the stables was ajar, and just inside was a small old brown portmanteau. I did not dare to go all the way down to inspect it closely, as I own I should have liked to do; but in the view I got of it, as I held my candle over my head and peered at it curiously, it struck me that I had seen it before somewhere. Then I turned and fled guiltily up-stairs to my room. Haidee was sleeping and looked less feverish than when I went away. Jane had built up the fire carefully, so that it might keep in all night, and placed the drink the doctor had ordered on a little table beside the child. Her bed had been placed at the right-hand side of the fireplace, facing the door, and my screen had been put round the back to shut out all draught from the windows. I was very tired, and the moment I laid my head on the pillow I fell soundly asleep, and did not wake until the morning.

Haidee was already awake, and undoubtedly better.

"How did you sleep, darling?" said I, sitting on the bed and kissing her.

"Oh, beautifully, Miss Christie! I hardly ever woke up once, and when I did I watched the beautiful fire; I could just see it when I lay with my head so. It was so nice and warm up here. I wish mamma was up here; I should like to be up here always. I think I should have nice dreams up here, not like the ones I have down-stairs."

And she closed her eyes, as if to shut out the thought of something.

"You shall stay up here till you are quite well again, darling," said I, inwardly resolving to beg that she might sleep in my room permanently.

"Miss Christie you know you dream sometimes with your eyes wide open, just as if you were awake? I dreamt a dream like that last night."

"That was because you were ill, darling. When they are ill they dream like that."

"Do they—quite plain, like as if it was all quite real?"

"Yes; sometimes they think they see people and talk to people."

"That was like my dream. I dreamt it was while I was looking at the fire the door there opened quite gently and softly, just as if it moved quite of itself, and then I saw papa's face, and he had in his hand something red and sparkling; and, just when the door came quite wide open, I thought I sat up in bed, and he looked at me. And then the door seemed to shut quite softly again, and I didn't hear anything—and that was all."

"That wasn't really a dream, darling. It was just a fancy because you were ill."

"Not a dream! Papa didn't really come, did he?"

And I got up off the bed and went to the door, and showed her that it was so. Haidee leant back thoughtfully.

"Dreams are very strange things, I think. And to dream of nice things is just as good as if they really happened. And to dream of horrid things—cries and moans and things—is dreadful!"—and she shuddered.

"You sha'n't dream of anything dreadful while you are up here with me, darling," said I, soothing the little delicate fanciful creature, and wondering whether some of the cries she spoke of had not been real, and not only dreams.

For I was beginning since last night, when I had witnessed her real feeling about her child, to be very sorry for Mrs. Rayner, and to wonder whether I could not draw nearer to her in some way through Haidee, and, through understanding her better, learn to sympathize with her still more. Her misery had seemed so real, and, on the other hand, I had never seen her so utterly broken down and helpless. When once the mask of cold self-control which she usually wore had disappeared, she seemed such a weak thing that it appeared scarcely possible that she could have such a force of obstinacy in her as Mr. Rayner had described her to possess. Mad or sane, I should never be afraid of her again. I only felt utterly sorry for her; and anxious to let her know how much I longed in some way to cheer her dull life. Why was she so reticent to her husband? What if I, being a woman, and having now established, through my care of her child, some claim on her gratitude, could win my way to her heart altogether, persuade her to leave Geldham for a time, and meet Mr. Rayner on his return with the triumphant news that at last his wife was ready to break through her apathy and come back into the world of men again? The thought made my heart beat faster, and I longed to begin my delicate work at once.

But I was disappointed. I had all my meals by myself that day, except tea, which I had up-stairs with Haidee, for Sarah said Mrs. Rayner was too unwel to leave her room. When we had finished tea, I still sat up-stairs by my pupil's bedside, and my high spirits at the thought of Laurence's expected visit infected her, and she laughed and chattered to me in a fashion very unusual with her. At last I heard the front-door bell ring, and my heart seemed to stand still with joyful anticipation, But no one came up-stairs to fetch me, and, after a few minutes breathless waiting, I ran down-stairs, unable to bear the suspense any longer. I met Sarah in the hall.

"Who was that, Sarah?" asked I, too much excited to think of a decent subterfuge.

Strange that Gregson's boy should come to the front door, thought I. I could not go up-stairs again. It was half-past six; and at half-past seven I was to be at my "nest," if Laurence had not come before. I thought that hour would never end. It seemed to me to be getting very dark too. When the hands of the schoolroom clock pointed to twenty minutes past, I put on my shawl, and had opened the window to go out, when Sarah came in.

"If you please, miss, would you mind helping me with the store-list? Mrs. Rayner is too ill to do it, and it has to be posted to-morrow morning."

"Oh, Sarah, won't it do in—in half an hour?" said I breathlessly.

"Mrs. Rayner will want me then, miss. It won't take you more than five minutes."

I followed her out of the room, suppressing my impatience as well as I could. But the task did not really seem to take long. In what appeared to be about a quarter of an hour I was free, and I dashed into the garden, through the plantation, towards my "nest."

I had not looked at the clock again, but surely it was very dark for half-past seven! Yet Laurence was not there! And, as I stood wondering whether something was wrong, I heard the church-clock strike eight. What awful mistake had I made? Was he gone? Should I really not see him again? A bit of paper half hidden in the grass, not on my seat, but under it, caught my eye. It was a leaf torn from a pocket-book. On it was scrawled in pencil, in Laurence's handwriting—

"Good-bye, my darling! Remember what I prophesied last night, and if no other warning will serve you, take this one. I called at the Alders at seven, and was told by Sarah that you were tired out with watching by Haidee, and were asleep. I come here to-night, and you are not here. know it, is a trick, and I know who is at the bottom of it. When I left you last night, there were two men in a cart outside the stable-gate of the Alders. If anything happens, write. Write to me at the following address." Then followed the address, and the scrawl ended with—"I have spoken to Mrs. Manners. Good-bye, my darling! Take care of yourself for the next six weeks, and you shall never need to take care of yourself again.

"Your devotedly loving
"LAURENCE."

I kissed the note, thrust it into the front of my frock, and fled into the house and into the schoolroom. Sarah was just turning away from the mantelpiece; and by the clock it was just four minutes past eight.

How the time had flown between my leaving the schoolroom with Sarah and my going into the garden!

CHAPTER XXI.

I sat down by the table as soon as Sarah had left the schoolroom, and rested my head in my hands. I did not want to cry, though a few tears trickled down between my fingers at the thought that I should not see Laurence again before he went away; but I wanted to put the events of the evening together and find out what they meant. There was only one conclusion to come to; Sarah had deliberately prevented my meeting him. The ring I had heard had been Laurence's; and, after sending him away by means of a falsehood, she had had another ready for me when I asked who it was. "Gregson's boy!" I had thought it strange at the time that the carpenter's son should come to the front door, and now I felt sure that he had not been there at all.

I looked again at Laurence's note. He had called at the house at seven, he said. Now I distinctly remember that, after I had heard the bell ring and met Sarah, I came into the schoolroom and found by the clock that it was half-past six. I had sat there until twenty minutes past seven, and during that time there had been no other ring at the hall door. And I had noticed how dark it was getting; then, just as I was opening the window to go out, Sarah had come in and asked me to help her with the store-list, and I had been free in a very short time; yet on my arrival at my "nest," the church clock had struck eight.

Sarah must have put the schoolroom clock back.

I had found her just now turning from the mantelpiece, and I could not doubt that, her object being gained, she had been putting the clock right again. This malicious persecution frightened me. Was I safe in the same house with a woman who would take so much trouble merely to prevent my having a last interview with my lover?

There had been a matter-of-fact deliberateness in the way she had answered me about the bell and asked me to do the list which had the effect of alarming me still more than the savage manner in which she used to look at and speak to me when she was jealous of some new proof of the consideration with which I was treated at the Alders. This was Wednesday, and Mr. Rayner would probably not be back before Saturday. What new proof of animosity would she manage to give me in these three days? That she would not let this opportunity of showing her rooted dislike to me go by I felt sure. I remembered how earnestly she had begged to stay, and wondered whether the wish for a chance of playing me some unkind trick had had anything to do with it; for Sarah was not likely to have forgiven me for having been the cause of her threatened dismissal. It was of no use to speculate upon what she might do, if she grew too intolerable, I could telegraph to Mr. Rayner, and he would find some means of bringing her to reason.

I turned to Laurence's note to divert my thoughts from her, and wondered why, in those few hurried lines to me, he had thought it worth while to mention that he saw two men in a cart outside the stable gate when he left me on the previous night. What meaning could the incident have to him? It had one to me, certainly; but then it was because I had seen Tom Parkes bring in the little portmanteau, and then return across the lawn with Sarah. The mention of this cart revived my curiosity regarding the past night's adventure. I could make nothing of it myself; but I thought I would write to Laurence and tell him what I had seen; and, if he knew anything more, my information might lead him to an explanation of the whole occurrence. I was still staring at the note when Sarah came in again, this time to bring me my candle, an office she seldom undertook. I saw a look of disappointment and alarm come over her face as her quick eyes fell on my note, and when I got up-stairs I took the precaution to learn the address I was to write to by heart before enclosing this farewell note with Laurence's first, which I still wore around my neck.

The next morning I received a letter from Mr. Rayner. He had been to the Gaiety Theatre on the very night of his arrival in town, and sent me a crumpled programme of the performance, with some comments which did not interest me very much, as I had not seen any of the actors and actresses he mentioned, having been only once to the theatre in my life. I laughed to myself at Laurence's fancy that he had seen Mr. Rayner in the dress of a navvy at the station that night. The letter, which had been written at four o'clock on Wednesday, said further that he was going that evening to the Criterion Theatre, where he hoped to be better entertained. He said he had written to Mrs. Rayner, and sent his love to Haidee by her, but that he enclosed a second portion to me to give her, as she was not well. Then he gave me a message to deliver which I would much rather not have been intrusted with, and at breakfast I said to Sarah—

"Mr. Rayner has sent a message to you in a letter I have just received from him. He says: 'Tell Sarah not to forget the work she has to do in my absence.'"

As I looked up after reading this out to her, I saw that her face had turned quite livid; the old hatred of me gleamed in her eyes, and I wished Mr. Rayner had written to her himself, instead of making me deliver a message which appeared so distasteful to her.

She said, "Very well, miss;" and I wondered what work it was.

I spent most of the day by Haidee's bedside. I did not see Mrs. Rayner, for she appeared neither at breakfast nor at dinner, and to my inquiries Sarah gave the same answer as before—that she was not well enough to leave her room. She could not even see any one either, Sarah said, when I asked if I might read to her; and I was obliged to see my hopes of gaining her sympathy fade away, and to recognise the fact that either she would not or Sarah would not allow me a chance of breaking down the barrier of reserve between us. I could let her see that I had not forgotten her, though; and, seized by a happy thought, I went in search of an old knife and a basket and went into the garden to gather some flowers.

It was about four o'clock in the afternoon; the leaves and grass were still wet, for it had been raining hard all the morning, and the mist was rising already from the marsh. There were scarcely any flowers left now, but by wandering into remote nooks of the garden, and by stepping in among the plants and spying out every blossom hidden under the leaves, I managed at last to collect enough for a very fair October bouquet. I took them into the house, and it suddenly occurred to me that they would make a better display in a large wire-covered vase that stood on a whatnot in the drawing-room. So I ran in there, with my frock still tucked up, the garden-knife in one dirty hand and my basket of flowers on my arm. I had my hand still on the handle of the door, when I saw there was a gentleman, standing at the window, looking out into the garden. I slipped back hastily, hoping to escape before he could catch sight of me; but he turned, crossed the room quickly, and stopped me.

"Miss Christie!"

It was Mr. Carruthers.

"They told me you were out." Sarah's work, thought I.

"No; I was only in the garden."

There was no help for my appearance now, so I quietly took the pin out of my frock and let it down while he went on talking.

"I am very, very glad to see you. You are looking very well. I am afraid," said he still holding my hand, "you have not been missing any of us much."

"Well, you see I had known the people there only two days," said I seriously.

"'The people there!' As if I cared how little you missed 'the people there!' When I say you had not been missing any of us, I mean you have not been missing me."

A CAPTAIN SAVED.

How a Member of Her Majesty's Service Escaped Destruction—His Graphic Account.

(Hamilton, Ont., Spectator.)

Some little commotion was occasioned several months ago regarding the experience of a gentleman well known in this city, and at the time the matter was a subject of general conversation. In order to ascertain all the facts bearing upon the matter, a representative of this paper was dispatched yesterday to interview the gentleman in question with the following result:

Captain W. H. Nicholls, formerly in Her Majesty's service, is a man well advanced in years, who has evidently seen much of the world. Endowed by nature with a strong constitution, he was enabled to endure hardships under which many men would have succumbed. Through all privation and exposure he preserved his constitution unimpaired. A number of years ago, however, he began to feel a strange undermining of his life. He noticed that he had less energy than formerly, that his appetite was uncertain and changing, that he was unaccountably weary at certain times and correspondingly energetic at others; that his head pained him, first in front and then at the base of the brain, and that his heart was unusually irregular in its action. All these troubles he attributed to some passing disorder and gave them little attention, but they seemed to increase in violence continually. To the writer he said:

"I never for a moment thought these things amounted to anything serious and I gave them little, if any, thought: but I felt myself growing weaker all the while and could in no way account for it."

"Did you take no steps to check these symptoms?"

"Very little, if any. I thought they were only temporary in their nature and would soon pass away. But they did not pass away and kept increasing. Finally, one day, after more than a year had passed, I noticed that my feet and ankles were beginning to swell and that my face under the eyes appeared puffy. This indication increased until my body began to fill with water, and finally swelled to enormous proportions. I was afflicted with acute rheumatic pains and was fearful at times that it would attack my heart. I consulted one of our most prominent physicians and he gave me no hope of ever recovering. He said that I might live several months, but my condition was such that neither myself nor any of my family had the slightest hope of my recovery. In this condition a number of months passed by, during which time I had to sit constantly in an easy chair, not being able to lie down, lest I should choke to death. The slight pains I had at first experienced increased to the most terrible agonies. My thirst was intense and a good portion of the time I was wholly unconscious. When I did recover my senses I suffered so severely that my cries could be heard for nearly a mile. No one can have any idea of the agony I endured. I was unable to eat or even swallow fluids. My strength entirely deserted me and I was so exhausted that I prayed day and night for death. The doctors could not relieve me and I was left in a condition to die and that, too of Bright's disease of the kidneys in its most terrible form. I think I should have died had I not learned of a gentleman who had suffered very much as I had, and I resolved to pursue the same course of treatment which entirely cured him. I accordingly began and at once I felt a change for the better going on in my system. In the course of a week the swelling had gone from my abdomen and diminished all over my body and I felt like another man. I continued the treatment and am happy to say that I was entirely cured through the wonderful, almost miraculous power of Warner's Safe Cure, which I consider the most valuable discovery of modern times."

"And you feel apparently well now?"

"Yes, indeed. I am in good health, eat heartily, and both the doctors and my friends are greatly surprised and gratified at my remarkable restoration, after I was virtually in the grave. My daughter, who has been terribly troubled with a pain in her back caused by kidney trouble has also been cured by means of this same great remedy and my family and myself have constituted ourselves a kind of missionary society for supplying the poor of our neighborhood with the remedy which has been so invaluable to us."

As the writer was returning home he reflected upon the statements of the noble old man with whom he had conversed, and was impressed not only with the truth of his assertions, but also with the sincerity of all his acts. And he could not but wish that the thousands who are suffering with minor troubles which become so serious unless taken in time might know of Captain Nicholl's experience and the manner in which he was saved. And that is the cause of this article.

PERSONALS.

About the Queen — Prince Dolgronki — Gen. Gordon—Victor Hugo — Queen of Madagascar — and other great people.

Sir John Lubbock intends to call attention in Parliament to the state of forestry in England, and Dr. Lyons to bring in a bill for the reforesting of certain parts of the waste lands of Ireland.

Mr. Paul Claes, an eminent distiller, who died lately at Lemberg, Belgium, was head of an establishment founded by his family in 1690, which has made the fortune of the town.

Baron Tennyson took his seat in the House of Lords the other evening. He was compelled to borrow the robes of Lord Coleridge, his own robes having been recently stolen.

Mr. Chenery was the only editor of the London Times who ever visited the United States. This he did several years ago, long before a tour here had become the correct thing for the inquiring politician.

At a recent sale of the library of the late Mr. Meek of Brantridge Park, in England, a series of nineteen letters written by Lord Byron to his mother during his travels realized the large sum of $1,412.

The Decker incident has greatly excited Prince Bismarck. He is much emaciated, having lost over forty pounds in weight in a short time. This is regarded as a bad sign. The Prince's diet has been completely changed. His condition causes much anxiety.

Mr. Buckle, the new editor of the London Times, is only thirty. Mr. Delane was only twenty-five when he succeeded to the post. Mr. Mudford of the Standard, Mr. Hill of the Daily News, Mr. Edwin Arnold of the Telegraph, Mr. Hutton of the Spectator, and Mr. Greenwood of the St. James Gazette, are somewhere around sixty.

Permission has been granted to Captain East of Her Majesty's corvette Comus, and Commander Thornton, of Her Majesty's man-of-war Kingfisher, to accept gold medals from President Arthur in recognition of their conduct in assisting two distressed American vessels off Vancouver Island, in October, 1882.

Gen. Gordon, the commander of the English forces in Egypt, thus expresses his views as to a future life: "I think that this life is only one a series of lives, which our incarnated part has lived. I have little doubt of our having preexisted; and that also in the time of our preexistence we were actively employed. So, therefore, I believe in our active employment in a future life, and like the thought. We shall, I think, be far more perfect in a future life, and, indeed, go on toward perfection, but never attain it."

It is reported that Mr. Leigh Smith, the intrepid Arctic explorer, whose unfortunate voyage on the Eira and rescue by the Hope two years ago will be remembered, contemplates starting on another expedition, probably next summer. It is intended to have a new vessel built on the lines of the Eira, and the crew will be almost the same as that which accompanied the explorer on his last voyage. Mr. Smith was deeply respected by and gained the entire confidence of his crew, hence their desire to join him in his new enterprise.

The new Queen of Madagascar is young, of a pleasing expression of countenance, and singularly dignified and ladylike. On the occasion of her inauguration she wore a dress of ivory satin, with much gold embroidery. She had a train two or three yards in length of handsome dark crimson velvet, spangled with gold, borne by six officers of State. The gold crown was already on her head, and thus she stood upon the throne. The Prime Minister is her wedded husband, and old enough to be her grandfather. She is the third Queen who has been his wife.

Victor Hugo entered upon his eighty-third year on Feb. 26. The French Government struck a medal in his honor, the presentation of which was the feature of the celebration. In the poet's house, in the avenue called after his name, crowds of his friends and admirers flocked to pay him homage. His drawing room was filled with choice flowers sent from all parts of the country. A reception in the evening was almost forced upon him, but, in spite of his natural wish to retire early and seek repose, the aged poet, surrounded by the members of his family, had a kind word for every one who had come to congratulate him.

Prince Dolgorouki, who is known to be entirely in the confidence of the Czar, had lately an interview with the Emperor of Germany, and immediately proceeded on a visit to Prince Bismarck at Friedrichsruhe, whither the Minister of War was presently summoned. It is the general belief that the object of this meeting is to consider the possibility of a reduction of the military expenses of both countries, which are such a terrible incubus upon them. The cost of the German army now reaches $116,000,000, and is met with much difficulty. It has been demonstrated that Russia, deeply in debt, can only borrow now on ruinous terms.

The Czar has just conferred a pension of $1,500 a year on the dramatic author Ostrofsky. The Russian is almine, from Pushkin down, not yet worked by our native dramatists, probably from the difficulty of the language. Catherine II., wrote several pieces. She ordered tragedies, too, after the fashion of Elizabeth, from Lemouosoff and Tredyakoffsky, and the order was executed, but the result was not equal to the "Merry Wives of Windsor," which, by the way, curiously enough, was turned into Russian by the Empress herself, and figures on the Muscovite boards as "A Pretty Basketful of Linen."

Lesseps has a running account with sleep, taking twenty-four hours at a time, and at another none for five or six nights. In travelling he gets into the first compartment at hand, and sits anywhere; if he finds an agreeable companion he talks, if not he folds his arms and goes to sleep, never waking until he reaches his destination. When he went down the other day to Cestrey, near Bourdeaux, he requested the guard to make him least he should go beyond. On a voyage from Marseilles to Alexandria he slept 107 hours out of the 130 of the voyage, and then not for some days.

The passage in Queen Victoria's book respecting Dr. Norman Macleod's sermon on war in October, 1870, when he obliquely applied the to France denunciations of Isaiah, is not pleasing to French readers. One Paris newspaper says: "Her most gracious Majesty has revealed her political sympathies, and shown that she is still a German by birth and breeding." Another speaks of the stupid but widespread prejudice which made the cause of Germany that of justice and morality against corruption, and adds: "We have considered that Prince Bismarck's greatest adroitness at the time of the war was his creating a belief in German virtue and French vices. There was never greater success in defaming before assassinating."

Time-Locks.

Since the first time-lock was made in England, in 1831, there have been many devices for time-locks, many of which have been the source of long-continued and expensive litigation. The application of dynamite to burglary has presented a new problem to the safemakers and the lockmakers. It was thought that the acme of protection was assured when the safemakers made a safe without any keyhole or any crevice by which an explosive could be introduced, or any exterior surface which could be drilled, or wedged or pried. But the latest device of the burglar to set the time-lock going, by concussion from the cuside, presented a new problem to be solved, in order that the evolution of safe and lock-making should keep pace with the evolution of burglary.

It appears to be generally conceded that no safe can be made that cannot be opened by experts in a given time. The utmost that the safe and lockmakers profess to do now, is to make the burglars' work so difficult that they cannot do the robbery within the time in which a safe is most accessible to them. The latest problem for the time lockmakers was, therefore, to arrange their mechanism so that a dynamite shock from the outside of a safe would not either dislodge the lock from its fastenings or set the main spring free so that it would run down in a few seconds, instead of slowly unwinding until the proper time for releasing the protecting bolt. Some of the lockmakers claim to have accomplished this by means of two new appliances. One of these mounts the lock on springs, so that a dynamite shock that sends it out of place is expended on the springs, and when the shock is over, the lock returns to its place. This prevents the use of small charges of dynamite, which sometimes have been used to jar loose the mechanism of the clock without making a shock that would alarm anybody in the next room or in any part of the same room. The other protection against the dynamite fiends consists in a peculiar mechanism of the time-lock, by which any attempt to run it down before the specified time is defeated by the immediate change of conditions in the lock, so that even if the mainspring runs down after the shock the lock is not opened. It remains to be seen whether evolution in burglary will be equal to these new devices. —N. Y. Sun.

A Colorado Mining Town.

It does not take many days to build the kind of town miners are willing to live in, and they don't care what sort of a place they put it in, either, if it is only near the mines. It may be in the very midst of a pine forest, or out on the steep, bare side of a mountain, all stones and rocks. They cut down a few trees, and leave all the stumps standing; or they clear away the biggest of the stones, enough to make a sort of street; and then every man falls to and builds the cheapest house he can, in the quickest way; sometimes of logs, sometimes out of rough boards; often only with one room, very rarely with more than three. When they wish to make them very fine they make the end, fronting the street, what is called a "battlements front;" that is, a straight square wall, higher than the house, so as to convey the impression that the house is much bigger than it is. It is a miserable make-believe, and goes farther than any other one thing to give to the new towns in the West a hideous and contemptible look. These log cabins, board shantics, and battlement are all crowded as near together as they can be, and are set close to the street: no front yards, no back yards, no yards at the sides.—but, around the whole settlement, a stony wilderness. It isn't worth while to put anything in order, because there is no knowing how long the people will stay. Perhaps the mines will not turn out to be good ones; and then everybody will move away, and in very little more time than it took to build the town it will be deserted. There are a great many such deserted towns in Colorado and California. They always seem to me to look like a kind of graveyard.

Valentines, Past and Present.

The days of the valentine appear to be numbered. The good old-fashioned valentine, hideous in form, flimsy in material, and garish in color, with its halting sonnet and senseless compliment, at least, has vanished. The modern lover prefers more substantial allurements; at least his mistress does. And these are provided in plenty in the West-end shops—valentines elaborate in art, rich in embroideries, delicate satins, with sylvan scenes painted thereon; boxes enticing in their smartness and containing gloves by the dozen to fit the daintiest hands, or sweet-smelling perfumes, curious needlework, rings, bracelets, fine ribbons, fans laden with wonderful feathers, and fictitious flowers, all perhaps appropriate, but what prettier valentine is there for a lady on Valentine's day than a box of fresh-pulled violets?—Pall Mall Gazette.

ECCENTRIC SUICIDES.

A JUVENILE ROVER.

About 9 o'clock one recent night a gentleman discovered a neatly dressed little girl near the corner of Dearborn and Lake streets, Chicago, drawing a sled upon which there was a bundle. As he was about to pass her she asked him to tell her the way to a hotel. He directed her to the Commercial, and then followed her to see that she went there, suspecting that she had run away from home. After she had entered he went to an officer and told him what he had suspected. The officer at once went to the hotel to investigate the matter. Upon entering the office, dragging her sled after her, she asked for a room. Mr. C. A. Wallace, the manager of the hotel, at once took in the situation, assigned her a room, and had her shown to it, the sled and its contents accompanying her. When asked by Mr. Wallace why she came alone, she said her papa had sent her there to remain all night, and she would go back in the morning. After she had been safely housed in her room the officer went up and got her, bringing her down to the office, where he closely questioned her for some time, but the story she told first was so firmly adhered to that the officer could not shake her in it, and was forced to retire without becoming any wiser than he was at first.

After the officer left Mr. Wallace took her to the parlor, where she played several pieces on the piano for him, and soon became communicative. In a short time he succeeded in learning from her that her name was Pepita Christianson, the adopted daughter of Mrs. M. Christianson, who resides at No. 270 Erie street. She said her father and mother were dead, and that she had been taken by Mrs. Christianson, as her own child. She had packed up her things, put them on the sled, and while her mamma was at the theatre, had slipped out, going over to Cass street, then south to some street near the river, west to State and from there had reached the Commercial Hotel by the direction of a gentleman.

Her outfit, which was wrapped in a shawl and a sheet, consisted of silk and woollen dresses, linen, stockings and sundry garments indicating that to make her camfortable. She had her jewellery, which consisted of elegant bracelets, rings, pins and earrings, a watch, and in her pocketbook was a plentiful supply of money, amounting to about $15. She was dressed in full winter costume, including an elegant cloak with fur cape and muff, plainly showing that she had not been illy provided for in any respect. She was about 11 years of age, and handsome and intelligent, her actions at the hotel showing that she was unusually bright.

By the time her story was secured by Mr. Wallace it was after 10 o'clock, and, realizing that it would be better for such a child not to remain alone at a hotel, Mr. Dabb, the proprietor of the Commercial, called a carriage, and took her to his home, at No. 75 North Morgan street, where he placed her in the care of his mother. He said that if she had run away from home she might run away from the hotel, and as she had told two stories it might take some time to learn what was the true situation, pending which she would be safe at his home. Before going, he instructed the police to take steps at once to discover the home and friends of the child. At 11 o'clock Tuesday night a reporter went to No. 270 Erie street, arriving a few minutes before the mother of the little girl. When she came in, and received information that her little one had wandered off, she was almost heart broken for a time until she realized that her child was safe and in good hands. A carriage was called at once, and the vehicle hurried to the residence of Mr. Dabb, where it was learned that the little one was in bed. Mrs. Dabb at once notified the child that her mother awaited her in the parlor below, Pepita immediately arose, hurriedly dressed, and in a very few minutes came running down-stairs opened the parlor door and was soon in her mothers arm's, both exhibiting their joy in tears, while they clung to each other with a fondness that was touching to those who witnessed it.

When Pepita was asked why she had left mamma, the only answer she could give was: "I don't know, mamma, dear; I don't know. I want to go home, and never want to go away any more." It was some time before either could sufficiently recover from the shock to take their leave, which occurred after midnight, with many thanks to Mr. and Mrs. Dabb for their kindness. Mother and daughter were driven home as rapidly as the carriage could take them there. No mother was ever more happy to recover her child than was Mrs, Christianson to get her little child Pepita, and the child was in raptures to know that her mother had found her and was taking her to her happy home.—Chicago Times.

Tax-Title Beer.

"Vhas dere sooch a thing as some tax-titles on a man's house and lot?" he asked as he entered the City Treasurer's office the other day.

"Why, yes. Sometimes the property is sold for taxes and bid in, and the bidder then has a tax-title to the land."

"How many folks can haf tax titles?"

"That is hard to say."

"Couldn't twenty men haf some tax-titles on me?"

"Probably not."

"Vhell, dot's shust what I tell my old vhomans, but she shake herself all oafer und cry like a shild. You see, about a week ago a stranger came into my place und says I vhas a good fellow und he doan' like to make me troubles. He has a tax-title on me, but he gifs it up if I treats him. Vhell, dot seems sheap enough, und he wipes of his shin und goes avhay."

"And another came?"

"Anoder! Vny, sir, I count oop more ash twenty! Eafery day last vheek somepody comes aroundt mit a tax title on me, und some days I haf three. Each man he comes in und says I vhas a goot citizen und he doan' like to mahe me troubles, und den he tells me dot he has some tax titles on my lot. I vhas kept so scart all der time I can't half do peesness."

"Have you one of the papers with you?"

"I see no bapers at all. Each man who has a tax title signs his name on a sheet of baper dot he quit claims on me."

He was told that it was a new wrinkle among the dead beats to drink his beer without pay, and when he fully understood the situation he smiled all over and replied:

"Say doot vhas a goot one on me, but you keep shtill; as soon as I get home somepody will come in mit a tax title on me I tells him to sit down, and I locks der door und calls my dog und der old vhomans und my poy Saon. Tax-titles vhas going out of peesness on my shtreet!"

A Girl's Mistaken Heroism.

An Irish nurse-girl in New York is possessed of coolness and heroism that deserves to be put to better use Her name, more worthy to live in song and story than those of the knights and heroines of the middle ages, is Katie McDonnell. She had given her affections to one Dennis Hennelly, but, taking the advice of her brothers, and friends, refused to marry him until he should break off his evil habits. For this refusal he shot her at the door of the house where she was taking care of an infant. With a pistol-ball in her side she held herself against the railing, declared that she was not hit, and, while her brutal lover raised his arm to fire a second shot, urged him to flee to avoid arrest. With blood flowing from her wound she entered the house, went up to her mistress' room, took the infant she was caring for, and found her way to her chamber. There she fainted from fright and loss of blood. She never called for assistance, however. Suffering the most intense pain, and fearing every moment might be her last, she fondled the child and put it to sleep. Twice in the night the child cried for food, and the girl rose from the bed and obtained it, that its parents might not hear a noise and, coming to the room, discover her condition and notify the police. When found in the morning she was supposed to be dying, and was very reluctant to state how she had received her injury. She was afterward removed to a hospital, where she took all the blame of the affair upon herself, and expressed the hope that her brutal lover would not be punished. It is a shame that a girl possessed of some of the noblest attributes of her sex should have offered her devotion at so poor an altar. The brute that would attempt to murder such a girl deserves to share the fate of those who were devoured by wild beasts in the arena at Rome.

A Big Hotel in London.

London will soon rival New York in the number and magnificence of its hotels. Yesterday another sumptuous caravanserai, not inferior in size and luxuriousness to the largest of the American establishments, was opened. Where all the guests are to come from who are expected to fill the three hundred bed rooms of the First Avenue hotel might puzzle one if it were not remembered that in this metropolis there are slumbering every night fifty thousands sojourners who were not here twenty-four hours hence. The population of a town is daily poured into this city and has to find lodging for itself somewhere. But the first Avenue hotel does not expect to find its account in casual visitors alone. It is supposed that many people tired of housekeeping, with all its attendant troubles, will take up their abode permanently beneath the roofs of the vast building in Holborn. The system, well established in America, has already gained a hold in this country. But if it is to be successful, the ways of the British hotel-keeper and some of his charges—especially in the manner of eating and drinking—will have to be altered a good deal. American hosts do not expect to pay the entire expenses of their business out of the wine which is "consumed on the premises."—St. James Gazette.

Our Artillery at Shoeburyness.

Sir Thomas Brass, K.C.B., M.P., at the distribution of prizes to the Third Kent Artillery (Royal Arsenal Brigade), recently, said in addressing the brigade that he had been informed by Colonel Hozier that on the occasion of the late competitions at Shoeburyness, the corps, for almost the first time in its history, did not get the first place which it usually held; but they had been beaten by a party of volunteers from Canada, and if the men of the 3rd Kent were to yield the palm to any competitors, no rivals should be more welcome than their gallant friends from Canada. "The presence of volunteers from Canada," he said, "proves that the good example set by the home volunteers is being followed by the great colonial dependencies, and they know that the force is even more important with them than with us. Depend upon it, the emergency might be greater in Canada, and therefore we should rejoice that the Canadians, with our fellow-countrymen in Australia, have formed great bodies of volunteers," (Hear, hear.)

A ROMANCE OF CHICAGO.

Waiting Six years for a Wife.

The following story is a true one. If the names of the parties are not given it is because they object to publicity. The facts, however, are known not only to the employers of the husband, but to a number of friends.

Nearly seven years ago Mr.———, a native of Chambersburg, Pa., was a confidential clerk for a New York house. He fell in love with and became engaged to a daughter of a wealthy Judge, who was a resident of Chambersburg. The day was set for the marriage, and all the arrangements were made by the father-in-law for a grand celebration such as he thought befitted the dignity of the occasion. Shortly before the wedding the prospective son-in-law was overtaken by misfortune. He had indorsed for a friend, the friend failed to take up his notes, and the young man lost what he had—a farm near Chambersburg, with considerable money, and also all the cash he had saved up during his service in New York. The moment that he learned of his misfortune he went to the Judge at Chambersburg, told him what had happened to him, and said that while as anxious as ever to marry his daughter he could not consent in view of the change in his circumstances to have as grand and costly a wedding as had previously been arranged for. He was on the day appointed, quietly and unostentiously, and then take her with him to share his fortunes. The Judge, however, a man of obstinacy, insisted in carrying out the programme in all its details. It was his daughter who was to be married, and he insisted that the ceremony should take place with all the pomp and parade of which he thought she was deserving. Mr. ——— declined, and left for New York that night. Early the next morning the young lady followed him. They were married in New York, lived together for two or three days, and then she returned to her home, he remaining at the metropolis.

Not long after the father-in-law died. By his will he disinherited his daughter, but perhaps in a moment of relenting, perhaps with a malignant desire to try their patience, he inserted a proviso that, if they should live apart for six years, never meeting, never corresponding, trying to keep no communication whatever, at the end of that time, if these facts were proven to the satisfaction of the trustees of the estate, the daughter might have a share. For nearly two years the husband lived in New York. Then, his health failing, he went to Denver. After staying there about two years he came to Chicago, entered the employ of a large manufacturing house, and soon became, by virtue of his natural abilities and his attention to business, their confidential man. All this time never wrote to her, nor received letters from her. It is possible, of course, that he might have heard indirectly through his mother. But there is no evidence of this, and the wife's brothers, who were steadily on the look-out to see that none of the conditions of the will were broken, were unable to find anything which could justify the trustees in declaring that the Judge's requirements had not been lived up to strictly.

During the greater part of this time Mr. ———'s employers had no idea that he was married. He kept his secret to himself religiously, and it only came out last Thanksgiving-Day, when a dinner was given by the head of the house to his leading men, and then, the six years having expired, Mr.———felt warranted in stating to the head of the firm that he was married and had been for six years. The trustees of the estate have decided that the terms of the will had been complied with, and that Mrs. ——— was entitled to her share of her father's estate, amounting to about $25,000—not what is nowadays called a fortune, but enough to enable them to live in comfortable independence. Soon after that, all business matters being settled up, the wife came to the city and met her husband, whom she had not seen for over six years. He remains in the employ of the firm, and they are both living happily together in pleasant quarters on the South Side.

The husband is a little exultant over the reward of his patience and endurance, just as Jacob felt joyous after he had served fourteen years and finally earned the hand of Rachel, and is not disinclined to tell the story of his early love and the long separation. The wife, however, is more sensitive; is unwilling to have the story known among the acquaintances whom she has made since she came here, and it is, therefore, rather out of deference to her wishes that the names of the parties are not given.

NEWSPAPER LAW.

1. Any person who takes a newspaper regularly from the post office, whether directed to his name or another's, or whether he has subscribed or not—is responsible for the payment.

2. If a person orders his paper discontinued he must pay all arrearages, or the publisher may continue to send it until payment is made, and then collect the whole amount, whether the paper is taken out of the office or not.

3 Subscribers refuse or neglect to take periodicals or newspapers from the office to which they are directed, they are held responsible until they have settled their bills.

4 The Courts have decided that refusing to take newspapers and periodicals from the post office, or removing and leaving them uncalled for, is PRIMA FACIE evidence of intentional fraud.

MARKDALE MAR. 20, 1884.

Surprise Party.

Over fifty young people surprised Mrs. Rowe's household on Friday evening last, when the following address was read and presentation made:

ARTEMESIA, Mar. 13, '84.

DEAR FRIEND,—It gives us much pleasure in meeting but regret at parting with you on the present occasion. And before parting we feel that it is our pleasurable duty to give you at least a small memento of our respect and esteem. Friends who have always added stimulous to the sociability and friendship exhisting among the people throughout the neighborhoods. Dear friends, it is with sincere regret that we part with you, we feel that we are about to sustain a great loss to our neighborhood in the removal of kind friends, obliging neighbors, and good citizens. Allow us now to present to you this album, trusting that the miniatures you may place within it may recall many happy recollections of the originals; also this cap which we wish you to present to your husband, our highly esteemed and respected friend, showing him that he still holds a place in our affections, although absent he has not been forgotten, and we assure you that our best wishes go with with you, hoping that you will have happiness and prosperity in your new home.

Signed in behalf of your friends,

DANIEL WALKER,
SAMUEL GILBERT,
SAMUEL WARLING,
GEORGE WARLING.

Surprise Party.

Mrs. Rowe was a second time made the recipient of an address and presentation prior to her departure for the Northwest, as follows:

DEAR MADAM,—Your friends and neighbors of this locality deeply regret the occasion which has convoked us to give you and family the parting hand. We very reluctantly part with one whom we all esteem so highly, your absence in the neighborhood will be very much felt, more especially in the time of sickness, either by night or day you were always ready to sympathize with the sufferer, and to administer aid and consolation where it was needed. We consider, however, that the course you are now pursuing is just and lawful, in joining your dear partner who is awaiting your arrival in the Great Lone Land, our best wishes go with you and your children. May the God of Providence be with you in preserving you from accident while on your journey and all along the journey of life, through its windings and vicissitudes, may that God who has been your guide thus far conduct you and your family to the Heaven of eternal repose, and if we shall never meet on earth again, may we meet where friends fondly cherished shall meet never to part. Please accept this present, not for its intrinsic value, but as a memento to remind you of your many friends in this locality.

Signed on behalf of a number of friends, of this neighborhood,

PHILIP SPARLING.

NOTICE.—We wish it distinctly understood that we do not hold ourselves responsible for the opinions expressed by our correspondents.

To Editor Standard:

DEAR SIR,—Inclosed please find subscription for '84. I cannot but express my high appreciation of your paper. There was a time when I doubted the success of it in regard to its non-political principles, but time has completely changed my opinion in that respect, so much so that I now am strongly convinced that it is the proper principle for a strictly local paper. The fact of the large city party papers being utterly unreliable as authority on political questions is patent to all, and I am sorry to say that many of the country papers endeavor to see how much they can imitate, and mislead in this respect.

Your paper has been conducted in such a way as to gain the respect of the respectable class, and none need hesitate introducing it as a family paper, it being void of anything that would have a tendency to corrupt the morals of their family, but rather to elevate. This is a very important point now a-days, when so much trashy literature is abroad in the world, even the serial stories of the STANDARD are of a high class, and always contain something profitable as well as highly interesting.

Wishing you unbounded success in the newspaper enterprise,

I am,
J. C.

Osprey, March 16th, 1884.

To the Editor of the Standard.

DEAR SIR,—It is exceedingly strange that the people of Markdale are not more alert in matters concerning the advancement of the village. The Messrs. C. F. Cliff & Sons, of Traverston, having been requested by the leading men of Durham to meet them last Monday night, 17th inst., for the purpose of considering the means of establishing a large woollen and knitting mill in that town. The meeting was accordingly held and attended by a number of the most influential men. The deputation were unanimous as regards the feasibility of the plan suggested. Mr. John Shaw, of Williamsford, woollen manufacturer, was also present and addressed the meeting Owing to the breaking out of the fire in Cochrane's foundry, the meeting was suddenly brought to a termination without any definite understanding. Now, Mr. Editor, it is just here I should like to make a suggestion. Would it not be advisable for the people of Markdale to step in now and determine to have that mill here instead of in Durham? When we consider the splendid shipping facilities enjoyed by Markdale, together with its many natural advantages, it is reasonable to suppose manufacturers will give us the preference. The Messrs. Cliffs' are all practical men, having extensive experience, and the fact of their being well and favorably known in this vicinity should itself stimulate our business men to use their utmost endeavors to have them here.

Hoping the matter will receive the attention it merits, and thanking you for space afforded.

I am, &c.,
G. S. J. S.

Williamsford.

From our own correspondent.

Mr. Richard Shunn has, this week, sold his farm and steam saw mill to Mr. Ewens of Chatsworth, who will take possession forthwith.

Messrs. John and Wm. Deaver, who went to Ohio a few weeks since to look after a legasy, have returned having secured about $6,000 between them.

The election on Tuesday passed off quiet, a very small vote being polled.

Flesherton.

From our own correspondent.

J. W. Frost, Esq., of Owen Sound, gave a very interesting lecture in the town hall here last Wednesday evening on "Manitoba as I saw it in 1882." Joseph Blackburn Esq., occupied the chair, and after a few appropriate remarks introduced the speaker, who, for two hours deeply interested the audience, giving a brief resume of his trip by boat up the lakes, the magnificent scenery as saw by clear moonlight, thence by rail from Duluth to Winnipeg, a description of the floods, the prairie in the vicinity of Winnipeg, a sea of water, a graphic description of Winnipeg, its magnificent buildings, streets &c., manners and customs of the people. From there, taking in thought his hearers out over the vast and fertile plains, arriving at the city of Brandon. From that beautifully situated city one of the most charming and magnificent landscapes lie in view that eye could witness; and for farming suffice it to say in Mr. Frost's own words "If he followed the tilling of the soil in daily employment, nothing could keep him out of Manitoba." Space will not permit me to give a full report of the lecture, but we can say it was one of interest and apparently much appreciated by all. At the close of the meeting Mr. Frost was tendered a hearty vote of thanks for his very interesting address.

Mr. Roche, a young man now residing in this village, and who is working as a Bible agent in this locality, was taken suddenly and seriously ill on Monday morning last, but is now progressing favorably.

We would advise our friends and neighbors to look out for sneak thieves who are on the war path here. A short time time ago Mr. Jos. Rorke, of Thornbury, had a valuable overcoat stolen from the hall in the Flesherton hotel, and later a gentleman leaving his horse tied in one of the sheds had the blanket stolen from his horse. Such light fingered persons are only sure to be sooner or later, picked up rather suddenly.

Election day passed off very quietly here.

Dundalk.

From our own correspondent.

Mr. J. Symington, our station master, was called to see his brother who was very ill at St. Catharines; he returned on Friday evening. On Saturday morning he received a telegram stating that his brother's illness had terminated fatally.

Messrs Hanbury and Bell are erecting a building containing two stories near their brick block on the corner.

A. G. Hunter, Esq. is about to remove into the village. One year of farming has either made him independent or else thoroughly disgusted him. He will reside in the building lately purchased by him and formerly known as the Nelson estate.

The Masterson Jubilee Singers will give a concert here under the auspices of the C. M. Church, on Monday next

The grain buyers are getting a rest.

Meaford Road.

CHEESE FACTORY MEETING.—The annual meeting of the patrons of the Flesherton cheese factory was held in the Town Hall, Flesherton, on the 10th inst., for the purpose of electing officers and other general business. The following are the officers elected for the current year. President, George Stewart; Secretary, James Brodie; Directors—William Wilcox, Thorp Wright, James Beecroft, Wm. Buchanan, Sr., W. Hill, Wilmot Proble, and A. Muir.

Euphrasia Council.

The council met pursuant to adjournment on 7th March, 1884.

Members all present; minutes of last session of council read and confirmed.

Mr. Fawcett was appointed to take steps to protect the bridges on Beaver river within this township during the approaching spring freshets, and to act conjointly with Mr. Hewgill in protecting Heathcote bridge.

The Reeve and Mr. Boyd were appointed a committee to examine minutes of council for last year before publication.

The auditors' report was received and finally audited by the council, and the clerk ordered to get five hundred copies thereof, together with minutes of council for last year, published in pamphlet form for the use of the ratepayers.

The time for the collectors to return their rolls was extended until the first Friday in April next.

The Treasurer was authorized to deposit $600 of the railway sinking fund in the Canada Permanent Loan Company, or some other approved company's debentures, for five years.

The treasurer was ordered to remit as follows: R. McKnight, registrar, 75 cents for searches; the Reeve, 50 cents amount paid by him for telegraph messages in connection with crown land improvement fund; J. Farewell, $17.40 for printing up to date; Messrs Rowswell & Hutchison, $29.54 for stationery; J. L. Wilson and W. H. Dodson $14 each salary as auditors for 1883.

The Reeve's orders were issued on the Treasurer to pay as follows: R. Bowser, $4 building culvert; Walter Tyson, 50 cents for plank; J. D. Crabtree, $1 for municipal hand book; Jas. Arthur $1.17 for plank; Henry Davy 50 cents for road work.

The council adjourned until the first Friday in April next.

ROBERT DUNLOP, Tp. Clerk.

WEATHER PROBABILITIES.

Foretelling the weather is uncertain at the best, but it is certain if you catch cold in this changeable climate you can best break its ill effects with Hagyard's Pectoral Balsam, the most reliable and pleasant remedy for coughs, colds, colds, bronchial and lung complaints. It is so agreeable that even a child will take it.

FOR FIRST class axe handles go to Finnerty's shop, Elizabeth st., opposite the bank, Markdale. You can bring your own timber and have them made to order, or you can get them ready made at the shop. Sign of the Big Axe Handle. 179-85

MR. ROBERT FREEBORN, of Holland, has purchased a fine bred Clydesdale stallion, "Sir Colin." Mr. Freeborn is determined to hold a foremost position in the improvement of horses, and to that end has secured this fine animal which he will travel in this district the coming season.

Two prisoners of Sandwich jail escaped last Sunday, after shooting the Jailer dead, and Turnky Slains will probably die from the effects of a shot during the efforts of the prisoners for freedom. Kennedy one of the prisoners was captured on a ferry while crossing to Detroit but O'Callaghan the other is still at large.

NEW BANK.—Mr. David Jackson intends building a handsome two story brick building as soon as the weather permits, next to his present office, to be used as a bank. Mr. A. E. Hind is preparing the plans, and the new building will present a neat appearence when finished, and add considerable to the attractiveness of the Town.—Durham Review.

OUR local subscribers, both village and country, who receive their mail matter at Markdale P. O. will in future find the STANDARD paper in the post office after 4 o'clock every Thursday. Those however, who would prefer calling at the printing office for their paper will please let us know and we will make out a special list for them, and they can call as heretofore.

THE Farmers Advocate, for March, is in advance of former numbers in point of interest, and has a greater number of illustrations than usual. The question of Bee farming, which is receiving special interest by farmers, is taken up, and more than usual interest and space given this, now important industry. The Advocate is indeed a valuable agricultural paper. Only $1 per annum.

WE ARE pleased to see that our exchanges, which number about 30, have almost all expressed the same opinion that we advanced in the STANDARD last week in reference to the desirability of adopting some means of reducing the number of representatives at county councils. When the press is so unanimous on this question we have strong hopes that a change will speedily be made.

THE Markdale Presbyterian S. S. Anniversary was held on Thursday evening last. A goodly number was in attendance and a very pleasant and orderly time was spent. After a sumptuous repast Mr. Bowes was voted to the chair and an interesting program gone through in which those who took part justly received the applause of the audience. The proceeds amounted to $19.50.

"THE SCHOOL SUPTLEMENT" is the name of a publication, the first number of which is before us. It is published in Toronto, by Eaton, Gibson & Co., and devoted to the interests of education and will be specially interesting and useful to school teachers, and those who are aiming at a higher education. It is a four column 12 page, printed monthly on very fine paper. Subscription $1 per year.

Final Warning.—All parties indebted to H. FOSTER by note or otherwise are hereby notified that all notes and accounts not paid before the first day of April will be placed in court for collection. Notes and accounts will be found at Wm. Lucas & Co's. bank. Parties not attending to this warning will have costs added for all accounts not paid by the above date will certainly be placed in court for collection.

The Chatsworth correspondent to the O. S. Advertiser says in last week's paper: Messrs. John Cameron and Neil McColeman, the two candidates for the Local Legislature in East Grey, are about the same age and size, were born within a few miles of each other on the island of Islay Argyleshire, Scotland, came to this country at the same time, sailed up the St. Lawrence together in the same boat, sat beside each other, elbow to elbow, in the County Council for ten years, and are now pitted against each other for the same seat in the Local Legislature.

ON TUESDAY evening last the Dundalk Brass Band gave a concert in this place which was well patronized. The hall was filled and the entertainment was a decided success. The programme was ably rendered, and the audience gave evidence of their appreciation of the various parts by their hearty applause. The band has attained a very creditable position as such, having made rapid progress under the able leadership of Mr. Ketchum. The orchestra gave some excellent renderings, while the play "Paddy Miles' Boy" brought down the house repeatedly, and all carried out their various parts with ability. Mr. McEacheren is a whole team in himself, and displayed rare ability on the stage. Should they come this way again in future it will be necessary to secure a larger hall in order to admit them all.

OUR PATRONS who wish to subscribe, or renew their subscaiptien for any of the following publications will do us a favor by handing the amount in to us at the STANDARD office, viz. Weekly Mail, or Globe, Family Herald and Weekly Star, monthly Farmers Advocate, American Agriculturist, any of the above with the STANDARD for $2.00 or singly for one $1, except the Agriculturist which is $1.50.

THE PRESS is expected to be represented at every public entertainment in the town where published, as well as the surrounding vicinity, and a full report given, or at least a favorable one, and yet how often the managers of such public gatherings are either ignorant of, or wilfully ignore the customary courtesies in the shape of furnishing complimentary tickets. Should a reporter not put in an appearance, the publisher is likely to be censured with partiality. If he should, on the other hand, make it a point to attend all such entertainments through the season, it would require a nice little income for that purpose, besides the loss of time, which is in many instances of much more importance than the necessary fee. The custom of supplying the press with complimentaries is a long established one and which many appear to be ignorant of.

DR. LOW'S PLEASANT WORM SYRUP.—An agreeable, safe and effectual remedy to remove all kinds of worms.

NEW ORDER OF THINGS.—At present the Grand Trunk employees are obliged to connect themselves with either the "Grand Trunk Insurance Company" or else with the "Great Western Provident Society." An employee pays some 40 or 50 cents per month, or rather, that amount is deducted from his wages. Then, in case of injury or death, his family receive $600 or $700 in the latter case, and so much if injured. One reason for having these compulsory insurances was because, years ago, there was hardly a week passed by without a conductor or some other official presenting employees and others with a long subscription list collecting for the widow and family of some one killed in an accident, or in aid of some one seriously injured. Now it is a rare thing to hear of a subscription list. In fact, they are forbidden by the authorities. The new order of things is to unite the Grand Trunk and Great Western societies in one, to be known throughout the Dominion and the states of Maine and Michigan as the "Grand Trunk Insurance and Provident Society." Employees will, in that case, have to trifle more per month, but the families will receive over $2,000 after an accident, when they did not receive half that amount before.—Stratford Herald.

IT SHOULD BE INVESTIGATED.

If any of our readers are suffering from chronic disease of the stomach, liver, kidneys, or blood, they should investigate the merits of Burdock Blood Bitters. It is making some of the most remarkable cures on record.

Eggs for Hatching.

Extremely cold weater is very injurious to eggs for hatching purposes. When the hens are to be set, or the incubators started, be careful to collect them every time a hen cackles, in order to prevent them from being exposed to the cold. The inattention given the frequent collection of eggs for hatching has been the cause of many bad hatches, and the hens and incubators have been condemned, often unjustly, because eggs that had been exposed to low degrees of temperature did not hatch.—Rural Canadian.

John R. Vert, Hamilton, says: "McGregor's Speedy Cure for Dyspepsia and Indigestion is cheap at fifty times the price asked for it. I am a commercial man, and travel continually, and would no more think of leaving home without a bottle of McGregor's Speedy Cure in my valise than I would of leaving my team at home and going on foot." Free trial bottle at Hill Bros. general store. Regular size, fifty cents and one dollar.

Why Not With Canada.

A reciprocity treaty has just been ratified between the United States and Mexico, under which the chief agricultural products of the latter country are admitted into the Union free of duty, and in return Mexico admits a variety of American manufactured goods. It is expected that the effect will be greatly to stimulate the trade between the two countries. Is it not a little singular that while reciprocity thus obtains between our neighbors and a nation so comparatively low in the scale of civilization as Mexico speaking a foregin tongue, and alien in every respect, the Canadian and American peoples, connected by so many ties of consanguinity, language, and friendly intercourse should be unable to come to a friendly understanding in commercial matters and pull down the double row of custom-houses along the frontier? Surely if it is to the advantage of the Americans to trade freely with a people whose ways are so primitive and whose wants so few as the Mexicans, it would pay them a good deal better to obtain the run of the Canadian market by according us like privileges across the border. But our dependence blocks the way. We are but a colony and cannot give another nation better terms than we accord to England, and so fair all-round reciprocity is not to be thought of. It is part of the price we pay for the privilage of being loyal.—Toronto News.

MERIT PROVEN.

Dollar upon dollar is frequently spent on the faith of recommendations for articles entirely worthless. Not so with McGregor's Speedy Cure; you are not asked to purchase it until its merits are proven. Call at Hill Bro's and get a free trial bottle, and if not convinced it will cure you of the worst forms of Dyspepsia, Complaint, etc. no matter of how long standing, it costs you nothing. Sold in 50c and $1 bottles. See testimonials from persons in your own town. F. & M.

THE JAMES BOYS OUTDONE.

The "Brilliant Bandit of the Wabash."

The "Brilliant Bandit of the Wabash," as Frank Rande loved to call himself, lies low in the prison hospital in Joliet, Ill., with two or three big welts across the skull, a bullet hole in his ear, and another in his side. Although desperately hurt, there are fears that Rande will recover. He has been shot through and through before this, but has always managed to rally, so as to be a little tougher than he was before, if possible. There is not an officer or a convict in the penitentiary who, if left to himself, would not take pleasure in finishing this fellow's career in short order. He is probaby the most desperate man with whom the authorities of Indiana, Illinois, and Missouri, have ever had to deal. Starting out in 1870, when about thirty years old, as a burglar and general thief, Rande visited almost every town of any size in Indiana and Illinois, stealing everything he could put his hands on. It made no difference to him whether the article taken was of value or not. If it was portable he took it. Doing his plunder up in bundles, and, when possible, packing it in satchels or trunks, he would leave these things at railroad stations, hotels, and express offices to be called for, giving in each case a different name as that of the owner. Hundreds of these satchels and bundles were in existence at a time, and vey few of them were ever called for.

In the spring of 1872 he was arrested at Fort Wayne for a safe burglary, and on conviction was sent to the penitentiary at Michigan City for five years. His service in this institution seems to have hardened him. The keepers declared that he was they ever had in charge. It was one unending round of floggings, solitary confinements in dungeons on a bread and-water diet, and punishments by ball and chain as long as he was there. He was a prolific writer, and in mapping out schemes of robbery and murder he had the ingenuity of the devil. Several times while confined at Michigan City he drew up elaborate descriptions of proposed prison deliveries, giving maps, diagrams, &c., of the penitentiary, the town, and the surrounding country, with the fullest directions to be observed by confederates on the outside. In one of these productions he went so far as to designate the particular people about the prison whom it would be necessary to kill. When his term of imprisonment was up the officials were very glad to part company with him. He left Michigan City and the State, threatening vengeance on all of his former keepers and promising to return some day and clean out the entire establishment.

Purchasing two magnificent revolvers of the largest calibre, he wore them outside his coat in a harness specially made for the purpose, which held the weapons about on a level with his vest pockets, so that with the slightest movement of the hands he could seize them. For several months nothing was heard of him, but during August he appeared in the vicinity of St. Elmo, Ill., where he made daily and nightly raids on houses, barns, and stores. On Sunday noon it was discovered that the residence of Woolford Pierce had been robbed while the family were at church, and a number of citizens started in pursuit of Rande, who was known to be hiding near the town. Starting him from his cover, the posse ran him into a corn field, where, apparently enraged by the pursuit, he mounted a rail fence and gave a wonderful exhibition of his skill as a marksman. With a revolver in each hand he discharged both weapons at once, killing two men, Charles Belden and Charles McKeown, at first fire. His firing was so sudden and the execution so deadly that the pursuing party became panic-stricken, but he shot two more men before they could get out of the range of his pistols.

This tragedy caused the wildest excitement throughout Illinois, and the most exaggerated tales of the man's prowess were circulated. Many believed that the fellow was Jese James, and almost every day some imaginative farmer would drive madly to the nearest town to report that the James and Younger boys were in his neighborhood. Hundreds of men turned out and scoured the country in all directions, but nothing further was seen or heard of Rande for three weeks One day in September John Scholes of Gilson, Knox county, Ill., found a thief in his house and gave chase. Overtaking the fellow in an open field, Mr. Scholes called out to him to halt. The thief turned squarely in his tracks and put four bullets into Scholes, two in the head and two in the heart. A hundred men, well armed to the teeth, were soon in pursuit, many of them mounted. Overtaking the fugitive, Frank Barnes, who was slightly in advance, called out to him. "Halt! or you are a dead man." Rande's only reply was four pistol shots, two striking Barnes, and two penetrating the skull of Frank Wiseman. Both men fell dead in their tracks. Turning his fire then on the other men in the party, he dashed upon them with a yell, stampeding the entire crowd and wounding several of them.

Although the identity of the murderer was still unknown, it was soon decided that the St. Elmo and Gilson desperadoes were one and the same person. Heavy rewards were offered for his capture not only by several counties but by the State, and dozens of armed bands hunted for weeks in a vain endeavor to apprehend him. The search had been all but abandoned when news was received that the offender had been taken in St. Louis. On the morning of Nov. 17 Rande entered a pawnshop in that city to redeem a valise. The keeper of the place suspected the fellow and sent a clerk out to call the police. Policemen White and Hefferman strolled in, sized the man up, and concluded he was a bad one. As they reached for him, Rande sprang with the agility of a tiger three feet in the air, and before his feet touched the floor his revolvers were barking and bullets were flying so thick and fast that a panic seized everybody in the neighborhood. White received a severe wound in the leg, but Hefferman and the pawnbroker managed to hit Rande twice, the former sending two bullets through his lungs, and the latter putting one or two into his legs. White was carried away insensible, and died soon afterward.

When Rande received the bullets in his lungs he fell to the floor, saying: "Let me lie down now; I am dying. I am shot through the lungs." A moment later he had whipped out another revolver, and was about to use it on Hefferman, when the latter pounced on the prostrate murderer and wrenched the weapon from his grasp. Rande hissed through his teeth as he saw his last pistol disappear: "Half a minute more would have cooked your goose." In the ambulance, on the way to the hospital, Rande talked incessantly, declaring that he had already killed a dozen men, and that he had made up his mind on entering St. Louis to kill seven men there. He had, he said, who attempted to arrest him, and he only regretted that he had not killed both policemen. It was thought at first that he could not recover, but in the course of a few weeks he was strong enough to be moved, and he was put into the Four Courts' prison. Here he was visited by many people from Illinois, and, being thoroughly identified as the murderer of Gilson and St. Elmo, he was reluctantly surrendered by Missouri to the Illinois authorities. No one dreamed that he could escape the gallows, and it was believed that he would be lynched before he reached Galesburg. Extra precautions were taken, however, and he was safely lodged in jail. Once secure behind the bars he held levees daily, reciting with evident pride, the numerous murders he had committed. He wrote a great deal for the newspapers, in prose and doggerel, and made no concealment of his intention to kill everybody who had been instrumental in bringing him to jail if he ever regained his liberty.

REGISTERED A SOLEMN VOW TO KILL EVERY MAN

"I will kill you and you," he would say, "and that feller down in St. Louis when I get out of this." His enjoyment of the sensation he had caused was intense, and was marred only by the refusal of the authorities to let him wear his pistols. He begged pitecusly to have the weapons given up to him unloaded, of course, for he said he appeared much better with them on. The Sheriff finally consented to let the fellow have his picture taken with his harness and revolvers in place, and these photographs were sold in large numbers. While Rande was in jail at Galesburg he received a long letter from Jack Lingdon, then under sentence of death in Texas for murder, in which the Lone Star desperado expressed the greatest admiration for the Illinois murderer. Jack had killed nineteen men in his day, but he magnanimously refused to claim greater distinction than that which he freely gave to Rande, for he said the quality of Rande's victims was higher than that of his, some of whom were only "niggers and half breeds," and "didn't count for much." Jack recited a few of the biggest things he ever did for the entertainment of Rande, and expressed a consuming desire to read the life of the Illinois murderer, which he urged Rande to write, if he had not done so already. He enclosed a copy of his own life and adventures, and only regretted that he had not been able to make the narrative still more interesting. Rande began work on an exhaustive biography, and continued his labors throughout his trial. The trial was a good deal of a farce, and resulted in a verdict of murder with a sentence to life imprisonment, fixed by the jury itself. The defence was insanity, but the only impression that could be made on the jury was in the direction of mitigation of sentence. The result of the trial was to every citizen of Knox county, but there was no move in the direction of violence. During the trial Rande wore the same suit of clothes which he had on when he was shot in the St. Louis pawnshop, and there were ragged holes and blood stains very suggestive of the carnage through which he had passed. Some people believed that this fact, and the additional one that Rande was still feeble and apparently irresponsible for his mad-dog proclivities, induced the jury to forego the death sentence in his case.

In Joliet, Rande has been a troublesome prisoner. He had been feared and hated by his fellow prisoners, and the officers always kept him under a close watch. He had an idea that he was a sort of leader in the prison by reason of his pre-eminence in crime, and he used to refer contemptuously to "these crooks," as if they were far beneath him in social status. At first he devoted his spare time to writing novels based on incidents in his own career, in which he always figured as the hero. These works he called "The American Brigand." "The Knox County Desperado." "The St. Louis Pawn Shop Fiend," and "The Brilliant Bandit of the Wabash." When he discovered that none of these could ever be printed, he turned his attention to inventions, and during the last three or four months he has drawn plans and specifications for several curious contrivances. He had a scheme for perpetual motion which he was sure would do away with the use of steam on railroads. Besides a fire escape of some merit he got up what he called a criminal detector. If he could only get out of prison to perfect it, he said, no guilty man could ever escape. It would ferret out crime better than any detective. He had an entirely new plan in telegraphy, by which he could send information instantly to any distance without the use of electricity, and just before he made his last deadly assault on his keeper he was at work on the plans and specifications of a gun which was to shoot and kill at thirty miles range.

Rande is desperately wounded, but he may recover. He has had some rational spells, and in these he has boasted that he has killed thirteen men, and expressed the hope that the Warden would die, so as to make the fourteen. To all inquires as to his condition he says he is all right, and will be out in a few days, as he has had worse wounds than those from which he is now suffering and has recovered. It seems almost impossible to kill him. The ball which he received the other day in the ear was fired with the muzzle of the revolver not three inches from his head, and the bullet passed through the skull at the base of the brain, but the prison surgeons say that he will probaby get well.

Since the above was in type word has been received that Rande finished his career by hanging himself.

A man in London has been teaching dogs to talk by writing the word "food" on a card, and placing it on a saucer so that the animal would know where his meal was. The average bull-dog does not require this kind of instruction. He is self-taught, and always knows where to locate the tramp's calf without any kind of label.

For thirty years prior to 1850 the consumption of wine and spirits in Paris was at the rate of about 100 litres per head. Between 1850 and 1860 it rose to 119; between 1860 and 1865 it reached 160; in 1872 216; in 1881, 227. Those who ought to know say that the increased consumption has worked no improvement in health or morality.

The Duluth papers mention the discovery of a "certain cure" for gout. A peasant who was confined to his bed by a sharp attack was stung by a bee, and almost immediately he felt better and the next day he was well. A short time after another patient thought he would try the same remedy, and having induced a bee to sting him on the part affected, he also was cured.

The population of Ireland is now very nearly the same as it was in the year of the Union, 5,100,000, the great increase up to 1841, when it reached 8,199,000, having been entirely lost. But whereas in 1832, on the passing of the Reform bill, Ireland had 32 32 per cent. of the population of the United Kingdom, it has now but 14.81 per cent. and its electors who were 11.32 per cent of the whole in 1832, are now but 7.45.

The Bombay Chamber of Commerce has submitted a memorial to the Viceroy urging that railway extension be prosecuted at the rate of 2,000 or 3,000 miles annually for the next ten years, at a cost of $20,000,000 per annum. They recommend that this sum be raised by sterling loans in London. at guaranteed interest of 3½ per cent, in perpetuity. The greater the railroad extension in India, the less risk of famines.

The inexorable law of centralization is the cause of overcrowding in towns. In 1851 the rural population of England amounted to 8,700,000. and the town population 8,000,000. In 1881 the rural population was 8 600,000, and the town population 17,000,000; showing that in 30 years the town population was nearly doubled, while the rural population was diminished to the extent of 100,000.

The appointment of a chaplain to the Speaker of the House of Commons "to read prayers with the House daily" commenced with the Long Parliament. Previous to that the rule was "that the litany be read every day and a prayer be said by Mr. Speaker, as he should think fittest for the time, to be begun every morning at half past eight, and every member making default to forfeit 4d. to the poor man's box." The present chaplain is the Hon. F. Byng, son of Earl Spofford.

The evidence seemed overwhelmingly against Edward Johnson, a colored man, on trial for burglary in Bativia, Ohio. His trial had lasted four days, and the audience in court thought him sure to be convicted. He asked permission to speak and talked for forty-five minutes. He fairly tore to pieces the State's network of evidence, plunged most of the jurors in tears, amazed the Court, captivated the audience, and made a speech which the Cincinnati papers say has no parallel in rude eloquence since the days of Chief Red Jacket. He was acquitted.

Apropos of the club gambling scandal in Paris a correspondent writes: Louis XIV. himself was not free from the vice of cheating. One day he was playing with the Marquis de Rohan, his first valet de chambre. 'I have got four kings,' said Louis.' The Marquis suspected a trick, as he held a king himself, and the Heathen Chinee was not yet invented. 'I have got five knaves,' capped the Marquis. 'How can that be?" 'On the same principle of your Majesty, who includes himself. Four knaves in my hand and myself make five.' A knave is called valet in French.

An extraordinary general meeting of the city authorities and representatives was held at Odessa, in Russia, on Feb. 23, convened for the adoption of special measures in order to arrest the alarming mortality from diphtheria in Odessa and its environs. It is an indisputable fact that this disease has been, in a greater or lesser degree, epidemic in that city for the last twelve years. One of the speakers, a physician and city representative, declared the only thoroughly efficient means of arresting the progress of the disease was by the destruction by fire of certain surroundings and domestic accessories.

The Japanese women advertise the number of their years by the arragement of their hair. Girls from 9 to 15 wear their hair interlaced with red crape, describing a half circle around the head, the forehead being left free with a curl on each side. From 15 to 30 the hair is dressed very high on the forehead and put up at the back in the shape of a fan or butterfly, with interlacings of silver cord and a decoration of colored balls. Beyond 30 a woman twists her hair around a shell pin. placed horizontally at the back of the head. Widows also designate themselves, and whether they desire to marry again.

The London Truth gives the following particulars respecting the cheating in the club of the Rue Royale, which has led to so much discussion in Paris: "Those who have been members of the club for a certain time have an open credit of 20,000 francs on which they can draw. The member whose malpractices have been brought to light, having exhausted his 20 000 francs. borroweb the credits of two other members. He soon lost these 40,000 francs, and then borrowed money of a card waiter. This supply being lost, the waiter proposed to him to accept him as a partner. The ill luck continued, and the waiter's money followed that of the member. Hence the use of the marked cards, which M. Hottinguer detected by the touch when dealing them. The matter was brought home to the peccant member by a careful examination of the card accounts, in which the use by each member of his credit is set down."

A London sanitary paper says: "The agony caused to many delicate children through the ignorance of mothers and nurses by making them stand in cold water of in a cold room in the depth of winter (while frequently the process of bathing is anything but a brisk one), must in a good many cases make the bath, instead of being a pleasure and a luxury, a very trying ordeal to the shivering little victims. To none but the very strongest is a perfectly cold bath in cold weather either pleasant or profitable. The water, as a general rule, should be of the same temperature as the body, so that no disagreeable shock is caused by plunging into the bath; while on no account (in the case of the daily bath) should it be so warm as to prevent the invigorating and refreshing sensation on emerging. Sir James Paget, the eminent English surgeon, says, "have the temperature of the water just as you like it."

A Tremendous Task.

Whatever they may say, all that they are doing at Panama looks to the construction of a canal that must have 124 feet lockage, and will then cost $200,000, in addition to the $100,000,000 called in on stock or obtained on bonds. About $20,000,000 has gone to the founders and sub-founders; about as much more for the purpose of the Panama Railroad, and ten per cent. in advertising and extra fee to bankers; and as much more to contractors as a bonus. I have it from an engineer, conversant with the work, that every cubic metre of hard ground excavated costs $2 50, which is five times what it should cost even there. But the difficulty, even for a lock canal, is to get rid of the excavated material. An enormous amount of excavation will be required to get proper slopes in the Calebra cut. This is almost wholly in earth, and the summit level of the railroad is a mere "hog's back,"—that is to say, it has very steep grades on both sides. The cut was made twenty-five feet deep, because of the tendency of the earth to slide. In fact a train was caught in this gap by a slide, and it required days to dig it out. The earth had to be carried off in buckets and it was like putty. If the canal has a lockage of 125 feet then the deep cut will be at least 200 feet. So you see what a cut in width it must be, and what the land slides will be after heavy rains.—Rear-Admiral Ammen.

An Old Warrior.

If any man deserved to be buried with military honors, it was the veteran Gen. Schramm, who was recently laid to his rest at La Courneuve in France. The departed warrior must certainly have been the oldest General, if not the oldest soldier, in the armies of the world, having been born nearly ninety-five years ago, and having entered military service at the age of ten. The Emperor of Germany and Marchal von Moltke were in their cradles, and the fathers of Gen. Gordon and Lord Wolseley probably not born, when Schramm first came on parade eighty-five years ago. When Austerlitz was fought Schramm was an old soldier with six campaigns behind him; and when after Waterloo, he retired for a time into private life, he had earned his repose by fifteen years of active service, which included the terrible Russian expedition of 1812. He emerged in 1830, and for a quarter of a century afterward took an active share in all the military affairs of his country, became War Minister under the Second Empire, and, as an able old veteran, lived to see the armies of the nation he had helped to crush at Jena take their revenge a second time at Gravelotte and Sedan. The "Chronicle of the Drum," as told be Schramm, should have been worth hearing

An Earthquake Observatory in Japan.

An earthquake observatory is being started in Japan by Prof. Milne of the Imperial Engineering College in Tokio. This novel observatory is fitted up deep down in the coal mines of the island of Takashinto, not far from Nagasaki. Instruments are placed at different levels in the mines, which will afford measures of the relations of time, intensity, &c., between earth-tremors below ground and those observed at the surface. These minute and almost imperceptible movements of the earth's crust have already been the subject of experiments, in the researches into the lunar disturbance of gravity by the brothers Darwin, who suggested two or three years ago the necessity of underground observations in order to get rid of the accidental disturbances which seem to be fatal to successful experiments at the surface.—Pall Mall Gazette.

(CONCLUDED.)

"Excuse my interrupting," said Miss Durant, "but I thought you might want to smoke, so I brought Tom's cigar-case which fell out of his pocket on the sofa."

"A mere excuse, Tom," whispered Spencer.

"We were talking of you, Miss Durant, just as you came in."

"Indeed!"

"Yes," said her lover; "Jack has been getting me into a few of the secrets of his profession. It seems he's a great mesmerist, and was saying that you were a capital subject."

"Am I? I've never been mesmerized in my life. What is it like?"

"The simplest thing in the world,' said Spencer. "You only drop off into a kind of dream."

"And then the mesmerist makes you do what he likes," added Tom.

"How curious! I should like to try it," said Amy.

"I'll mesmerize you with pleasure if you like," said Spencer.

"You will be bound to answer all his questions truthfully," said Tom warningly.

Amy looked up rather annoyed.

"One would imagine you were of opinion that truthfulness was not one of my usual characteristics," she said. "I'm not afraid of the rest."

"Shall I go on?" whispered Spencer to Tom.

"Yes," said Tom desperately, "fire away."

Amy was quite ready. Following Spencer's directions, she seated herself in a chair and fixed her eyes steadily on a small disk which he placed on the wall.

"You'll be sure and wake me afterward?" she said.

"Oh, yes: that's a matter of no difficulty."

Amy settled down to the operation, with the remark that it was like being photographed.

Wilkinson stood behind her, anxiously watching the progress of the experiment, while Spencer began making slow passes.

"When you feel drowsy let your eyes close," he said quietly.

In a very short time Amy seemed to be feeling the influence of the operator, her eyes closed, and she appeared to be fast asleep.

"Is she off?" whispered Tom.

"I think so, but we will leave her a few moments and make quite sure."

"Can she hear what we say?"

"Oh, no."

"I'm half ashamed about it," said Tom; "upon my word I don't think she really cares about Bartlett."

"Wait a few minutes and you will know for certain."

After a few moments more and a powerful pass or two, Spencer gently opened her eyes, which were quite fixed.

"There she is, you see," he said to Tom. "Are you certain she's off?"

In reply Spencer gave her ear a pinch. "You see she is absolutely unconscious," he said; "You might cut off her arm and she would not feel it. What shall I ask her?"

"Ask her about the ball," suggested Tom.

"Very well: I'll make her believe she is at the Kestertons' dance. Miss Durant!"

"Yes," replied Amy dreamily.

"Can you hear what I say?"

"Yes."

"Do you know who I am?"

"No."

"You ought to know my voice," said Spencer. "I'm Tom Wilkinson."

"I say, Jack—" interrupted Tom.

"Shut up! Have you enjoyed the evening?"

"Very much," was the eager reply.

"Have you danced with Mr. Bartlett to-night?"

"Yes, several times, and I'm engaged to him for another waltz."

"Ah, I see him coming," said Spencer; "I must resign you, I suppose."

"Now," he whispered to Tom, "Quick, here's your chance; I'll make her believe you're Bartlett."

Tom came forward.

"Can I speak in my natural voice?" he asked.

"Yes; but try and talk intelligently, like Bartlett."

But Tom could only make a few vapid observations, till Spencer told him to begin waltzing, as he was making Amy believe the waltz had begun. Tom put his arm around her waist and slowly moved her round the room.

"I haven't often had this pleasure to-night," he said, speaking in his character of Bartlett.

"Oh, how can you say so, Mr. Bartlett; this is the third waltz you've had."

Tom looked daggers at Spencer, who encouraged him by a look to go on.

"Aren't you afraid Mr. Wilkinson will be jealous?"

"Oh, let him be if he likes," said Amy; "don't let us talk about him; let's talk about something pleasant."

"You dare to—" burst out Tom; but Spencer put his hand over his mouth and dragged him away.

"You had better leave it to me, if you can't control yourself," he said. "I must make her believe that I am Bartlett."

"You had better take care what you are doing," muttered Tom angrily.

"We must carry it through now its started," said Spencer.

He led Amy to her chair, and willing that she should believe the dance ended, let her sit down.

"My dear Miss Dorant," he said to her, "how it pains me to see you engaged to such an unappreciative man as Wilkinson."

"You villain!" cried Tom, "are you going to try and prejudice her against me before my face?"

"Will you be quiet? I'm Bartlett now, not Spencer."

"He is not a model lover, I acknowledge," said Amy.

"Ah if I only had the happiness of showing you how I could appreciate you," said Spence.

"But you, Mr. Bartlett, are not the only one who does."

The two friends exchanged glances. What was coming out next?

"Go on," said Tom resolutely.

"Who else is there?" asked Spencer. "Do you like him very much?"

"Yes, but don't tell Tom."

"No, I won't. Who is it?"

"It's Jack Spencer."

"Jack Spencer!" he exclaimed. "I!"

"You! No; you are Mr. Bartlett."

"Yes, yes, of course I am," said Spencer. He turned to Tom. "I think we had better stop now," he said.

"Go on," replied Tom; "I insist. Ask her if she has danced with you to-night."

Spencer obeyed.

"Only twice," was the sorrowful reply.

"Tom," said Spencer, "it's all a delusion—a mistake. I only danced with her once the whole evening."

"Don't attempt to deny it," cried Tom. "You yourself told me she must speak the truth."

"But she isn't—"

"Go on! Wait a moment; make her believe that I am you. No nonsense, now."

Tom looked threateningly. Spencer obeyed, wondering what would be the result.

Wilkinson at once began. Evidently his mind was made up.

"Mr. Bartlett's a nice fellow—isn't he, Amy?"

"Yes, but not so nice as you, Mr. Spencer."

"Tom," said Spencer, "she doesn't mean it."

"Silence!" was Tom's reply.

He continued to talk in his assumed character of Spencer, the real owner of the name standing by helpless.

"I've not seen you much lately," said Tom.

"No; Tom is so jealous. I say, Jack, do you remember that lovely walk by moonlight last week?"

Spencer could not stand this.

"Tom, on my honor," he said, "I was out of town the whole of last week."

"So you say," was the contemptuous reply.

"You told me then you liked me," continued Amy.

"Tom," interrupted Spencer, "If I never speak another word—"

"You won't if you don't keep silent now," was the savage retort. "Why, Amy, so I do," he said to her.

"Then won't you kiss me, Jack, as you did then?"

"You abominable villain!" he cried.

"Let me go!" shouted Spencer, "or I'll smash this bottle on your head!"

Wilkinson gradually relinquished his hold.

"What have you to say for yourself?" he asked. "Are you satisfied with your scientific experiment?"

"Tom," said Spencer earnestly, "no one could be more surprised at the way things have turned out than I am; it is contrary to every scientific law—I can't explain it."

"But you shall explain it. We are no longer friends—we are rivals."

"I deny it," cried Spencer; "I deny that I aspire to the affections of Miss Durant. There is some incomprehensible mystery about this; let us ask Miss Durant herself to explain it."

"Yes we will; undo your miserable spells."

Spencer proceeded to go through the usual process by which mesmerized persons are restored to their normal condition. For some reason it had not its usual effect. Amy still remained unconscious.

In spite of Spencer's efforts to conceal his anxiety, Tom soon discovered that all was not going properly. When some minutes had elapsed, and no sign of returning consciousness appeared, it would have been hard to say which was the more alarmed.

"Shout in her ear," suggested Tom.

It was tried without effect. "Willing," seemed to have lost its power. "Amy, Amy!" was cried in vain by the frightened lover, who would have been ready to murder the operator on the spot, but for the knowledge that if he couldn't wake her no one could.

"Try some water," suggested Spencer; "throw it in her face."

Tom seized the bottle, and was on the point of deluging her when her eyes gradually opened.

"Where am I?" she asked dreamily.

"In my room," replied Spencer reassuringly; "don't be frightened."

"I remember now, you were going to mesmerize me. Did you?"

"He did," answered Wilkinson, "and no mistake."

"I've been having such funny dreams,' said Amy; "I thought I was at the Kestertons' again."

Wilkinson whispered to Spencer.

"I thought you told me they never remembered what had happened?"

Spencer could only look puzzled.

By this time Amy was completely recovered, and Tom thought it best to get over the necessary scene as soon as possible.

"Miss Durant," he said, "I am sorry I must ask you a few questions, rendered necessary by what you said during your trance. Did you dance with either Mr. Bartlett or Mr. Spencer at the Kestertons'?"

"Of course—you saw me. Why do you ask me such a question?"

"Did you meet this man by moonlight one night last week?" asked Tom, fixing his eyes on her.

Amy drew herself up.

"I refuse to answer," she said.

"I have asked Spencer," went on Tom; "he denies it, but I believe falsely. I ask you for the last time."

"I will not lower myself by replying to such a question," returned Amy, moving toward the door.

"Ah, you cannot deny it," burst out Tom. "Oh, Amy, you have basely deceived me, you have confessed unconsciously in your sleep that you don't care for me, but that others own what you call your heart. Now I know the truth, and I resign you and happiness forever."

"Very well," replied Amy calmly, "if you choose to act so stupidly without cause, you may do so."

"Without cause!" ejaculated Tom sarcastically.

"Without cause," repeated Amy. "Can you listen to reason, for a moment? though you don't deserve to have it wasted on you. When Mr. Spencer thought he had mesmerized me I had simply shut my eyes to induce the trance. I therefore heard your conversation, and gathered that I was to be made the subject of an experiment to gratify your jealousy. I need not say I carefully acted as if I were in a real trance and did my best to pay you both for your your unwarrantable proceedings. I hope I frightened you well. Now, gentlemen, are you not ashamed of yourselves?"

Spencer was the first to reply.

"Miss Durant, I have been a most uncompromising scoundrel: there is my arm, kindly return the pinch I gave you with tenfold interest."

Tom stood silent, it was not so easy for him to speak. At last he decided to throw himself upon her mercy.

"Amy, what can I say in extenuation of my conduct?"

"That, sir, is for you to discover: it is not my part to find excuses for you."

"I have none," said Tom humbly. "Will you forgive me?"

"Perhaps—conditionally."

"Any conditions you like," said Tom earnestly.

"The first is you are never to be jealous again."

"Never," cried Tom. "What else?"

"That you are to forgive me if I have given you cause for jealousy," whispered Amy. "I won't do so again."

"Way, my darling, you are turning the tables on me."

"Perhaps, after all," she said softly, "table-turning is better than mesmerism."

Dyspepsia and Dr. Carson's Stomach Bitters can't live in the same Stomach, one of them has got to go and it isn't the Stomach Bitters. The people's own favorite family medicine in large bottles at 50 cents.

Stock-taking—Sheep stealing.

PEMBROKE, Feb. 13th, 1884.

MESSRS. G. S. TICKELL & SONS, Belleville, Ont.

GENTLEMEN,—The Church goods have arrived, been inspected, and criticised. We have much pleasure in telling you that they prove eminently satisfactory. The Trustees and Committee of management are well pleased that they entrusted the work to you. The pulpit, or rather desk and chairs, have been very flatteringly commented upon, and indeed, everything is universally admired. Pembroke people are very proud of their church, and strangers say that it is the prettiest church in the Ottawa valley, Ottawa included. The cost has been about $20,000. Yours respectfully,

JAS. BLAND & CO.

Pressed for Time—Mummies.

The Best Proof.

The best proof of the great power of Polson's NERVILINE over every kind of pain is obtained by the use of a 10 cent bottle. Nerviline requires no puffing; every bottle tells its own story. It cannot fail, for it is a combination of the most powerful pain-subduing remedies known to medical science. Nerviline is equally useful in external or internal pains. Try the great remedy. Ten cent bottle at any drug store. Large bottles only 25 cents.

Grocer's License—Calling sand sugar, and chicory coffee.

In order to secure the public in the use of a perfect dye, the proprietors of the Triangle Dyes have secured the sole right for America to use a three cornered package. Take no other. 10c.

The Worst for Ware—A careless servant.

How Would it do?

This bad weather requires a remedy. It seems as if the whole responsibility should rest on Vennor and Wiggins, for we had some kind of weather before they appeared upon the scene. How would it do to string them up? Would it make things better? Another hint of importance—don't hang on to your corns as weather indicators. Better string them out root and branch. Putnam's Painless Corn Extractor will do it quickly, painlessly, and with certainty. Don't buy dangerous flesh-eating substitutes. Get Putnam's, and no other.

High Praise—Applause from the gallery.

Everyone speaks highly of Dr. Carson's Stomach Bitters as a Stomach, Liver and Kidney medicine. "The best family medicine we ever used," say they all. Try a bottle this Spring as a blood purifier.

Remember that all the questions must be answered correctly to secure any of the rewards offered. If you send a correct answer and one dollar for a half year's subscription to Truth, you will take your place in the order your letter is received at Truth office. We can assure our readers that all the rewards named above will be cheerfully and promptly handed over or sent to the successful ones as soon as it is known who they are after the close of the competition on April th. In every alternate issue of Truth will be given a complete list of the prize winners with their post-office addresses and rewards obtained in previous competitions, so intending competitors may be assured of the genuineness of the whole matter. We certainly would not have taken all this time to explain the plan in detail to our readers if we had not been certain that it was conducted in an honorable manner.

Please bear in mind that the regular subscription price of Truth is two dollars per year. You therefore pay nothing extra for the privilege of competing for these valuable prizes.

Why suffer with toothache, Neuralgia, Headache, Rheumatism, Lumbago, Sciatica, Sore throat ar acute pains of any kind when you can go to Hill Bros. general store and get a perfect and instantaneous cure for twentyfive cents. Ask for Kram's Fluid Lightning.

"Oh, ho! here you are! Found you out! What a snug little den!" Recluse (chuckling): "Yes here I am, with my pictures and my books; and here I can sit and read all day long and nobody a bit the wiser!"

Lightning struck a contribution plate in a Western church just as the deacon was passing it around. "This is the first time anything has struck this plate for three months," said the deacon, thoughtfully.

"My son," said an American father, "how could you marry an Irish girl?" "Why, father, I'm not able to keep two women. If I'd marry a Yankee girl I'd have to hire an Irish girl to take care of her."

A STARTLING DISCOVERY.

Physicians are often startled by remarkable discoveries. The fact that Dr. King's New Discovery for Consumption and all Throat and Lung diseases is daily curing patients that they have given up to die, is startling them to realize their sense of duty, and examine into the merits of this wonderful discovery; resulting in hundreds of our best Physicians using it in their practice Trial bottles free at A. CRUELLY MURDERED.

In the Province of Ontario every year thousands are being slowly murdered by taking unsuitable, untried nostrums for such complaints as Costiveness, Indigestion Liver Complaint, Kidney Troubles, etc., who might easily regain lost strength and energy by using McGregor's Speedy Cure. To convince them that such is the case we will give them a free trial bottle at Hill Bro's Price 50c. and $1. See testimonials from persons in your own town. F. & M.

Young lady: "Isn't this child a little Frenchman?" Nurse: "I cannot tell; the father is a German, the mother French." Young lady: "Ah, then we shall not be able to find out until the little fellow can speak."

James Brayley, Hamilton, says: "I read the testimonials for McGregor's Speedy Cure and found that I had not to go to New York, Philadelphia, Louisiana or Texas to find living witnesses of its value, we have plenty of persons right here to prove its merits I got a bottle and it helped me right away. I was as bad with Bilious Fever and Indigestion as I think any one could be, I have taken three bottles and am nearly well and can eat any kind of food without it hurting me. I may say that I am better than ever I expected to be. Free trial bottles at Hill Bro's. F. & M.

A country cousin found himself seated at one of our hotel tables, probably for the first time, and the table girl desirous of ascertaining the extent to which he preferred his stake cooked, propounded the usual question of "how do you like it?" Of course there wasn't any smiling around that board when the answer was returned with all the simplicity imaginable: "O, I like it fust-rate."

Stubborn Facts.

BY JACOB FAITHFUL.

The conspiracy is the great and all absorbing question of the hour. It's a huge scandal at best. but the end is not yet. Party before country, and self before party seems the order of the day.

It's a strange thing that the law-abiding and christianable people of Markdale have to submit to so much annoyance, caused by the unnecessary and illegal extent to which the liquor traffic has been and is likely to be extended. One or two hotels is perhaps necessary in a place of this size for the accommodation of the public while more than that number only becomes an evil in the place. Preparations are being made for the opening of a fourth which should not be tolerated. I wonder what the Inspector is doing. Intoxicating liquor is being illegally dealt out week after week and Sabbath after Sabbath (not at the hotels I hope) and he (the Inspector) is, I believe, aware of it. Public servants should discharge their duty more faithfully.

You, Mr. Editor, have been silent on the incorporation question for some time. I can see no valid reason why this progressive movement is not proceeded with at once. The village finances are being drained year after year without a just return. These funds might be profitably expended in another class of draining for one year at least, which is much needed, especially about this season of the year. If incorporation would have the effect of enforcing law and order, and thereby elevating the moral tone of the town, it is surely a desirable and worthy attainment to which every respectable citizen would favor and appreciate.

Canadian Emigrants Injured

BY AN ACCIDENT ON THE MILWAUKEE AND ST. PAUL RAILWAY.

MINNEAPOLIS, Minn., March 23.—The emigrant party on the train which was reported wrecked last night were for Winnipeg, and came through from Durham, Ont. Seventeen were injured, a Red Wing correspondent telegraphs that two at least of that number were fatally hurt. Among the injured reported are Alexander Payne, his wife, two daughters, Nina and Matilda, and two sons, George and John. All are seriously cut and bruised. The father had his arms broken. William Ruddy, his wife and infant, Maggie, were all wounded in the head, the child having its skull crushed.

The Heir to Four Millions.

TOPEKA, Kansas, March 24.—H. J. Blythe, attorney, of this city, when an orphan at Bedford, Westchester county, New York, was given to Elder Green, of the Presbyterian church. A year ago Blythe saw a paragraph announcing the death of his uncle in San Francisco. He was worth four millions, and left no will or known heirs. Blythe has just proved his sole heirship to the estate.

Artemesia Council.

Artemesia Council met in the Town Hall, Flesherton, on Monday, March 3rd, 1884. Present—Messrs. Pedlar, Elliott, McArthur and Bleakley. Mr. Pedlar in the Chair. Minutes of last meeting read and approved of. A communication from R. McL. Purdy re Eugenia road divisions was presented and read. The following accounts were presented and ordered to be paid:—R. J. Sproule, postage, $2.60; Hart & Co, "Municipal Act," $9.25; W. J. Bellamy, division register fees for registration, $16.60, the committee appointed to examine the Treasurer's bonds reported that they considered the sureties good. The committee on the Eugenia bridge reported that it was absolutely necessary to have the bridge repaired at once, and that they have let the contract for $28.50. By-Law No.359, appointing municipal officers for 1884, was introduced and read twice and to receive its final reading at next session.

Moved by Mr Bleakley, seconded by Mr. Elliott, that John McArthur be paid $13.30, his expenses while attending meeting at Gorrie re the land Improvement Fund, which should be distributed amongst certain Municipalities, Artemesia being largely interested.—Carried.

Moved by Mr. McArthur, seconded by Mr. Bleakley, that A. Elliott be paid $3 for services on committee re Eugenia bridge.—Carried.

Moved by Mr. McArthur seconded by Mr. Bleakley that Robt. McGown be refunded $24.60, being taxes charged in excess on account of error in assessment.—Carried.

Moved by Mr. Elliott, seconded by Mr. Bleakely, that John McArthur be and is hereby appointed to meet delegation at Toronto on the 4th inst., re Artemesia's claim in the land improvement fund.—Carried.

Council adjourned.

W. J. BELLAMY,
Tp. Clerk.

Swarming, and How to Manage It.

In the writer's apiary two large tin pails filled with water are always kept near the shop door, with a fountain pump hanging over them; and if a swarm shows any disposition to leave, or is slow in clustering when other swarms are expected, it receives such a sprinkling that it soon "hangs itself up to dry." With such a pump and plenty of water it is next to impossible for a swarm to abscond. The implement is also useful to prevent uniting or clustering of swarms issuing at the same time. Near the tin pails stand two splint clothes baskets, lined with cotton cloth, and each basket is furnished with a burlap cover stitched to one side of it. As soon as a swarm has clustered it is shaken into one of these baskets, the cover flopped over, and if another swarm or something else demands immediate attention the basket and its contents can be set one side, to be disposed of at leisure.

After seeing the case with which bees can be managed when allowed to swarm naturally, the energy with which they work, and the excellent results obtained, the writer is decidedly opposed to artificial swarming—and also to queens with clipped wings. In the first place, when the bees swarm, the queen has to be found and caged. The bees roam around a long time, and sometimes finally cluster. If another swarm comes out they are certain to unite with it. When the bees do return they often go piling into the wrong hive, perhaps hives; and if they do catch on to the proper one, instead of going in they often cluster all over its outside. Sometimes, after the queen has been allowed to run in she comes out again then of course the bees will follow her. In my experience a swarm having an unclipped queen can be hived and be at work in that "whooping," "zipping," go-ahead style, in just about the same time that it takes a swarm with a clipped queen to make up its mind, sullenly and doggedly, to go back home.—W. Z. HUTCHINSON, in American Agriculturist for April.

IN GOLDEN BONDS.

"But I haven't known you longer than the others," said I, smiling.

"But you have known me so much better than the others," said he, deprecatingly.

"I am not quite sure of that."

"Didn't you talk to me more than you did the others?"—"Yes."

"And walk with me oftener than with the others?"—"Yes."

"And didn't you like me better than the others?"

"I think I did—yes, I did."

"All that is very tepid. I can't think why you don't like me, when I like you so much."

"Oh, you did not understand me, Mr. Carruthers! I do like you very much; but——"

"There you have spoiled it all with that unkind 'but'! Don't you think me handsome? I am considered one of the handsomest men about town, I assure you."

"Not really?"

This slipped out quickly, for I thought he was in fun. I afterwards found out, to my surprise, that it was true; but I did not learn it then, for he looked very much amused, and said—

"That is blow number two; but I am not going to be crushed. Don't you think me good?"

"Oh, no!"

"Why not, Miss Christie?" said he pretending to be in despair.

My chief reason was that, if he had been very "good," he would not have made Lady Mills angry with me by taking me on the river late at night; for he had shown later that he knew it was not considered right. But it would have seemed ungenerous to recall that when it had all passed over; so I only said—

"I know from the way they talked to you and of you that they did not think you very good, and that you did not wish to be thought so."

"But I am going to reform after what you said on Sunday."

"Oh, no, you are not!' said I, shaking my head. "You say so only because it amuses you to see how much you can make me believe of the things you tell me."

"Do you judge all the people you know as severely as you do me, Miss Christie?"

'Yes, quite," said I gravely.

"Oh—er—the gentleman who gave you the red rose, for instance?"

He said this in a mock-bashful tone, looking at the carpet, as if ashamed to meet my eyes. I could not help getting red, and I think he knew it without looking up.

'Or—or perhaps he—never does anything wrong?"

'Oh, yes, he does, Mr. Carruthers!" said I with a bright idea in my head—he had been laughing at me long enough, I thought. "He did very wrong in thinking he need be jealous of any of the gentlemen I met at Denham Court."

Mr. Carruthers raised his head and looked straight at me. I am not sure that he was not a little annoyed as well as amused, though he laughed very good-temperedly.

"I will never make love to you any more, you ungrateful girl!" said he.

"Make love! Do you call that making love?" said I, laughing.

"It is not the best I can do by any means; but I shall be very glad to show you——"

'You need not take that trouble, thank you; I will take your word for it," said I laughing again.

I had learnt to answer him back in his own way; and I think he was a little surprised at the progress I was making.

"You are too quick of fence for me," said he, shaking his head. "Well, don't you want to know what has been going on at Denham Court?" he asked rather suddenly, in a different tone.

'Oh, yes! But there has not been time for much to happen. I left there on Monday, and this is only Thursday."

"There has been time for a very serious misfortune to happen, for all that," said he gravely. "Last night Denham Court was broken into, and Lady Mills and Mrs. Carmichgham and Mrs. Carew and some of the other ladies had all their most valuable jewellery stolen; and a quantity of gold plate was taken too."

We had been standing by the window all this time, I playing with the flowers in my basket. I went on mechanically twisting a chrysanthemum in my fingers after he had finished telling me this startling story, but I did not know what I was doing.

"Last night, did you say?" said I at last, in a frightened whisper.

"Yes, last night. Sit down," said he kindly, putting me into a chair. "This seems to have quite overwhelmed you. Why child, your very lips are white! Let me ring for some——"

"No, no," I interrupted, starting up. "I am quite well; I am not going to faint. Don't—don't ring. Tell me all about it quickly, please. When did you find it out? Have they caught the thieves? Do they know——"

"Stay—I can't tell you all once. The thieves have not been caught yet, and we don't know who they are. The robbery was discovered this morning."

"This morning! Who discovered it? How?"

"Now don't get excited, and I will tell you all about it. This morning a ladder was found lying underneath Lady Mill's dressing-room window, which had been opened by smashing one of the panes from the outside. It was Lady Mill's maid who first gave the alarm by a cry at sight of the open window. when she went into the dressing room this morning, after calling her mistress. Lady Mills ran in; they looked out together, and saw the ladder lying underneath. The dressing-room has two doors; the one which does not lead into the bedroom had been unlocked and left open by the thief, to pass into the house by. But, at first sight, nothing seemed to have been disturbed. The dressing-case was locked and in its place; a strong tin case in which Lady Mills kept the greater part of her jewels was still in the locked up wardrobe. But, on moving it, they found that the lock had been burst open, and it was entirely empty. Jewels, cases and all, had disappeared. By this time the head gardener had come into the house, saying that he hoped all was right, but that he had gone to the tool house this morning with one of the under-gardeners, a man named Parkes——"

"Tom Parkes?"

"Yes. He keeps the key of the tool-house. And they had found the door forced in, and a file and one of the ladders gone. Of course the alarm spread quickly all over the house; and then the other losses were discovered one by one. There is the mysterious part of it. Everything had been done so methodically and so neatly, even to locked doors being found still locked, that it was not until after careful examination that the stolen things were missed. Lady Mills and Mrs. Carew found their dressing-cases locked; but, when they opened them, each found that the most valuable of the contents were gone. The butler and Sir Jonas himself examined the plate chest together. That was locked too, and, on first opening it, they congratulated themselves on its having escaped. But, on removing that part of it which is in constant use, they found that the gold plate, which is used only now and then, and some solid silver cups and candlesticks had been taken. But the loss which has caused the greatest sensation is Mrs. Cunningham's. She came into the breakfast room quite white and scarcely able to speak, with some pebbles and a piece of cotton-wool in her hands. She declares that she carried about on her person, sewn up in wash-leather and cotton-wool, a very valuable set of diamonds and cat's-eyes; that it was not until long after she discovered her other losses that she cut open the leather, just to make sure that her greatest treasure was safe; that she found the jewels gone and the pebbles she produced in their place. The poor woman was so hysterical that it was a long time before she could tell us all about it. She declares that she slept with them under her pillow, and that no one in the world knew where she kept them, for that she never mentioned the fact to any one——"

"Oh, but that is not quite true, Mr. Carruthers! For she told me."

"So she said," said he, looking at me steadily. "But you could never have repeated such a thing to any one who could make a wrong use of the knowledge."

"Oh, no! The only person I spoke of it to was Mr. Rayner."

"Mr. Rayner!" said he quickly. "You could not have chosen a worse person to intrust the secret to, I am afraid."

"What do you mean?"

"Why, he's the most talkative man I know. I have met him at Newmarket several times—a bright amusing fellow enough, but the last man to whom I should tell anything I did not wish to have repeated for the amusement of the next person he met."

"Oh, but he would not repeat a thing like that!" said I earnestly, "He scolded me for telling him, and said such confidence should never be repeated, no matter to whom."

"That's all right," said he much relieved. "Then I shall tell Mrs. Cunningham you didn't tell any one. The poor woman is half out of her mind; it was she who sent me over here to-day, to find out whether you had spoken about it in the presence of any one who could use the knowledge. For my part, I thought it very likely she had only imagined she had spoken to you about it; but I want an excuse for coming; so I gained my object, and put her under an obligation at the same time."

I did not pay any attention to the implied flattery in these words; I was too much interested in the robbery.

"And is no one suspected?" I asked, with trembling lips.

"At present we know nothing, and we suspect a different person every minute. The robbery had been so well arranged, and was carried out with such discrimination—for nothing but the best of everything was taken—that at first the servants were suspected of complicity. But my man Gordon, who has no end of sense, suggested that it was only fair to them all to have their boxes examined at once. This was done, but no trace of anything was found. Of course that does not prove that they may not have given information to the thieves, whoever they were. There has been a gang of navvies at work on the railway close by for the past fortnight, and a hat belonging to one of them was found in the garden, and has been identified already; but it seems that the friends of the man it belongs to can prove that he passed the night drunk in the village. So at present we know absolutely nothing. Gordon told me privately that he doesn't believe either the servants or the navvies have had anything to do with it, and he pointed out the resemblance between this and a robbery which took place some time ago at the house of another of my friends, Lord Dalston, whom I had been staying with not long before. He believes that it is the work of a regular jewell robber, and that very likely he got a discharged servant to supply him with information. I pointed out to him that no servant who had long left could have given him such precise details as he seems to have had concerning the jewels of the ladies who were only visiting there, for instance. But I could not convince him. As for Mrs. Cunningham's, that really seems marvellous, because she is a cautious sort of of woman. I suppose her maid some how found out the secret, and then told it to—Heaven knows who."

"I suppose so," said I mechanically.

I was trying to put together what I had just heard and what I had already known. Mr. Carruthers rose.

"I need not trouble Mrs. Rayner at all now that I have seen you," said he.

"Mrs. Rayner!" I repeated, in the same mechanical stupid way.

"Yes. When the servant told me you were out, she said I could see Mrs. Rayner. I did not want to disturb her, knowing that she has the reputation of being an invalid. But she insisted."

"Wait one moment," said I, as he took my hand. "Are you quite sure, Mr. Carruthers, that the robbery took place last night."

Before I uttered the last words, his eyes suddenly left my face, and were fixed on some object behind me.

I turned, and saw in the doorway Mrs. Rayner, paler and more impassive than ever, and Sarah. All the doors at the Alders opened noiselessly, and they had overheard me. And, as I looked at Sarah's face, my heart beat faster with fear and with suspicion become certainty, for I knew that I was on the right track.

CHAPTER XXII.

In his astonishment at Mrs. Rayner's ghostlike entrance and appearance, Mr. Carruthers had not paid much attention to the end of my question, and I determined to try to get an another opportunity of putting it to him. He expressed his sorrow to Mrs. Rayner at having caused her the trouble of receiving him when she was evidently suffering, and said that he had ventured to call to tell Miss Christie about a great robbery which had taken place in the house she had so recently visited, Denham Court. Nothing but physical suffering could have explained the impassive stolidity whith which she listened, her great gray eyes staring straight in front of her, to the account of the robbery. She made no comment until it was over; then she turned to him and asked, with a faint expression of relief—

"Then nobody was hurt?"

"Oh, no, there was no collision at all! They vanished like spirits, leaving no trace."

"I am very sorry they were not caught. My husband has been in town since Tuesday morning, and I am nervous while he is away," said she, like one repeating a lesson.

All this time Sarah stood by her, smelling bottle in hand, as if prepared for her mistress to faint. Yet to my eyes Mrs. Rayner did not look worse than usual.

When he rose to go, I accompanied Mr. Carruthers to the door, where a dog-cart was waiting for him; but Sarah, whose duty by her mistress's side was suddenly over, followed close behind, and I had no chance of suggesting to him my own suspicion about the burglary. When he had gone, I reflected that it was better for me not to have said anything to a comparative stranger to implicate one of the servants in the house where I was living until I had consulted Mr. Rayner.

To give vent to my excitement over the important secret I fancied myself on the track of, I wrote to Laurence. With Sarah about, a letter was a thing requiring caution, as the event proved. I was so sensible of this that I contented myself with giving an account of Mr. Carruther's visit and of the robbery at Denham Court, only saying, in conclusion, that it might have some connection with what he had seen, and that I had something to add to that. I said that I would write more fully as soon as I had an opportunity of going to Beaconsburgh to post my letter myself; and then I said a great deal more concerning different things which were perhaps really less important, but which were much pleasanter to write about.

The postman called for the letter-bag at six every evening; so I waited at the schoolroom window until I saw him come up to the house and heard Sarah give him the bag; then I ran out into the hall, as if I had only just finished my letter, and put it into the bag which he held. Sarah could not even see the direction as I put it in, and I congratulated myself upon my artful strategy; but I might have known that she was not to be baffled so. I had stood at the door and watched him turn into the drive, and returned to the schoolroom in a flutter of excitement at my own audacity, when from the window I saw Sarah flit after him. I dashed out on to the lawn, and got into the drive just in time to see the postman fasten up the bag and go on again, while Sarah, saying something about "a misdirection" put a letter into her pocket; and I knew that it was mine. With my heart beating fast I walked up boldly to her.

"What did you take my letter out of the bag for, Sarah?' said I, half choked with anger.

"It's not your letter, Miss. What should I want with any letter of yours?" she said looking down at me insolently. "It's a letter to my sister that I've forgotten to put the number of the street on."

I knew quite well that this was a falsehood, but I could not prove it; for I had indeed been too far off to recognize my letter when she put it into her pocket, and my moral certainty counted for nothing. She knew this, and stalked off defiantly to the house with my letter, while I crept back to the schoolroom, and sobbed bitterly at the tyranny I was suffering from this hateful woman.

Well, it would soon be over now—that was a comfort. I would tell Mr. Rayner all I had seen on Tuesday night, and about the cart Laurence had met outside—perhaps I would not mention it was Laurence who saw it—and about Parke's wishing to avoid me at Denham Court. I should not dare to suggest to Mr. Rayner any doubt about Gordon, who seemed to be in some way a personal friend of his. But now, with all my thoughts turned to jewels and jewel-robberies, I could not help thinking again about that strange disappearance of my own pendant while I was staying at Denham Court, and its restoration by this man. Then his treating Tom Parkes as a stranger at Denham Court, when I had seen them together one night at the Alders, seemed to me now rather a suspicious circumstances. I congratulated myself on having been so cautious in my letter to Laurence that Sarah would not learn much by reading it, and wondered when I could make an excuse to go to Beaconsburgh, to post one to him with my own hands. It seemed very hard to be cut off in this way from the relief of opening my heart to him; but it would be all right on the morrow, when Mr. Rayner came back—she would not dare to annoy me then.

But the next morning, to my great disappointment, I got another letter, saying he should not be back until Monday morning. I had written to him on Wednesday, and he had got my note. He said, as I mentioned that the weather was bad and the fogs had began to be thick, it would be better for Mrs. Rayner to leave the ground floor and sleep up-stairs.

"I expect you will have difficulty in persuading her to leave her own room," the letter went on; "but I am so anxious about her, for it seems to me she has looked paler than ever lately, and I feel so sure she be be better on a higher floor that I beg you dear Miss Christie, to use all your powers of persuasion to induce her to move. Tell her that it is only for a time, that she shall go back to her old room as soon as the weather is warmer again; tell her I wish it, tell her anything likely to affect her. I have great trust in your diplomatic powers, little madam; and I anticipate the happiest results from them in this instance. I have given Sarah orders by letter to prepare the big front spare-room.

I was delighted with this letter; it made me for the moment angry with Mrs. Rayner for her persistent ignoring of his kind feeling towards her. But, when I remembered her agony over her child on the night of Haidee's illness, and the settled melancholy I now knew how to detect under her cold demeanor, pity got the better of me again, and I was glad to have an opportunity at last of doing her some good. She was always supposed to be attached to her room on the ground floor, and Mr. Rayner wrote as if it would be difficult to persuade her to move. But I had two powerful weapons in her husbands loving letter and her affection for Haidee, and I resolved to use them well.

As I was dining alone, I was just wondering how I could get at her, when the opportunity presented itself as if at my wish,

"Mrs. Rayner feels well enough to have tea in here with you, miss, this afternoon," said Sarah.

That then would be my chance. But I reflected that I could not be very persuasive at teatime, subject to the chance of our common tyrant, Sarah, pouncing down upon us. I went out after dinner and sat, in spite of the damp, on the seat at my "nest" for a little while, trying to invent subtle plans for inveigling Mrs. Rayner in to the drawing room or the school room for an uninterrupted tete-a-tete. As I sat there, I heard some one coming along the path from the house. The trees between were not yet bare enough for me to see through; but, when the steps had gone by I crept through the branches, peeped out, and saw Sarah getting over the stile into the path which led to the high road. I ran indoors, asked Jane where Sarah was, and learnt that she had gone to Beaconsburgh to get some groceries; I had noticed a black bag in her hand.

I seemed to breathe more freely at once. Now was my time for seeing Mrs. Rayner, I was a little shy about going into the left wing without an invitation; she might be asleep, or she might not wish to be disturbed. I thought I would reconnoitre first. So I went into the garden with my knife and basket, as if to cut flowers, gathered a few China asters, and ventured round, past the drawing-room window, through the wet rank grass and the swampy earth, to the left wing. I had put on my goloshes, but they were not of much use, for I sank into pools that came over my shoes.

Still I went on, through an unwholesome mass of fallen and decaying leaves, to the dark yews and laurels that grew round Mrs. Rayner's window. I had never ventured here since the evening of my arrival, when I strayed this way in my explorations, and been startled by my first dim view of Mrs. Rayner's pale face at the window of what must be her room. Again I pushed aside the branches of the now almost leafless barberry-tree and looked for the second time at the gloomy window, overhung by an ivy-bush which now seemed to fall lower than ever. There was no face looking out this time; a broken gutter-pipe had caused the rain-water to form a sort of slough under the window, so that I could not go close to it; but went as near as I could, singing, and cutting off little branches of yew, as if not knowing where I had strayed. My ruse succeeded. Just as one of the branches I had pulled down towards me swung back into its place, Mrs. Rayner's white face, looking astonished and alarmed, appeared at the window. I smiled good morning to her, and made a show of offering her my flowers. I wanted her to open the window. This she seemed reluctant to do. But I stood my ground until at last she put a hesitating hand upon the fastening. When the window was just a few inches up, I said, opening upon a point where we had sympathy—

"Sarah has gone to Beaconsburgh I saw her off. I hope she will be a very long time."

I was right. She had opened the window, which was a little above the level of my head, more confidently; and I saw that it was barred inside.

"Haidee is so much better to-day, Mrs. Rayner, I think she might come down stairs for a little while to-morrow into the dining-room, if we make a good fire there. She was asking to-day why you did not come up and see her, and I told her you were not well enough. She is very anxious about you."

"Give her my love," said Mrs. Rayner, with a faint smile. "I could not do her so much good as you have done." There was a plaintive expression of helplessness in these words that touched me. "Thank you, Miss Christie.

"I am so glad she is better," remarked I, venturing impulsively into the slough that I might stretch my hand up to the window-ledge. "I think it did her good to go up-stairs. The lower part of this house is damp, you know; Doctor Lowe said so."

She seemed to shrink back into herself a little at these words; however, she said—

"You have been very good to the child. It was best for her to go."

"Yes, I think it was. Don't you think that the mist from the marsh makes your room very cold this weather, Mrs. Rayner?"

Every one speaks highly of Dr Carson's Stomach Bitters as a Stomach, Liver and Kidney medicine. "The best family medicine we ever used," say they all. Try a bottle this Spring as a blood purifier.

J. B. Kerns of Stokes county, N. C, went there from Pittsburg, P., four years ago. In that time six children have been added to his family. He has been married to the same wife eighteen years, and has twenty-three children living. Seventeen boys and six girls. His wife is 46 and he 48.

NERVILINE, WHAT IS IT? Polson's NERVILINE is a combination of the most potent pain-relieving substances known to medical science. The constant progress made in this department of science points upward and onward. Nerviline is the latest development in this movement, and embodies the latest discoveries. For neuralgia, cramps, pains in the head—external, internal, and local—Nerviline has no equal. Expend 10 cents in the purchase of a sample bottle of Nerviline and be convinced of its marvellous power over pain. Sold by druggists. Large bottles 25 cents.

The Bull Fight.

The Spanish Bull Fight has been often described, but we cannot recollect ever having seen its sickening details shown up in clearer light than in the following description, which we take from Charles Dudley Warner's "Roundabout Journey":—

"The bull was in the ring. He was a noble animal, dun in color, handsomely marked, thin flanks, powerful shoulders, high-bred head with dilating nostrils, large glaring eyes, and symmetrical polished horns. Affixed to the back of his neck was the variegated rosette, and blood trickled down his shoulders. He stood for a moment facing the nine thousand enemies who roared at him, and then dashed round the ring, head erect and lashing his tail, with blood and defiance in his eyes. The chulos sought cover, and the picadores stood still, awaiting his attention. After his first course the bull stood for a moment pawing the ground and bellowing, and then, catching sight of one of the weak, blindfolded horses, whose rider was urging him forward, he advanced to the attack, though not with any rush. As he came near, the picador, who was swaying clumsily on his horse, with his spear and slightly turned his horse's head to the left. The horse stood still, and the bull inserted his horns under the animal's flank, slightly raising him from the ground. The footmen ran to the rescue with their distracting mantles, and the bull turned in pursuit of them. They nimbly skipped behind the shelters that are erected every few paces in the barrier, and the horse got away with his entrails trailing on the ground, his rider trying to spur him into a gallop. The crowd roared in great delight. The horse was good for sport as long as he could stand. When the horse is not too weak to keep his feet, the wound is sewed up, that he may be gored again; for seeing the horses tortured is one of the chief delights of the ring.) After a brief interval, the bull was excited to attack another horse. This time the horse was lifted from the ground and thrown on his side, the man under him, and the bull drew back to give him a finishing stroke. The attendants again rushed in, distracted the attention of the bull, pulled the man from under the horse, got the horse up, lifted the picador to his feet (for encumbered as he was with armour and wadding he could not rise), and put him on the horse again. The bull, still full of fight at losing his assailants, who had quickly stepped behind shelter, and advanced threateningly toward another horse. The picador walked his horse to meet him. The same clumsy manœuvres occurred as before. But this time the bull not only overthrew the horse, but gored him severely, and then attacked the prostrate rider. The footmen dashed in just in time to save the man from being tossed. The horse lay dead, and the man was carried out of the ring. It was considered by this time a lively fight, and the picadores were reinforced by two horsemen. The next horse assailed was gored so badly that, although he escaped he was in a dying condition: and after his cruel rider had spurred him a couple of times around the ring, he collapsed. The bull continued raging about, stepping occasionally to gore and toss the dead horses or make the aggravating chulos to cover, and then sullenly advancing and ripping open one of the blindfolded steeds. When the trumpet sounded, he had virtually cleared the ring, and roamed around, its master."

TAKE A THRUST AT THE BULL

WHEELED ABOUT IN A RAGE

Wolves in Italy.

A terrible occurrence recently happened at a village near Sora, in the Province of Caserta. The village lies among the spurs of the Apennines, where the scenery is very fine, and wolves are still known to exist. Some women belonging to the village had gone out to get wood, when they were all surprised by three or four large wolves, which famine had driven down from the mountains. Two of the women were attacked and thrown down by the savage animals. The others fled, crying for help, but were followed by one of the wolves, which had just seized a young girl by her dress when a wood-chopper appeared who had heard her cries. Then ensued a terrible struggle between the man and the wolf. The arm of the wood-cutter was torn, and although he wounded the animal with his axe it would have gone ill with him had not another wood-cutter arrived on the spot. The latter, with a well-aimed blow, dispatched the beast, and several companions having now assembled the party went in search of the missing women. They were found dead, terribly mangled and half eaten by the famished wolves, who took to flight on the approach of the searchers. One of the women was the mother of four children and the other was the mother of a girl of 16.—Manchester Examiner.

Canary Birds.

The canary is a most wonderful mimic of sounds, and will learn almost anything that is thrust upon his attention when young. He may acquire the chirp of a robin if he hears no other song, or he may be taught the air of a popular song. More than one canary has learned to whistle "Yankee Doodle." I have even known of a canary that could talk. Its owner got it when it was young and kept it where it could hear no other bird sing, and finally succeeded in teaching it to pronounce its own name, the name of its mistress and one or two other words. The German peasants take advantage of this faculty in teaching the young birds to sing. One plan is to place them in a large cage, partitioned so as to prevent its inmates from seeing each other; any fine singer, either a canary, a skylark or nightingale, is placed out of sight, but within hearing of the young canaries. After six months of this imprisonment the pupils, who have never seen their teacher, will have become perfect musicians. Another plan is to place the young ones in a room barely light for them to see to eat, where an instrument called a bird organ is played for an hour or more each day, in the hearing of the learners, who listen very attentively if they are not disturbed, and by practising the notes heard are soon able to sing them perfectly. Birds trained by this process become very proficient in the "water roll," the bell and flute notes and the various trills. After this course of training is completed the birds are separated. Each one is placed in a small cage, made by the peasants from fir wood and fastened together by pegs instead of nails. They remain in these narrow quarters until they cease to be merchandise and are finally domiciled in the homes, where they become the pets of the family. With the placing of the birds in these small cages begins the period in which large losses are almost certain to take place. Upon being separated the birds are attacked by "cage sickness," a sort of homesickness that silences many sweet young voices forever. Unlike many worse singers, the canary comes to America as a steerage passenger. The cages are piled up in divisions, so as to allow the attendants easy access between them to feed the birds and clean the cages. If proper care is devoted to food and cleanliness there may not be more than two or three birds lost out of a whole cargo. But if a heavy storm occurs the mortality may be something frightful to contemplate. The birds are attacked by genuine sea-sickness, as it is seen in man, and sometimes half of them die from it. About one hundred and fifty thousand birds are brought over every season.

An African Market.

Market days are generally held every four or eight days. The natives come a hundred miles to attend one of these big markets, and there are generally several thousand present, buying and selling. They bring their fowls most carefully packed in long wicker cages, fastened between two stout poles converging at each end. Eggs are usually carried in large, finely plaited baskets; indeed, some of the basket-work is so tightly made that it will hold water. The natives also sell fresh vegetables (pumpkins, sweet potatoes, and even a wild caboage), bananas, plantains, pineapples, ground nuts, sugar-cane, maize, kola-nut, tobacco, and "kikwanga." Kikwanga needs a word of special mention, it is such an important article of consumption in the Congo menu. The root of the manioc, or cassada, a very ancient introduction from Brazil, is taken and pounded into a white pulp. This is left to soak for about twenty-four hours in running water (possibly to rid the substance of a certain acrid poison, attributed to the root), and it is then allowed to ferment. When worked up in a consistence of stiff dough it is divided into portions, and each portion is wrapped up in a large green leaf until wanted for cooking. Kikwango tastes and looks like sour dough, but it is to cut it into very thin slices, and eat these fried in butter, or, if butter be not procurable, in ground-nut oil, which is almost indistinguishable from the best olive oil. Sheep, goats and innumerable fowls are sold, and even at times, Muscovy ducks. The latter birds is another gift from rich America to needy Africa, and was introduced into the West Coast in common with maize, manioc, pineapples, sugar cane, ground-nuts, and many other useful alimentary additions to African diet by the Portuguese, to whom, in my opinion, Africa owes a deep debt of gratitude. Nor ought we to forget that it is to this enterprising people we owe the first knowledge of the tea plant, the orange, and the lime. An African market with so many commodities to sell, and so many eager sellers and buyers is a most animated scene. The din of voices may be heard afar off, and when you enter the great open square, where, under the shade of great trees, perhaps a thousand people are disposed in little chaffering groups round their heaps of wares, it is worse than the parrot-house in the Zoological Gardens. The women are the keenest traders. They haggle and scream and expostulate and chuckle aside over their bargains, while the hulking men lounge about in good humored listlessnes, or squat in rows stolidly smoking. Although the strife of tongues is great few real quarrels occur. There is in most cases a chief of the market, perhaps an old Fetish man, who regulates all disputes, and who so heavily fines both litigants that all are chary of provoking his arbitration. This Babel lasts but one day, and then for the rest of the week the market place is void and desolate; only the old wicker baskets, baskets, banana-husks, corn-chucks, feathers, and egg-shells remain to witness the great assemblage that has taken place.

Testing Anchor and Chain Cables.

A movement is being made by the leading cable-chain and anchor manufactures of the United States to have a law enacted requiring a thorough test of these articles, with a view of better security to life and property on shipboard. We have read the text of the proposed act, and heartily endorse it, and hope it will be enacted. The ground tackle of all classes of vessels is a vital element to safety, and it is time its character should be established by reliable tests made under the eye of competent and sworn officials. Under the existing system everything is left to the integrity of the manufactures, and when a low grade of anchor and chain has been put upon the market by unprincipled men, and has found its way into vessels whose owners bought it because it was cheap. Such chain not only tends to increase risks to life and property, but, being in the market, is often purchased by owners who really are anxious to get a good article, yet, knowing nothing of the real merits of these articles, are sadly imposed upon. No shipowner who is really desirous of obtaining a first-class article will object to the passage of such a law, which in its workings will guarantee him the best goods at the lowest price compatible with real merit. Besides, it will give a recognized character to American chain in all parts of the world, which it does not now possess officially.—Nautical Gazette.

We do not go to heaven, but heaven comes to us. They whose inner eye is open to see heaven, and they who see it, are in it; and the air to them is thick with angels, like the background of Raphael's "Mother in Glory."

"I know men," said Napoleon at St. Helena, "and I tell you that Christ was not a man. The religion of Christ is a mystery, which subsists by its own force, and proceeds from a mind that is not a human mind."

Good works do not make a Christian, but one must be a Christian to do good works. The tree bringeth forth the fruit, not the fruit the tree. None is made a Christian by works, but by Christ; and being in Christ he brings forth for Him.

PERSONALS.

The Oldest General—Zola, the Novelist—Mr. Vanderbilt—Speakers of the British House of Commons, etc., etc.

Queen Victoria's well-known objection to making poor men peers gave way in the case of Lord Tennyson. His eldest son is a clerk in a public office.

Mr. Magnin, Governor of the Bank of France, gave a grand reception lately at his official residence on the anniversary of the bank's foundation eighty-four years ago.

It having been asserted that the French General Schramm, 95, who lately died, was the oldest General, a Belgian paper says that Antwerp can produce one one year older, 96, who took part in the retreat from Moscow, and is still alive to enjoy life.

The Lancet thinks that Gen. Gordon owes his success to having a specially well-balanced mind, and being at the same time firm and sympathetic. "He is not one," says the editor, "who has any great love of leaning to what is called 'brilliancy' in exploit."

Apropos of the proposition to erect a memorial to Dickens, a correspondent of a London daily paper quotes a passage from the novelist's will which will probably prove fatal to the project: "I conjure my friends on no account to make me the subject of any monument, memorial, or testimonial whatever. I rest my claim to the remembrance of my country upon my published works.

Mr. Vanderbilt has been taking an inventory of his property and finds that it amounts to $201,000,000—a million more than the Duke of Westminster estate, which yields only $4,000,000 income. Mr. Vanderbilt's yields three times that amount. It is not this fact that Mr. Vanderbilt is so proud of, but because he earned every cent of his money by his own exertions at hard daily labor.

Feb. 29 was the anniversary of Rossini's birthday, who, of course, had a birthday only every four years, which made him ask a young lady who dined with him on Feb. 29, 1864, and whose nineteenth birthday was the day before, "Who is, in your opinion, younger—a man who celebrates his eighteenth anniversary or a young lady who celebrates her nineteenth birthday?" When she said the young man of the eighteenth anniversary, he replied, "Well, I am that young man, and consequently I am younger than you. You said so yourself."

Mr. Muntz, the senior member for Birmingham, who was one of those who congratulated Mr. Peel, on his elevation to the Speaker's chair, was present at the baptism of the latter when he was named Arthur Wellesley, after the Duke of Wellington, who was also present on the occasion in the capacity of godfather. This was in the year 1829, when Mr. Muntz was in his eighteenth year. Mr. Muntz's father (also M. P. for Birmingham) wore a beard when there was not another in the House of Commons, and was known throughout England as "the man who wore the beard."

Zola is thus described by M. Guy de Maupassant: "Zola is of average height, rather stout, and has a good-natured though obstinate look. His head, very much like those which are found in many of the old Italian paintings, without being handsome, shows great power and intelligence. His hair, cut short, stands upright on a well-developed brow; his nose is straight and cut square, as if by too sharp a stroke of a chisel; he wears a rather thick moustache, and the lower portion of his fat but energetic face is covered with a short beard cut close to the chin. He is short-sighted, and has dark and penetrating eyes, which seem to search you through and through, while a certain movement of the upper lip gives the mouth a peculiar and mocking appearance."

The New Speaker of the British House of Commons, Sir Arthur Peele, is 54 years of age. Sir Henry Brand, the outgoing Speaker, was 57 at the date of his elevation to the chair; so was Mr. Evelyn Denison. The veteran Lord Eversley, who has just completed his ninetieth year, had lived but forty-five years when the Commons chose him to preside over their debates. His immediate predecessor, Mr. Abercromby, had entered on his sixtieth year at the time of his election, being thus considerably older than the gentleman whom he virtually, if not theoretically displaced. Sir Charles Manner Sutton had been called to the chair at the age of 37, and retired into private life at the age of 55. Mr. Speaker Abbot was 44 when he entered on his high functions; Sir John Mittord, 52; Addington, 32. The case of Addington is worth noticing, for, though an incompetent Minister, he was allowed by his opponents to have proved an excellent Speaker. Macaulay thought that if Addington had remained in the chair long enough he would have left a reputation equal to that of Onslow himself. Grenville, on whose resignation Addington was elected, was but 28 when he quitted the chair. The Premier whose Cabinet he entered was just 30; one of his colleagues, the First Lord of the Admirality, not 33. Arthur Onslow held the Speakership from his thirty-eight to his seventy-first year. An octogenarian Speaker it would probably be impossible to find in the whole list.

A New Form of Steel.

At a recent meeting of the Institution of Mechanical Engineers, London, the Hadfield Steel Foundry Company showed specimens of steel castings and pieces of steel wholly without magnetic capacity, including axes and other tools carrying a fine cutting edge, which were the subjects of very great interest in those present, for these cast tools require no treatment of any kind when they come from the mould. They are very hard, but what is the more remarkable is that they are very tough at the same time. They require no hardening or tempering. The steel of these remarkable properties is made by thoroughly incorporating under Mr. Robert Hadfield's patent, from 7 to 12 per cent. of rich ferro-manganese, containing about 80 per cent of manganese. The applications of this remarkable metal are, it needs hardly be said, innumerable. Tools of almost every description can now go straight from foundry to grinding and finishing rooms, while for the numerous engineering purposes to which steel is applied, for strength, toughness, and hardness are now added.

Dogs' Attire.

In Paris, ladies dress their dogs in the most becoming fashion. Lily has paid a visit to Madame Ledouble, the famous dog modiste in the Palais Royal. All day long a series of pugs and smooth-haired terriers arrive at her salons to try on their garments and have their paletots fitted. As they have occasionally, like their owners, to await their turn, small mats and rugs are scattered ove the waxed floors, so that the little dogs may be comfortable while anticipating their interview with their modiste. They have several changes of dress in their wardrobes, which they wear according to the hour or the temperature of the day. When they take their morning walk in the Bois with their mistress, the "correct thing" is a paletot of dark blue cloth, warmly lined with red flannel and a military gorget coming high up under the leather collar, which is hung with bells. The monogram of the dog's mistress is no longer embroidered in one corner of the paletot. That is out of date—and why should a little dog be out of fashion? So mortifying, you know, when it sees other doggies carrying their monograms in the middle of the back, the "correct" place. To complete this morning toilet, a bunch of violets is fastened on the left shoulder. On mild days the little creatures have "Excelsior" paletots in dark green cloth, lined with bright yellow silk, and embroidered in silk of the color of the lining. The monogram is worked in similar silk. The collar is black velvet, with gilt bells pendent from it. On very cold days the paletot is sealskin, with handsome buttons, and the pampered little things wear fur collars mounted in silver. For travelling a tartan paletot is derigeur, with harness of red leather, having detachable reins. What do you think of it? How humilitated the dogs must feel when they are first dressed up!

Uses of Paper.

A complete list of articles made of paper would be a very curious one, and almost every day it becomes more so. Among other exhibits at the Berlin Exhibition were paper buckets, "bronzes," urns, asphalt roofing, water cans, carpets, shirts, whole suits of clothes, jewellery, materials for garden walks, window curtains, lanterns and pocket handkerchiefs. The most striking of the many objects exhibited in this material was perhaps a fire-stove with a cheerful fire burning in it. We have from time to time noted the announcements of newly invented railway carriages and carriage wheels, chimney-pots, flour barrels, cottage walls, roofing tiles and bricks, and dies for stamping, all made of paper. A material capable of so many uses, so very diversified in character, is obviously destined to play a very important part in our manufacturing future. Articles of this kind, which have just now perhaps the greatest interest, and which are among the latest novelties in this way, are paper "blankets." Attention has frequently been called to the value of ordinary sheets of paper as a substitute for bed-clothes, or, at least, as an addition to bed-clothes. The idea seems to have suggested the fabrication of "blankets" from this cheap material, and if all that is said of them is true, they ought to be extensively used. For the extremely indigent they should be a great boon, and it is in their favor, perhaps, that they can not, of course, be so durable as ordinary woollen or cotton goods. The bedding of many of the poor cannot but be productive of much sickness and disease, and a very cheap material, that will last only a comparatively short time, must be better than durable article that are rarely or never washed. The value of an introduction of this kind for charitable purposes, just at the commencement of a cold season, may be considered to take these new blankets rather out of the ordinary list of goods on the market, and to justify a special reference to them.—London Globe.

The Thorn in the Flesh of Alsatia.

One instance of the small annoyances to which the French residents of Mulhouse are subject is a trifling one, yet sufficient to irritate. Eight months after the annexation, orders were sent round to the pastors and clergy generally to offer up prayers for the Emperor William every Sunday. The order was obeyed, for refusal would have been assuredly followed by dismissal, but the prayer is ungraciously performed. The French pastors invoke the blessing of heaven on "l' Empereur qui nous gouverne." The pastors who perform the service in Germany pray not for "our Emperor," as is the apparently loyal fashion in the Fatherland, but for "the Emperor." These things are trifling grievances, but on the other hand the Prussians have theirs also. Not even the officials of the highest rank are received into any kind of society whatever. Mulhouse possesses a charming zoological garden, free to subscribers only, who have to be balloted for. Not a single Prussian has ever been able to obtain access to this garden. Even the very poorest contrive to show their intense patriotism. It is the rule of the German Government to give 25 marks to any poor woman giving birth to twins. The wife of a French workman during my sojourn at Mulhouse had three sons at a birth, but though in very poor circumstances refused to claim the donation. "My sons shall never be Prussians," she said, "and that gift would make them so."

Lightning Rods.

Prof. Mohn of Christiana, Norway, having been employed by the Government to investigate the effiency of the protection afforded to buildings by lightning rods, seems to have substantially settled the much debated question, at least for that region of country. His report shows that lighthouses, telegraph stations, and other exposed buildings, which were provided with conductors, did not by far suffer as much as churches, which in most cases were unprotected. It appears, in fact, that of about 100 churches reported to have been struck by lightning, only three were provided with conductors; that of these three the first had a conductor in good order, and the building was uninjured; the second had a conductor of zinc wire, which melted, and, of course, left the structure without protection; the third had a wire which was rusty where it joined the earth, and the church was burned. More than one-half the number of churches struck were totally destroyed. Mr. Preece, the English electrican, states that no damage has occurred since telegraph poles were earth wired.

PEARLS OF THOUGHT.

We write our blessings on the water, but afflictions on the rocks.

Godliness consists not in a heart to intend to do the will of God, but in a heart to do it.

Christ descends by his spirit into the heart—a change without succeeds the change within.

In every man there is a loneliness, an inner chamber of peculiar life, into which God only can enter.

All along the pathway of life are tomb stones, by the side of which we have promised to strive for heaven.

The whole linen that robes the saint, the raiment meet for thy soul, and approved of God, was woven upon the Cross.

The serene silent beauty of a holy life is the most powerful influence of the world, next to the might of the Spirit of God.

Though there be much of mystery, it is not for us to question the propriety of God's ways, but rather say, "He doeth all things well."

To pray against temptations and yet to rush into occasions, is to thrust your fingers into the fire, and pray they might not be burnt.

Of all the anguish in the world, there is nothing like this—The sense of God without the sense of nearness to Him.

A firm faith is the best divinity; a good life the best philosophy; a clear conscience the best law; honesty the best policy, and temperance the best physic.

God's ear is ever close to our lips. It touches them. It is always listening. Thoughts speak to it as loudly as words. Suffering even louder than words. The ear of Divine attention is never taken away. We sigh into it even when we sleep and dream.

We can become familiar with a landscape; we know where to find the waterfall, and the shady ledge where the violets grow in spring; but we can never tell where we shall come upon the shady dell, or where the fountains will gush and the birds sing—that is with God.

The Chinese Emperor.

The present Chinese emperor is a lad thirteen years of age. He lives in a state of semi-seclusion in the Palace of Jan-Chien-Tien, where he is waited on by a staff of picked retainers, who never approach him otherwise than on their knees. His mother visits him once a month, and she kneels while uttering her first sentence. Considering the extraordinary respect in which parents are held in China, no more complete recognition of the transcendental character of the imperial dignity can be imagined. His father goes through exactly the same ceremony. The emperor devotes two hours and a half daily to the study of Chinese, and the same time to Manchu. It is needless to say that the professors approach him on their knees; but to remark the respect to letters which Chinese traditions exact even from the emperor, he invites, or rather commands, them to rise when the lesson begins. He passes two hours each day in riding and archery, and in winter he takes sledging exercise. Eight eunuchs wait upon him at table, and have orders to prevent his partaking too freely of any of his favorite dishes, as boys, even though they be emperors, will sometimes do. He sleeps in a magnificent Ningpo bed, the frame of which is of massive gold and ivory, and which belonged to his distinguished ancestors, K'ang-Hai and Ch'ien Lung.

A Discovery in Relation to Hydrophobia.

M. Pasteur, of Paris, recently made an interesting communication to the Paris Academy of Sciences in relation to canine madness. His experiments had shown him that an injection in the region of the skull of the virus of rabies always produced the malady in an acute form, but an injection in the veins only occasionally had acute results, being often followed by chronic affections only, without barking or ferocity. If a dog were inoculated with fragments of marrow or of nerve taken from a mad dog, the disease would be communicated. M. Pasteur further stated that he had rendered twenty dogs proof against the disease by inoculating them with other virus than the virus of rabies. Fowls and pigeons injected with the latter became affected, but soon recovered spontaneously.—London Standard.

Evils of Speculation.

Four years ago the United States sent 75 per cent. of all the wheat and flour that England required. This per centage has progressively decreased, till it has sunk to 46. The fact is not explicable by any decrease in the British demand, that demand being greater than ever before. American writers explain the fact by saying that speculation has sent up prices in the States to a height which made exportation impossible. In this way is speculation, in the shape of corners and futures, injuring the interests of the United States. The importing country buys in the best market, and when speculators send up American wheat to fancy prices, foreign buyers decline to give those prices and purchase elsewhere.

The English Marriage Law.

The absurdity of the existing English marriage law is well illustrated, says the Pall Mall Gazette, by a piece of persecution about which a question was asked in the House of Commons a few days ago. A parishioner at Epping and his wife were refused the Holy Communion by the vicar on the ground that the woman was the man's deceased wife's sister. The husband was 82, and the wife 77, and they had been married fifty years; but Dr. Claughton, the Bishop of the diocese, apparently held that they both came within the definition of "notorious evil livers," and sustained the vicar in his action. The Attorney-General, however, has now pointed out that the marriage, having been contracted before Lord Lyndhurst's act, is strictly valid, and the vicar has been advised by the Bishop that the two parishioners "cannot legally be repelled from the Holy Communion." "Had this view of the law been present to my mind," adds Dr. Claughton in a letter to the parishioners, "I should have been spared the pain—no less to myself than to yourselves—of ordering the said repulse."

MARKDALE MAR. 27, 1884.

WIRE FENCES.

The winter is about past, and has been unexpectedly severe, many of the roads having been blocked with snow the worst of any season in the history of the oldest inhabitant. This fact strongly suggests the propriety of devising some means whereby the blocking up of certain leading roads might be obviated. The wire fence is perhaps the most complete remedy, taking into consideration the cost. The season for fence building is now before us, and we would urge upon the township councils the advisability of offering some assistance in erecting good substantial wire fences on certain leading roads. We have no doubt the ratepayers will strongly favor such a course, and the benefits would doubtless prove valuable and satisfactory not only in hindering the complete blockade of portions of leading roads during winter season, but in shortening the time that such roads are impossible in the spring of the year caused by the depth of snow on such portions while other parts are clear. A wire fence built with posts planted say 8 feet apart and a 12 inch board at the bottom, and a 2 x 4 scantling on the top with four wires between, two of which should be barbed, will answer the purpose of the best rail, board or picket fence, while it will cost very little more. We would suggest to our neighboring councils that they give the matter their consideration.

THE CONSPIRACY.

The daily papers have considerable space devoted to giving details of the investigation going on re the above all absorbing question of the week, and it is a very difficult matter to come to an unbiased conclusion in the matter. The Globe endeavors to push home the responsibility on the Conservative party, while the Mail is making strenuous efforts to turn public opinion against those who refused to be bribed, and the whole affair has a mixed and muddled appearance at the present time. Below is a clipping which gives the opinion of a disinterested journal:

The Buffalo Courier says: "In the face of the great scandal, which should startle all thoughtful Canadians into a sense of public danger, the politicians are engaged in a desperate struggle to turn the disgrace to party advantage. The Toronto Globe, the organ of the Liberals, is eager in pushing home the responsibility upon the leaders of the Conservative organization. The Toronto Mail, organ of the Dominion Ministry, is busy belittling the whole affair, and trying to turn public indignation from the real culprits to the men who refused to be bribed. A true sense of justice and honest indignation at rascality apart from its party affiliations seems to be altogether wanting. We doubt whether this state of things can continue long. The elements which make up the Dominion are incongruous and inharmonious. The relations of the provinces to the general Government are undefined. Public life is manifestly corrupt. Party spirit is verging into a sort of insanity, and unless there comes reforming, there will come revolution."

Flesherton.

From our own correspondent.

A rather serious accident occurred some days ago at Flesherton Station, Mr. D. Stewart's horse took fright at a passing train and started to run, with the first jump the breeching strap broke and let the cutter strike the frighted animal on the heels. Two men were in the cutter with Mr. Stewart, one of them, Mr. T. McArthur, jumped and fell with his face upon the ice, received some severe bruises and bled profusely. The other two men escaped with but slight bruises. The cutter, we are informed, a new one worth about $70, was broken to atoms. Also another accident of somewhat serious character occurred on Monday of last week. Mr. W. Holly, who had that day driven here to the village to get married, after the knot being skilfully tied by the Rev. Mr. McDowell, and Wilham made apparently perfectly happy, with his company was driving home about a mile from this village, when overtaken by one D. Smith, Esq., with a double team, and Dick thinking it would be interesting to run past the wedding party or give them a bit of a run, (which by the way we understand is fashionable now-a-days when the young couple is out on their wedding tour, say four or five miles from home) so on went lash, and away went horse, until that, which was a trot, Gilpin like, became a gallop soon, when suddenly Smith's team was brought to a stop by one of his horses falling, and under the strain burst a blood vessel. The animal died in a short time afterward. We regret that Mr. Smith happened with such a misfortune. This may prove a lesson to other young men, and have a tendency to prevent the inhuman and silly habit of racing horses in such a manner when out for pleasure.

The Rev. Mr. Edmunds, of Priceville, preached and conducted the services in the Methodist church last Friday evening, in the absence of the pastor, Mr. McDowell, who was that evening delivering a lecture at Corbetton.

Meaford Road.

New Postmaster.—Our post-office has changed hands. Mr. Wm. Hutchinson is the new postmaster.

Horse Lost.—Mr. R. Smith, Jr., lost a valuable horse. It dropped dead on the road as he was driving home from Flesherton. Cause, the bursting of one of the large blood vessels.

Mrs. C. Carson is about to remove to her farm in Tyrone.

Mr. W. Gilbert is going to live on the Town Line, having rented Mr. G. Sewell's farm.

Mr. Day, from the gravel road, has rented Mr. Davis' farm and saw-mill.

Mr. W. Hutchinson is now living on his new farm.

Mr. Wm. Holly and Miss Margret A. Bowels have started together for a sail across the sea of matrimony. We wish them safe voyage.

Priceville.

Roads very bad.

Sugar making now.

Mr. Ferguson is winding up his extensive timber busines He did a large business the past winter.

On Wednesday, the 19th, about 9 o'clock at night, a fire was discovered in the hotel stables of T. Atkinson: one of the boarders seized a buffalo-robe and sprung upon the small but increasing blaze and rapidly extinguished it. As the crowd rushed to the scene a man escaped from the building and fled, but was not recognized or captured. The fire is thought to be the work of an incendiary. Had the fire got one more minute's start a serious conflagration would have been the result.

Com.

What we may Expect.

An early spring,
And a prosperous summer.
Markdale incorporated in 1884,
And the liquor traffic thereby decreased,
And citizens to be glad, and rejoice thereat,
And the village become a more desirable place to reside in.
The Scott Act passed in Grey e'er long.
The Salvation Army to strike Markdale soon.
A large number of eggs to market this week,
And the prices decrease,
And consumption increase,
Especially about Easter.
To hear of sugar bush depredations
By village boys.
A new Methodist church next summer,
And the old one turned into a Town Hall.
And yet another wedding in town.

A "Falls Route" at Last.

The Michigan Central Railroad Company opens a through East and West route which is honestly a Niagara Falls route, and which gives the tourist such full and leisurely opportunities to see Niagara Falls—without once leaving his seat—that a generous public may well accept the new provisions as ample atonement for all previous shortcomings. By the new route the traveller is not simply given a distant and obscure view of the Falls. He is taken dow the river on the New York side. From Buffalo to Tonawanda he rides, much of the way, along the river bank, and can study the force and sweep of the great current. Then, as he rides along, he has a full view of the two great arms of the river that encompassGrand Island. Just before he reaches Niagara Falls village he can see the first break of the river into the upper rapids. He crosses the stream by the new cantilever bridge, and has a general view of the Falls. Then he skirts along above the Canadian bank until "Falls View" is reached. This point of observation has heretofore been reached only by the Niagara City branch of the Canada Southern. It has not been on the East and West route at all. Now all through trains stop at "Falls View," which is really one of the finest views of the Falls anywhere to be had.—Buffalo Express.

The Markdale steam sash, door and planing factory is in full operation, and those who purpose building will do well to give them a trial. Planing done on short notice, and window and door frames supplied to order together with sash and bannisters, hollow battons, fence pickets &c. &c.

It appears some person has undertaken to diminish the number of dogs in the village by poison. There are doubtless an over stock of the canine kind but some valuable ones are apt to suffer the same fate, as the worse than useless ones by this mode of extermination.

The bribery case is affording American newspapers an excellent opportunity to make comparisons between American and Canadian politics, and they all arrive at the conclusion that there was never anything so corrupt in the history of American politics. The condition of affairs is certainly bad enough here, and should make every honest Canadian blush, but our neighbors shouldn't assume too much virtue. If the story of the witnesses is true, Kirkland said he has already spent $32,000 in bribing a U. S. legislature.

See those new, stylish and astonishingly low priced Spring and Summer Tweeds at R. J. Sproule's, Flesherton; they are selling fast. Call early and get bargains.

Mr. R. O. Whitby, who has, for some years, been in the employ of Mr. W. H. Steinhoff, painter, of Dundalk, is now a resident of Markdale. We understand, from him, that he will be here most of the coming summer where he will follow up the painting business. He is a good and reliable hand.

Concert.—The Markdale G. & D. Club will give their last concert of the season in aid of a brass band, in the Orange Hall, Markdale, on Wednesday, 2nd April. They have secured the services of Frank Wismer, the celebrated Vantreloquist; also other good talent, for which see posters. Admission 15 cts.

John R. Vert, Hamilton, says: "McGregor's Speedy Cure for Dyspepsia and Indigestion is cheap at fifty times the price asked for it. I am a commercial man, and travel continually, and would no more think of leaving home without a bottle of McGregor's Speedy Cure in my valise than I would of leaving my team at home and going on foot." Free trial bottle at Hill Bros. general store. Regular sixe, fifty cents and one dollar.

We have received the first copy of a paper called the Canadian American, published in Dakota. It is devoted to the interest of Canadians, who have through the years become residents of the American North West. The paper is a racy, lively sheet, and seems to be under able editorial control.

R. J. Sproule's store, Flesherton, is now crowded daily with new Spring and Summer goods, and cash customers, buying freely, are astonished at the low prices they are getting goods at.

The Chatsworth Debating Society have risen to a very creditable position, their meetings are well conducted, largely attended, highly interesting, and the various subjects are ably handled. Some of our more pretentious villages might greatly profit by such a course during the winter months, and indeed even in summer season.

Our local subscribers, both village and country, who receive their mail matter at Markdale P. O. will in future find the Standard paper in the post office after 4 o'clock every Thursday. Those however, who would prefer calling at the printing office for their paper will please let us know and we will make out a special list for them, and they can call as heretofore.

The Dundalk Brass Band gave a concert in the Town Hall, Flesherton, last Thursday evening, 20th inst., and was poorly attended, realizing but very little over what payed expenses. The audience appeared to be well pleased with the capers of "Paddy Miles," and in fact the program throughout. The boys are to be congratulated for the way in which they conducted themselves while holding their series of concerts.

Final Warning.—All parties indebted to H. Foster by note or otherwise are hereby notified that all notes and accounts not paid before the first day of April will be placed in court for collection. Notes and accounts will be found at Wm. Lucas & Co's. bank. Parties not attending to this warning will have costs added for all accounts not paid by the above date will certainly be placed in court for collection.

That gigantic piece of patriotic-symbolism, the Bartholdi Statue of Liberty, the pedestal for which is now rising out of New York harbor, has been graphically transferred to our office through the courtesy of the Travelers Insurance Company of Hartford, a corporation which is getting famous for good deeds of this character. The company has prepared especially for the American press adition of the official engraving of the great statue and has sent a copy to every newspaper in the land. This engraving being issued under the auspicies, and for the benefit of the Pedestal Committee, this act of the "Travelers" involves its contribution of over $1,700, toward the erection of this splendid national monument.

Last week Mr. Symington received a telegram informing him of his brother's illness in St. Catherines. He went to see him and returned on Friday evening. On Saturday a second telegram was received stating that he could not recover. Messrs. J. and W. Symington left by the next train. Word has since been received that the young man died on Saturday. —Dundalk Herald.

Splendid Offer.—The Standard the balance of 1884—nine months—together with a copy of a book of 90 pages, "A Treatise on the Horse and his Diseases," all for 75 cents to new subscribers. A subscriber, who has had one of the above books over a year, informed us a few days since that if he could not procure one of these books for less, he would willingly pay $4.00 for a copy. Now is the time to subscribe and get one free.

Geo. Grant & Co., of the Markdale Furniture Factory, are turning out excellent furniture, and the public will find it to their advantage to inspect their stock before purchasing. They are manufacturing something new in closed wash-stands, which is the most convenient and complete we have yet seen. Mr. Grant is a practical cabinet maker, and a man of undoubted integrity: two very desirable requisites in business. Give them a call.

To drive away Rats.—Mary Hadlem writes that rats have so strong an aversion to the odor of peppermint, they will not enter rooms or bins where it prevails. She says of the peppermint plant: "We place it in the oats, rye and corn, when they are brought in, and some goes under the pig-stye. Though we no longer have any rats, we continue to use the plant, for fear they might make us a visit." If this is so, in the absence of the plant, probably a few drops of the oil of peppermint would answer the same purpose.—American Agriculturist for April.

Re-Organization of Gymnasium Club.—A meeting was held at the Revere House, on the 21st inst. Mr. John Hill, the resigning President, was voted to the chair. The club greatly regret at loosing Mr. Hill as their President. After a brisk discussion by some of the most prominent members, some light was thrown on the matter in a brief speech by the resigning Secretary, W. J. Benson, after which the following officers were elected:—President, John Telford; Vice-President, Simon Plewis; Sec.-Treasurer, W. L. Young; Manager, D. J. Shanahan.

"War Notes."—Such is the martial title of a weekly campaign paper just started for the benefit of the general Scott Act Campaign inaugurated by the Dominion Alliance. It is issued by the Witness Publishing House, Montreal, at barely cost price—20 copies weekly for six months for one dollar. War Notes has in fact as well as in name the ring of battle, its articles being crisp and keen, its news got up in pointed style, and its headings trumpet blasts well designed to rally the temperance clans. It gives news of the working of the Scott Act where it is in operation, as well as campaign news.

An Acknowledged Convenience.—It is very convenient to have local newspapers to announce marriages and deaths; it is nice to have them speak well of enterprizes that will help to build up the town; it is very convenient to have them to assist in surpressing evils that every now and then break out in the community; it is very convenient to have them do a thousand and one things which they are always doing to benefit the public, and for which they get no pay; but it is not convenient for some who are abundantly able to support and encourage their home papers, to do so even to the extent of becoming subscribers and paying for the same.

An alarming occurrence took place in Arthur Village last week, which, had it happened a little earlier, might have been attended with disastrous consequences. At the hour named a tremendous crash was heard, there was a strong gale blowing at the time, and it was soon discovered that the cause of the terrible crash was the fall of the furnace chimney on the south side of the Catholic church. It tumbled right in upon the roof, and breaking about the centre, burst through, carrying a large portion of the roof, beams, etc., down into the church, with such force as to smash through the floor, breaking planks and joists, like twigs. The Enterprise says it was providential the funeral party, which had occupied the building a short time previously, had left, otherwise the consequences would certainly have been serious.—Mt. Forest Advocate.

AGRICULTURAL.

Irrigation.

Irrigation is no new matter in British India. It has been practiced from time immemorable, and the entire country is dotted with tanks, many of which are of enormous size, that have been constructed for storing water for this purpose, this plan is necessary not, as might be supposed, on account of rain, but because the fall is confined to a few months of the year, and usually comes in the form of a deluge. For example, the rainfall during a period of four months on the west slope of the Neilgherries is about 400 inches, and on the mountains east of Calcutta 600 inches high and even more. In the Carnatic, the region south and west of Madras, there are only about 40 inches altogether. This fal's principally in heavy bursts, often ten or twelve inches in a night, thus giving half a year's supp'y in two showers. In the Madras Presidency alone there are 40,000 tanks for the storage of water, many of which are magnificent works from ten to twenty-five miles in circumference and from ten to sixty feet deep. One of the reservoirs will contain the enormous quantity of 100,000,000 cubic yards of water. Besides these tanks there are many old irrigating canals leading off from the rivers. These are supplied by noble weirs built of immense stones across the streams, by ingenious construction of which, by the natives, has shown the British authorities the best way of doing similar work on a much larger scale across some of the largest rivers in India. For many years the Indian government has been engaged in the improvement of the ancient irrigating works and in perfecting new systems. In the Tanjore district alone the returns of the government from this policy have been enormous, the revenue having increased £350,000 a year upon an expenditure of £400 000. The system has been extended to a very considerable extent in various otl er parts of India, and all the belts of land, comprising many millions of acres, which have been reached by this grand system of irrigation now present a marked contrast to the immense tracts of arid waste which met the eye of the traveller a few years ago, compelling even the haters of English rule to acknowledge that no such benefit was ever bestowed upon India before. An idea of the magnitude of an irrigating canal which is needed to water a million acres may be found when it is understood that such a waterway must be two hundred yards broad and three yards deep, flowing one-and-a-half miles an hour, and capable of floating large steamers conveying millions of tons per annum. In the gradual and systematic prosecution of this vast work of irrigation Great Britain is conferring enormous benefits upon the people of India, not only providing against future years of famine, but rendering the so fruitful that it will be na marvel in a few years if it should produce a large surplus of wheat and other cereals for foreign nations. —Bradstreet.

Forests and Their Effects Upon Floods.

"We would like to have the individuals who are clamoring for government interferance for the prevention of floods, answer the following question. If the denudation of forest lands on the upper Ohio and tributaries was the cause of the flood last year and the disastrous overflow now prevailing, what is the cause of the rise in the Arkansas, St. Francis and Red Rivers of the South, all of which are now booming? Do those afflicted with the denudation craze know that the rivers mentioned flow mostly through densely wooded districts? The writer was lately in the forests of the Yazoo delta, miles from human habitation. At the time it had been raining like a deluge for days, The ravines and gullies were carrying great volumes of water into the bayous and rivers. Did the heavy growth of timber, the mosses and interlacing roots stop the outflow? Not any worth mentioning. Water falling on the surface of the earth will seek a lower level, whether it is overshadowed by trees or not. Floods occured hundreds of years ago, the same as they do now. Men talk as if there never was a flood in the Ohio or Mississippi until 1882 and 1883. One of the biggest rises known to white men in the Ohio was in 1832, when it and its tributaries still flowed through the almost unbroken primeval forest. If the question were thoroughly looked looked up in its far reaching historical features, it would be discovered that never in the annals of this country was there a more idiotic, baseless conclusion than that now prevailing in the popular mind about the denudation of forest land causing recent floods in the great rivers."

Farm Topics.

CABBAGES makes a valuable food for poultry, as it contains a large per cent, of phosphoric acid. It is all the more valuable, because where cabbages are kept in the cellar or used in Winter there is always a supply of green food for the fowls.

LOOK TO THE PIG-PEN.—As a rule less attention is given to the pig pen than the stable, and the swine which are kept constantly in confined quarters are much more liable to become diseased when neglected than any other live-stock. Clean quarters for pigs will well repay their owner.

AN AVERAGE COW for dairy purposes, should give twenty pounds of milk per day during 200 days of every year, eight pounds of cream for every 100 pounds of milk, forty-five pounds of butter for every 100 pounds of cream, and fully ten pounds of cheese from every 100 pounds of milk.

RABBITS OR HARES. — There are some anatomical differences, especially in the bones of the head, between rabbits and hares. There is a marked difference in their habits. The rabbits live in burrows, while hares never make holes. When pursued, they may sometimes take refuge in a chance hole, but they never dig. All our so-called rabbits are hares.

TOP-DRESSING ORCHARDS. — Cultivators are becoming more and more satisfied of the value of common manure for bearing orchards. Those which have been regularly top-dressed have borne much better the past scarce season than neglected orchards. The owner of an orchard of six acres, in a region where not one-tenth of a crop was raised the past season, sold over $300 worth of fruit from it. He has regularly top-dressed it for several years, and two sheep to each tree have picked up the fallen fruit infested with the codling worm.—Country Gentleman.

CUTTINGS FOR SPRING.—Much difficulty is often experienced by farmers in making cuttings of grape and other wood when planted in cold soil in the Spring. The trouble partly arises from the fact that air is much warmer than the soil, which starts the bud before root action commences. If cuttings are placed with their base ends in dry soil in the cellar bottom, the base will callous and be ready to emit roots as soon as planted. Market gardeners make every cutting live by furnishing bottom heat which simply means keeping the soil in which the cutting is planted warmer than the bud, which is exposed to air.

GRAFTING-WAX.—Last Spring, after considerable trouble, this recipe was obtained for grafting-wax and as it has proved satisfactory it is given for the benefit of others. Take 1 lb. of resin, ½ lb. of beeswax, and a little less than ½ lb. of tallow. Melt together in a small iron kettle, and stir thoroughly that the ingredients may be well mixed. Pour into a dish of cold water, and when cool, break into three or four pieces, and pull like molasses candy until white and fine-grained. When the whole is properly worked, divide into eight pieces, form into rolls six inches long, and wrap in oiled paper. To clean the kettle, rub it while yet hot with a teaspoonful of lard or tallow, and wash out with soap and warm water; repeat this, and rinse, and it will be as clean as ever.—O. A. O., in Country Gentleman.

CHEAP SUBSTITUTE FOR SUPERPHOSPHATE. —A farmer who has under his stable of eighteen cows a liquid manure-vat — which, he tells the Vermont Watchman "did not cost over $10"—pumped from it last year and discharged directly upon the land 55 loads of 120 gallons each, "at small cost of time and strength," and judging from the crops he believes it to have done more good than a ton of the best superphosphate. The significant result thus reported gives three loads or 360 gallons from each cow, or one gallon a day. It would have taken twenty pounds of sand to absorb or hold in suspension each gallon, or 66 tons to absorb the 55 loads, making the additional labor of drawing the sand to the barn and from the stable to the field if such an absorbent was used, and the agency of rain would be needed to wash the urine from the sand to the earth and to the roots of plants.

SORGHUM.—There is more than one source of profit in the growing of sorghum. While the syrup is the principal object aimed at, the leaves afford a very fair fodder if fed green to animals; the only trouble seems to be that it is a little harsh, and would tend to make the animals' mouths sore if compelled to eat it for any length of time continuously. The chief additional value comes from the seed; this is produced in considerable quantities, and its value as a food is variously esteemed by different individuals. By some it is considered fully equivalent to the same quantity of oats; others value it equal to corn, and some consider the value of the seed sufficient to compensate for all the culture. It is ground and fed in connection with meal to hogs, horses, or cattle. A trial of it as a food for the family has been made, and when ground and bolted is said to be superior to buckwheat.

The New Forth Bridge.

The most interesting structure at present in progress, says Engineering, is the Forth Bridge, the largest ever undertaken. It will consist of two spans of 1,700 feet, two of 675 feet, fourteen of 168 feet, and six of 50, with a clear headway for navigation of 150 feet above high water of spring tides. The two large spans are cantilevers, each 675 feet, with a central girder 350 feet long, the depth of the cantilevers being 350 feet at the piers and 50 feet in the centre. To hold aloft and to maintain the immense weight of steel of which the cantilevers and girder will be composed, piers will be required of corresponding magnitude. The central pier, on the island of Inchgarvie, will consist of four cylindrical masses of concrete and masonry, 45 feet in diameter at the top and 70 feet at the bottom. They will be founded on rock at a depth below high water varying from 24 to 70 feet, and will be carried up to 18 feet above high water. The length of the bridge will be more than a mile, and of the viaduct approaches 2,754 feet.

The contract has been let for £1,600,000. Considerable progress has been made with the masonry, about 17,000 cubic feet of granite masonry having been set, and the number of men employed will soon reach 800.

As it is intended to manufacture the steel superstructure of the bridge on the spot, very extensive works, lighted by electric lamps, have been constructed at Queensferry, and the plant provided includes about fifty steam engines of various classes, and a large number of specially designed hydraulic tools, drilling machines and other tools for dealing with the 45,000 tons of steel which will be used in the bridge. The manufacture of the superstructure of the bridge will soon be commenced. All the important members subject to compression will be of a tubular form, as will have been gathered by those who read the paper on the subject read at Southampton in 1882, by Mr. Baker.

About three miles of steel tubes, ranging from 12 feet to 5 feet in diameter, and 1¼ inches to ½ an inch in thickness, will be required. Plant, including gas and other furnaces, have been provided for this purpose. The steel plates are heated in gas furnaces, and stamped to a desired curvature in a 2,000 ton hydraulic press; the edges planned and the plates temporarily clamped together to form a tube about 400 feet in length. Travelling drilling machines will then traverse the tube and drill all the holes required to rivet the plate together, but this riveting will not be done until the bridge is erecting, plate by plate, across the Forth. All the machinery required to begin the manufacture of the tubes in the new works has been designed by Mr. Arrol, one of the contractors.

Furstenfield, in Germany, boasts of the oldest tree in the country. It is a huge linden, believed to be one thousand years old, and growing at the back of the village church, in the midst of the tombs of two centuries. Its trunk is fully fifteen feet in diameter, and its twisted branches stretch out far and wide, seemingly covering the entire enclosure. It is still growing.

He has no driver, is as regular as clock-work, and never fails to go exactly the right number of times. If too big a load is put on the cart, he rears and plunges until part of it has been removed.

The excitement at revival meetings goes on. Fenton Williams, a young convert, at a revival in New Haven, Ind., became so much excited at the praying and speaking that he jumped upon his chair, and, drawgain a pistol from his pocket, held his left hand aloft and put four bullets through it it before he could be disarmed. He afterward said he had no idea where he was or what he was doing at the time.

Sir Joseph Frayer, who has been making extensive researches into the nature of snake poison, says in the Lancet: —"The result of my experience is, that, so far, no physiological antidote to snake virus is known, and that when the full effect on the respiratory centres is produced, remedies are of little, if any, avail, albeit when the poison has entered in smaller quantities, treatment may be of service on general principles."

The absence of all surgical attendants in the field does not add to the satisfaction of service in the Chinese army. The theory advanced to explain this brutality is not so much a callous indifference to human life as a superstition, akin to that of "the peculiar people," who refuse all medical advice to their children. The man who gets a bad wound is regarded as one whom the gods mean to die. For a like cause the Chinese are reluctant to rescue the drowning.

The number of deaths from anæsthetics in England in 1883 was but 13. Of these 11 died from chloroform, and one each from chloroform and ether mixed and nitro oxide. Dr. Jacobs remarks that the deaths from nitro oxide are now so rare that physicians have almost begun to look on it as without danger. In the case of death from it above mentioned, the patient died from syncope, as is usual in deaths from chloroform.

Considerable excitement has been aroused in the Jewish communities of South Russia by the appearance at Kischineff of an energetic reformer named Joseph Rabinovich. He declared Christ to be the real Messiah, supporting his theories by numerous citations from the Bible and the Prophets. Rabinovich is an enthusiastic and eloquent preacher, and is winning numerous proselytes. He is anathematized generally by the Jewish press.

The drink statistics of Belgium have a certain amount of interest. The population of the kingdom, now amounting to about 5,500,000, consumes annually alcoholic liquors to the amount of 48,000,000. which is 66 per cent. more than thirty years ago, the number of insane has increased by 104 per cent., of suicides 80 per cent., and of condemned criminals by 135 per cent. In 1850 the number of places where alcoholic liquors were retailed was 53,000; it is now 130,000.

According to the British Medical Journal, the female medical students of St. Petersburg have been compelled to reside In a large boarding establishment provided by the authorities, instead of being free, as heretofore, to lived where they pleased. They are required to be home before 9 o'clock every evening, and are charged ten roubles per month for board and lodgings. Princess Shakafhoy is the present resident superintendent. The change was made through fear of Nihilistic plots.

The war game (kriegs spiel), which is played on a large board with corresponding figures, has been most industriously played in Germany during the last few months by the officers of the War Academy and the general staff. The commanders give the general idea, and choose from the corps of officers those who are to lead the opposing armies These officers choose others, and make their dispositions as if in actual war. Prince William, now commander of a battalion of the First Guard Regiment at Potsdam, is an enthusiastic player in the war game, and never fails to appear on the evenings appointed.

In October last two respectable English physicians performed the operation of inserting a tube into the trachea of a child as the last resort in a case diagnosed as croup. The tube becoming obstructed, the father sucked out the occluding membrane, but the child died two days afterward. The father was attacked by diphtheria from which he recovered, when he brought suits against the doctors, one for manslaughter and the other for damages. He was unsuccessful in both of these, but was much pleased to know that, in their defense. the doctors had incurred an expense of $5.000. But the profession, headed by Sir William Jenner, took the matter in hand, and each of the doctors has been lately presented with $500, a silver salver, and a complimentary address "richly illuminated."

Considering the terrible havoc made on the French language in the colonies, the creation of a society for the propagation of the French language there is a measure urgently demanded. The peculiarities of speech current in Algeria, on the Senegal, and in the Antilles are set forth in a recent article in the Revue Scientifique, by General Faidherbe, who has long studied the languages of the natives in the French colonies. In Algeria, for instance, they speak a language composed of all the African and Asiatic idioms, interspersed with a little flavor of French. In Cochin China, and on the Senegal the natives generally keep up their own language, making only a lame attempt at speaking French when coming in contact with Government officials. Some select few have studied French, and speak it correctly.

In 1880 the population of Cochin China, amounted to about one million and a half. Of these only 1,825 were French, 1,366,139 were Annamites, and 58.509 Chinese. A book lately published in Paris by Messrs. Bouinais (twelve years a Government official in Cochin China,) and Paulus gives a very favorable accounts of the Annamites. They are gentle, docile, and sober by habit, although the rich have a tendency to indulge in opium and brandy. They are very sensible, eminently endowed with the imitative faculty, rapidly familiarize themselves with the habits of civilized life, and are greedy of instruction. The French have established a regular system of communal schools. The authors attribute most of the weak points of the Annamites to the brutality with which they have been governed. Their chief defects are a lack of perseverance and of gratitude. France has only had this colony for about twenty years.

The oldest town in Texas, and, it is believed, in the United States, is Ysleta, situated on the Rio Grand, and near El Paso, the chief town in the county of that name. It has a population of 2,500 souls. The place is one of peculiar interest, alike from its age, its people, its architecture, its agriculture, and its general products. It is a well-established historical fact that a Spanish military explorer, named Corando, visited the town in 1540, and found it then a popular and prosperous civilized Indian community. Ysleta is believed to have been a considerable centre of population centuries before the visit of Corando. It is not a little curious, considering the advance of civilization from Europe, that the same race of people exist in the town to day that existed 350 years ago, and that they are engaged in the same agricultural and mechanical pursuits as their forefathers at that period and for ages preceding.

Some Curious Facts About Snakes.

Catharine C. Hopley, who has written a great deal about snakes and their habits, came to America from England last summer with the intention of obtaining, if possible, some new facts of snake life. She writes to Land and Water that one object of her ambition was to procure for one of the museums a mother snake with her brood refuged in her throat; but, though hitherto unsuccessful, she has reasonable hopes that a refuged family of little ophidians will be furnished to more than one of the national museums next summer, enthusiasts promising that no efforts shall be wanting to afford ocular proof of this maternal instinct. That it should still be doubted anywhere arouses the ire of many in America, she adds, who have for years been offering testimony as eye-witnesses. What is now desired is that observations should be extended to Africa, India, and Australia; because if the habit of a mother snake receiving her young into her throat for refuge should be confined to this continent only and to England, it is a remarkable feature in ophidian history for the most learned biologists to work out.

But, as regards Australia, some few cases are not wanting. A gentleman, who is a great traveller, an ardent sportsman, assured the writer that he had himself seen an alarmed black snake (probably Pseudechis porohyriacus) open her mouth and thus receive her young. On shooting her, the young ones escaped from the mouth again.

A gentleman who writes in the American Field, under the name of "Snipe," described "a dark colored snake of about six feet long," opening its mouth and receiving its young. Watching for reed birds—the "Bob o' Link" of the Eastern States, and the "rice buntin" of the South—he was lying flat on the ground with his gun, in the latter part of August, when about ten feet off he saw the snake with her mouth wide open, and the young ones hurrying in as if eager to hide themselves. He watched her for some minutes, when his friend who was shooting with him came near and disturbed the snake, which then began to move off with her hidden snakelings, while a number of little brother and sister snakes, "not yet taken in" followed closely. "Snipe" then took aim and shot off its head, and on opening the snake found the young ones all alive, coiled in a ball near the throat; while further down were a bird and a meadow mouse, recently swallowed. He relates the incident in opposition to the hypothesis that snakes, being cannibals, might swallow their young for food, and describes this mother as patiently waiting with her mouth open, all action being confined to the eager young ones.

Uses of Cats.

That cats were ever designed for any useful end people have often expressed a doubt. It looks now, however, as if the cat had found its true position. They are being used by Paris milliners as ornaments for hats and head-dresses. Small stuffed kittens are the most fashionable trimmings for broad-brimmed hats. Thus far only one cat to a hat has been used, but as the raw material for this sort of trimming is unlimited the wealth of the wearer can only be represented by increasing the number of ornaments. —Detroit Free Press.

A Rich Pauper.

The St. Thomas Times says:—The afternoon a constable from Bismarck, P county, arrived at the Elgin House of dustry with a squalid individual Reed. He was wretchedly filthy, his ing consisting of rotten rags which hung his person in tatters. So dilapidated was clothing, in fact, that it could not be ed, and he admitted that he had worn garments incessantly for seven years out a change. His flesh was also in a state, the dirt being streaked with lines he had made in attempting to the itching sensation created by the which played hide and seek all over body. Reed was taken down stairs by managers of the insititution, Mr. Hoberger, and the surgeon, Dr. Lutton, and attendants proceeded to strip him. this was undertaken he was asked if he any money, and he replied that he enough to purchase a pair of boots, that all. As the work of divesting the his garments progressed, however, bags silver and gold, wallets filled with coin, old stockings and rags also rich in were brought to light. Some of these in his pocket, others sewed up in parts of his clothing, and a large them were strapped around his body. the treasure had all been placed table it was found to consist of a piece, which had been carried so long it begun to wear, two $10 gold pieces, gold pieces, and about $150 in silver dollars, quarters, and ten and five pieces. There were three $1 bills in the lection which were so fastened together filth that they had to be melted over before they could be separated. the coin was covered with mould. The of the silver was in ten-cent pieces, being enough of this denomination to fill ordinary dinner-pail. The total value of hoard was $220. Reed watched the search proceed with their work without utterin word. Neither did he condescend to explain how he had come by the money, but the mise is that he acquired it by begging. was thoroughly cleaned and provided a change of linen, and this morning Hunsberger deposited the money found the beggar in a city bank.

The money was deposited with Mr. Suffel, manager of the North-West Society. Two of the $1 bills found on were Bank of Commerce issue of 1867. $1 bills have not been issued by this for many years, it is probable that the low had carried them ten or fifteen years

Curious Statistics.

Before the Agricultural Committee of Canadian Parliament the other day, a statement was read from Charles H. Ives formerly a deputy collector of customs Fort Gratiot under the United States ernment, regarding the method of making immigration returns by him during his of office of six years. The accuracy of figures supplied by the Washington thorities as showing the immigration Canadians into the United States also been questioned by the Dominion government, and the disclosures made by Irvine's statements have tracted considerable attention. He that no attempt is made to count the ber of immigrants arriving in the United States; that an average of six cars is ed for each incoming train, and that each car 60 passengers are allowed, making 360, half of whom are put down as immigrants. In making up his quarterly report he was instructed to estimate the number arriving each quarter at an increase of arrivals during the corresponding quarter the preceding year. On one occasion states, his reports were returned to him put more females and children in the report He never saw nor heard of an attempt to made to count passengers, and states the whole system of making up these returns reports was guess work. The attention the authorities at Washington will be to the matter.

The Importance of the Mechanic

Each ensuing day makes more promi the fact that we have come upon a when the mechanic is master. We crowded professions and ill-filled tra A chance to fill the position of a sub ant clerk in a crowded wholesale hou eagerly grasped at by a hundred appli though the wages received be scarcely than "a chance to learn the business." a master workman try to obtain an ap tice at three times the salary offered clerk, and his applicants will be poor in quantity and quality. A skilled man in any trade need never want for he is eagerly sought after by a hundred employers; he is independent of the condi of the market; the skill and cunning hand and eye are too valuable to loose, must be paid whether the products are ly or rapidly consumed. If business the master hand is eagerly seized by rival house, which knows and values product of his skill. He who would c down the obstacles to success in our days must have, as well as the wit to the orevice, the strength to deal the This is an age of the steam engine, and the engineer, not the conductor who is ter.

Cemetery Horrors.

The Panama Star and Herald, under heading of "How we breed pestilence," there are two native cemeteries; one quadrangular in shape, the walls being pierced with tierces of niches in which coffins are thrust and bricked up. Many of the fronts of the niches are in a dilapidated condition and the coffins are visible, and through them an effluvium flows which must be and is doubtedly is death dealing. In the openings are formed by the abutments thin interment walls; into these are thrown in a confused mass bodies and coffins without the semblance of respect for the dead the half-decomposed remains which have been withdrawn from the niches to make room for others. Behind this quadrangle are 60 or 70 coffins, some yet tenanted; in others the occupants have been heedlessly thrown, and form a frame work for rapidly growing vegetation. In the second cemetery (the Potters field) the sights are equally repulsive. Here people are indiscriminately interred, in the majority of instances without coffins.

REKHA.

BY FREDERICK BEDFORD.

The day was hot and oppressive; scarcely a breath of air stirred the surface of the water. Maharati boatmen bent themselves to the oar but lazily, and drawled out their simple boat song, without which they vowed they could not row at all. Even the ebbing tide could not help them much against the strong tide, and Elephanta still lay a good four miles ahead. The day, though hot, was beautiful, and the passengers were disposed to take things easily, just deeming it wise to remain on the water contentedly so to be in haste to reach the land for what air was stirring they had the benefit of.

It was a beautiful sight they saw from under the awning over the stern. Away to their right lay the broad Indian Ocean, stretching away to the blue sky. Behind them that city of temples and bazaars, that looks like a city of magic to the new comer as he sees it for the first time from the deck of his ship at daybreak—Bombay. Bombay, with its domes and minarets rising in the clear, soft air of that eternal summer land. On their left the Ghauts arose on high, a landmark to the mariner, while ahead of them lay the wonderful island of Elephanta. No one who has visited its cave-temples—rock-cut, magnificent temples hewn in the solid rock—can deny its claim to the name of Wonderful.

"Pawni ai-i-ah!"

"For Heaven's sake, do stop that noise!" exclaimed one of the passengers, impatiently, rising to his feet.

He was about twenty-five years of age, and dressed in the uniform of Her Majesty's second regiment of foot, called the "Queen's."

"Tonno, admi, Tanno-o!"

"Rama, do have some mercy upon me! Remember my nerves."

"No sing, no can row, sahib."

"Then if that is the case, let me row."

"Oh, Harry," cried a girlish voice from under the awning, "you surely don't mean to row under this broiling sun. Please don't, Harry!"

"And why not, Gracie?"

"Remember you have not fully recovered from your recent illness. It is not safe for you to attempt it."

"Miss Marvin is right; it is not safe, it is not wise," remarked the only other occupant of the boat beside the rowers, a tall, finely formed Hindu maiden.

Thick, heavy braids of ebon hair coiled around a well-shaped head, firmly set upon neck, yet not masculine shoulders, from which a fancy colored silk robe fell in graceful folds over a most voluptuous figure. Calm, dashing eyes lighted up a face of more than usual intelligence, and seemed to denote a more than common clearness of mental vision in their possessor. Who that has seen them does not admire those pearly teeth which every Hindu maiden has? And what lady might not well be proud of such shapely hands, such tiny feet? If a dusky skin come under our standard of beauty, then what a beauty she was!

This is no fanciful picture. Many a time have I seen and admired the mental and physical beauties of Rekha, and India can boast of thousands of such women as she.

"Yes," she said, "Miss Marvin is right. Had you had a sunstroke," she added, lowering her eyes and speaking in Hindustani, "not all my nursing could save you."

"And your nursing can do wonders, Rekha: it has brought me back from the grave once. I owe my life to your untiring kindness and skill. The 'Gentle Poetess of the Flowers,' as your friends call you, is by no means an indifferent doctor. Rekha, can I thank you."

"You have given me too much thanks already, Lieut. Somers."

"Lieut. Somers! You never used to call me by that name, Rekha. Once I was Harry to you."

"I have no right to call you Harry. But let us not speak of that now. See, the mail steamer is leaving. Look at the people on the 'Apollo Bunder.'"

"Never mind the steamer, Rekha. I want to talk about something else. I have waited an opportunity to tell Gracie all you have done for me; when I do she will love you as a sister—won't you, Gracie?"

"Won't I what, Harry? You forget I have only been in India one week, and I cannot be expected to speak the language already. I haven't understood a word you may have been saying."

"I will tell you, Gracie—"

"No, no! Why bore Miss Marvin with it? It would not interest her."

"Not interest her to know that I owe my life to your kindness?" said Harry, lapsing into Hindustani again.

He had become so used to speaking the language during his stay under the roof of Rekha's home that it came from his lips as naturally as his mother tongue.

"There you go again," said Gracie. "Well, I shall go to sleep." And she settled herself among the cushions for a nap.

"If I was of service to you am I not amply rewarded?"

"In what way? Tell me, why did you save me back to life, Rekha?"

She looked at him for an instant, and then cast her eyes upon the fair, and almost childish face of Gracie.

"For her sake!" she said in a voice of sadness and not untinged with bitterness.

"Ah, Rekha, what happiness is in store for me! Dear Gracie! Is she not pretty!" he went on, with all a lover's blindness.

He could not see that his words cut like knives into her heart. He could not see that dusky skin grow pale.

"Yes," she answered, stifling her emotion, "she is very pretty."

"And she loves me."

"And you love her!"

The words came with a strange eagerness from between those pearly teeth.

"Love her! Who can doubt it? I would give my life for her!"

This he said in English.

"Of whom are you speaking, Harry? For would you give your life? I think such talk merely a lover's rhapsody—extravagance! No one would really give one's life for the happiness of another, though possibly to save another's life," remarked Gracie.

"I would give my life willingly to make happy one I loved," said Rekha.

"You Hindus are such strange people! You do not seem to value life at all. If you were to live in London or Paris one season, Rekha, you would not be so ready to die. Would she, Harry?"

"I am not anxious to die, but to me love is more than life. You," said Rekha, looking earnestly at Gracie, "have never known the pangs of unrequited love, and do not know how blank, how useless life is under such circumstances. If you did—ah, if you did!—you would think as I do, that life is nothing without happiness in love."

"But why do you talk this way, Rekha?" said Harry. "Surely you have not suffered from such a cause?"

"What should I know of love? I was thinking yesterday how terrible a thing it was to love and know your love is not returned. Imagine, it you can," she went on, turning to Gracie, "loving as you do, what exquisite agony you would suffer to sit by and see your lover in every action lay his heart at your rival's feet, and know that his love for her has so completely filled his heart and life that he would have no room to think of you! Picture to yourself his face all wreathed in smiles at her approach and fall dejected at her departure. And then to crown all, be sure of the fact that she was incapable of appreciating his love. Would you give your life for hers that he might be happy?"

"Good gracious, no!"

"If you loved as I love you would," she murmured to herself.

"How strangely you are talking to day, Rekha!" said Harry.

"Oh, don't mind me," said Rekha, smiling. "It must be the effects of so much reading lately."

Harry Somers looked at her long and thoughtfully. She lay back in her seat and gently fanned herself with a palm-leaf, and keeping time with her small foot to the low, monotonous chant of the boat's crew.

"She is indeed a handsome girl," he thought. "I wonder if she does—but no. It would be foolish to think such a thing. But there is something wrong. The Rigbeda which she has been reading lately is not accountable for all this. Rekha," he said to her in her own language, "do you believe I am your friend?"

She looked at him but gave no answer.

"You may believe it, Rekha; and if ever you need one, give me the opportunity to prove myself that one."

"You are kind, Harry, and if at any time you can be of service to me, I will ask your aid."

"But is there not something on your mind at present that had better be confided to a friend? I am sure there is. Won't you tell me, Rekha?"

"Tell you!"

She half started from her seat, then fell back and buried her face in her hands.

"You do not know what you ask."

"I know you need a confidant."

"It cannot be you."

"I am sure Gracie loves you as a sister for your kindness to me; let her help you."

"Impossible!"

"And why?"

"Oh, Harry, I can't tell you. How can you understand a woman's troubles?"

"Rekha, I know more of the world than you do, and things that appear to you almost insurmountable difficulties would scarcely be difficulties at all to me. If it is an affair of business, or anything of that nature, confide in me. If it is an affair of the heart—"

He paused suddenly as he noticed the warm blood mantle her cheek and brow.

"It is an affair of the heart," he thought.

Before either could speak again the boat touched the beach of Elephanta, and Gracie sprang lightly out, and ran along the path to the keeper's house. Harry assisted Rekha out of the boat and followed in silence.

It is not necessary to describe the wonderful cave temples of this celebrated island; that is the province of travellers. It has, in fact, been described so many times by others so much better than my pen is capable of doing, that I will not attempt it.

Our party wandered through the pillared halls, past figures of such strange, uncouth shapes they could only be devised by brains distorted with madness or nightmare, each with different feelings in regard to what they saw. Harry had visited the caves times before, and now he looked upon them with a certain amount of indifference.

Not so with Gracie. For the first time in her life she looked upon these wonders of a past age of which she had read and had longed to see. Now she was among them they filled her with delight and wonder, not unmixed with awe.

And Rekha? Who shall describe her feelings of awe and reverence as she stood before the awful face of the Vishnu. Although a Christian, she had too long worshipped the gods of her race to look upon them at once as mere images of stone.

Beautiful Elephanta, where is gathered all that is loveliest of the treasures of Flora! Mighty trees that reared their umbrageous heads on high, their giant trunks embraced by twining vines at once beautiful and deadly. Feathery palms of every species, rising in the distance like dark lines against the blue sky. Flowers of wondrous beauty and scent the fragrant goddess had scattered with a lavish profusion. But thorns grew on every rose-tree, and they saw there, gliding away at their approach, the snake whose bite is fatal.

Gracie gave a little scream of terror as it disappeared in the long grass, and clung closely to her lover.

"Oh, why," she exclaimed, "are there such venomous things on this lovely island?"

"There can be no paradise without its serpent this side of the grace," said Rekha, sadly.

After a while they took their luncheon under the ample shade of a banyan tree on the hill-side, and watched the boats in the harbor.

"I can see your home, Rekha," said Gracie, pointing her finger in the direction of Parel.

"Yes, I see it too. Ah, what a spot above all others is one's home! Beneath that roof are gathered all who love me. Yes, I am sure of their love. Why should I wish to leave it to go elsewhere?"

"See how far I am away from home, Rekha. I may never see it again."

"You will see it, Gracie; you will be happy—so happy!"

Her voice was very tender and very sad as she said this.

"I am sure I shall, Rekha," said Gracie, looking with eyes of affection toward Harry, who had strolled some distance away to smoke his Manilla. "And you will be happy too when you are married."

"I happy! I married!"

"Oh, Rekha, how you startle me! And why not, dear?"

"We will not talk of that, Gracie."

"I will leave you two ladies to your own resources for a few minutes while I go and prepare the boat for our return," said Harry, and walked toward the beach.

Beautiful paroquets, brilliant buprestidans hummed among the foliage, and lizards of every hue darted through the undergrowth. The afternoon was sinking behind the hills, bathing the spires and domes of the distant temples in Bombay with a flood of light. The air was filled with the perfume of tropical flowers.

Conversation between the two girls seemed to drag after Harry left them, and Gracie, finally yielding to a drowsy feeling induced by the warmth, the flowers and hum of insects, fell into a doze. Her fair face encircled by golden curls lay in one small white hand, while the other held a bouquet of orange-blossoms which Harry had gathered for her.

"It is no wonder he loves her," Rekha murmured, "she is so beautiful, so like an angel—so different to myself. Look at my tawny skin and then at that face with lilies and roses mixed. But is face all? Ah, yes! face is all. Or, if not all, mind is but a secondary consideration."

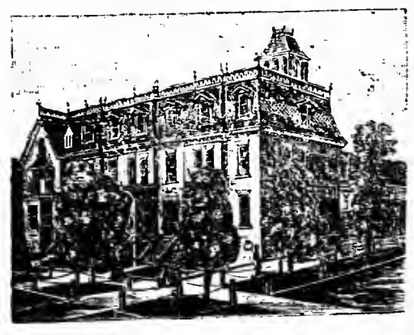
She leaned her head upon her hand and thought long and earnestly.

"Oh, why did I ever become a Christian?" she suddenly exclaimed. "If I had remained a Brahmin I could have been reconciled to my fate. But this is more than I can bear! If I could but die!"

She threw herself upon the grass and wept floods of bitter tears. The light upon the temples became more red as the sun sank lower behind the hills. The birds sought the sunlight in the glens on the other side; but the insects still remained and seemed to hum louder than ever.

Gracie moved restlessly in her sleep, and Rekha, drying her eyes, looked up. At first her glance rested upon the fair, upturned face, then went into the high grass beyond.

What was it she saw that held her gaze so fixedly? Her cheek blanched with horror as she recognized in that small coil so close to Gracie's head the vicious and deadly black snake. It was evidently unaware of the presence of the two girls. What terrible danger Gracie was in! Should she but move the snake would bite. What a fearful fate! What then? She would be dead, Harry free! Her heart gave a sudden leap. Had fate so willed? Was Gracie to die and leave Harry to her? Was a belief in fate a part of the Christian religion? No. It could not be. "He loves her," she said. How should she rescue Gracie? That was her next thought. To move would be to alarm the snake.



Just then a footstep aroused the reptile from its slumbers. With a hiss it lifted up its head and saw the sleeping girl. It drew back and coiled itself for a spring. Another instant and Gracie would have been lost to her lover, but another, who had no love to live for—only a love to die for—saved her from death. Rekha, seeing the intention of the serpent threw herself with a cry of farewell to her love between it and its victim. Instantly its deadly fangs closed in her arm, then it released its hold and glided away. Harry was just returning for the two girls, and saw the heroic act of Rekha. The same moment he was on his knees by her side, and with such means as were in his power tried to stop the course of the poison. But all was of no avail. Poor Rekha died in agony, but happy to die in the arms of the man she loved, happy to have given her life for his happiness.

Gracie speaks of her to her children, teaches them to love the memory of the Hindu woman who had given her life to save their mother; but she does not know, never will know, how great an act was Rekha's. Harry will never tell her that.

Every competitor must send fifty cents in Post-office order, scrip or small coin, (no postage stamps), for which the Ladies' Journal will be sent for one year to any desired address. Post-office orders are procurable at any post-office, and are an absolutely safe way of remitting. Letters should be registered unless remittance is made by post-office order.

Since the above was written, we notice that in addition to the costly rewards offered above, the sender of the middle correct answer of the whole competition from first to last, and the twenty persons next following who send correct answers—will receive the following rewards, respectively:—

MIDDLE REWARDS.

1.	One Wanzer Sewing Machine, $60 ...	$60 00
2 to 7	Six Hunting Case Solid Nickel Watches, valued $15 each	90 00
8 to 15	Eight Open Face Extra Heavy Crystal Solid Nickel Watches, $12 each.....	96 00
16 to 21	Six Well-Bound Volumes of Tennyson's Poems, $2.25	13 50

Then even the last ones are to be remembered in a long list of consolation rewards. These rewards will be given to the last seventy-seven persons who send correct answers to the Bible questions given above.

THE CONSOLATION REWARDS.

1.	To the last correct answer received, One Elegant Silver Tea Service of six pieces, latest design.....	$100 00
2.	One Gentleman's Beautiful Solid Gold Hunting Case Genuine Waltham Movement, cases finely engraved	97 00
3.	One Lady's Solid Gold Hunting Case Watch, Genuine American	80 00
4 to 10	Seven Fine Solid Coin Silver Hunting Case Watches, value $20 each.....	140 00
11 to 16	Six Hunting Case Solid Nickel Silver Watches, $15 each	90 00
17 to 24	Eight Solid Aluminum Gold Hunting Case Watches, value $14 each	112 00
25 to 30	Six Open Face Solid Nickel Watches, Heavy Crystal, value $12 each	72 00

56 to 77	Twenty-two Solid Triple Silver-Plated Butter Knives, value $1 each.....	22 00

Each competitor must, in every case, send fifty cents for one year's subscription to the Ladies' Journal with their answers. It may be of some advantage to you if you mention where you first saw this notice. The letters must all be post-marked where mailed not latter than April 21st, the closing day of this competition. The correct address is Editor Ladies' Journal, Toronto, Canada. The names and post-office addresses (and street and number, when in the city), of those who are successful in obtaining these rewards, will be given in the May number of the Journal. Our readers may be assured that all the rewards, as given above, will be promptly and cheerfully handed over to the successful ones, as soon as possible after the close of the competition. We know the publisher of the Ladies' Journal, and we are certain he will do as stated above, or we would not give all this space to this long description of this plan. The Ladies' Journal is a 20 page Monthly Fashion and Domestic Magazine. Two full pages of newest music are given in each issue; large illustrations of the latest things in fashion circles; one or two serial stories and a short story; domestic and household hints; besides a large quantity of miscellaneous reading, particularly to interest ladies. In short, it is the cheapest publication, and the best for the money we know of. So if you don't succeed in obtaining a reward, you cannot fail to be pleased with your fifty cent investment.

Don't forget that the regular annual subscription to the Ladies' Journal is fifty cents. So you pay nothing additional for the privilege of competing for these costly rewards.

A STARTLING DISCOVERY.

Physicians are often startled by remarkable discoveries. The fact that Dr. King's New Discovery for Consumption and all Throat and Lung diseases is daily curing patients that they have given up to die, is startling them to realize their sense of duty, and examine into the merits of this wonderful discovery; resulting in hundreds of our best Physicians using it in their practice Trial bottles free at A. When I have a cold in my head," said a gentleman apologetically; "I am always stupid." "I have never seen him when he hadn't just such a cold," whispered a third party in an undertone.

CRUELLY MURDERED.

In the Province of Ontario every year thousands are being slowly murdered by taking unsuitable, untried nostrums for such complaints as Costiveness, Indigestion Liver Complaint, Kidney Troubles, etc., who might easily regain lost strength and energy by using McGregor's Speedy Cure. To convince them that such is the case we will give them a free trial bottle at Hill Bro's Price 50c. and $1. See testimonials from persons in your own town. F. & M.

The second reading of the Orange bill has been defeated in the House of Commons by a vote of 68 yeas to 105 nays a majority of 37 against the bill.

James Brayley, Hamilton, says: "I read the testimonials for McGregor's Speedy Cure and found that I had not to go to New York, Philadelphia, Louisiana or Texas to find living witnesses of its value, we have plenty of persons right here to prove its merits I got a bottle and it helped me right away. I was as bad with Bilious Fever and Indigestion as I think any one could be, I have taken three bottles and am nearly well and can eat any kind of food without it hurting me. I may say that I am better than ever I expected to be. Free trial bottles at Hill Bro's F. & M.

A naughty boy said to his mother: "You see, ma, you're always telling me to behave as well to the family as I do to company, but why don't you behave the same to me as you do to company, and ask me to have another piece of pie?"

WEATHER PROBABILITIES.

Foretelling the weather is uncertain at the best, but it is certain if you catch cold in this changeable climate you can best break its ill effects with Hagyard's Pectoral Balsam, the most reliable and pleasant remedy for coughs, colds, colds, bronchial and lung complaints. It is so agreeable that even a child will take it.

IT SHOULD BE INVESTIGATED.

If any of our readers are suffering from chronic disease of the stomach, liver, kidneys, or blood, they should investigate the merits of Burdock Blood Bitters. It is making some of the most remarkable cures on record.

A Wise Spider.—An exchange has it that a superstitious subscriber who found a spider in a copy of his paper wants to know if it can be considered a bad omen. Of course not. The spider was merely looking over the columns of the paper to see what merchant was not advertising, so that it could spin its web across the store door and not be disturbed.

Our Patrons who wish to subscribe, or renew their subscaiption for any of the following publications will do us a favor by handing the amount in to us at the Standard office, viz. Weekly Mail, or Globe, Family Herald and Weekly Star, monthly Farmers Advocate, American Agriculturist, any of the above with the Standard for $2.00 or singly for one $1, except the Agriculturist which is $1.50.

The Putnma County (N. Y.) Standard says:—"An enormous hog, bought by a Watertown butcher a few days since, measured eight feet in length, seven feet round the body, stands three feet four inches high, is two years and nine months old, and pails the scales down at the enormous weight of 1,750 pounds. It was raised by My. Joseph Schnell, near Rossiere."

PIMPLES AND BLOTCHES.

Call at Hill Bros. general store and get a package of McGregor & Parke's Carbolic Cerate. It is composed of Vaseline, Carbolic Acid and Cerate, and has never failed to remove Pimples, Blotches, Ulcerated Sores Rough Skin. It cures when all others fail. Try it.

Orange Insurance Society.—The special committee appointed at the recent session of the Orange Grand Lodge of Ontario West to revise the constitution of the Orange Insurance Society of Ontario West met in the Yonge street hall, Toronto. There were present:—Grand Master White, St. Mary's; Past Grand Master Major Bennett; E. F. Clarke, Grand Treasurer; R. Birmingham, Grand Secretary; T. McEvoy, County Master, Ontario; James L. Hughes and J. Keyes, St. Catharines. The work was completed at a late hour last Friday night. It was decided to appoint special agents throughout the country.

MERIT PROVEN.

Dollar upon dollar is frequently spent on the faith of recommendations for articles entirely worthless. Not so with McGregor's Speedy Cure; you are not asked to purchase it until its merits are proven. Call at Hill Bro's and get a free trial bottle, and if not convinced it will cure you of the worst forms of Dyspepsia, Complaint, etc., no matter of how long standing, it costs you nothing. Sold in 50c. and $1 bottles. See testimonials from persons in your own town. F. & M.

There was a man in our town and he was wondrous wise, for when he marked his prices down he then did advertise. And when he saw his trade increase, with all his might and main he marked still every price and advertised again. And when he advertised again his rivals loudly swore, to see folks rush with might and main to patronize his store. And while they sat in solitude and saw him custom win, the man behind his counter stood and raked the shekels in. And while he raked the shekels in and saw his fortune rising, he took a goodly lot of tin and kept on advertising. Each day a generous sum he'd sink, and demonstrate full plain, the more one pays for printer's ink the greater is his gain.

WHAT IS LARDINE.

Ask any farmer, thresher or saw mill man, or in fact any man who runs machinery of any kind and he will tell you that it is the only machine Oil which will wear equal to Castor Oil, and won't gum or clog your machinery, For sale at Haskett Bro's, Markdale. 176-215

Looking into Heaven.

Reading, March 24.—Sallie Himmelreich, aged 18, was thrown into a trance at a revival on Friday evening, and remains in that condition of religious exaltation, during which she describes the beauties of heaven. The girl heretofore possessed little knowledge of the bible, but now converses intelligently on any chapter in the book.

A QUESTION TO THE POINT.

Reader, have you a languid, weak and tired feeling, with nervous exhaustion, especially in the early spring? Then your liver is inactive and circulation poor. Arouse the torpid liver, cleanse the sluggish blood and regulate the secretions with that purifying tonic, Burdock Blood Bitters.

NAMES, FACTS AND FIGURES.

Will be cheerfully given by the proprietors of Burdock Blood Bitters, regarding the many certificates of wonderful cures made by that medicine in chronic diseases of the blood, liver and kidneys, revealing proof that is beyond the possibility of dispute by the most incredulous.

PRINCE LEOPOLD DEAD.

The Queen's Youngest And Most Studious Son.

WHO WISHED TO BE APPOINTED GOVERNOR-GENERAL OF CANADA.

LONDON, March 28.—Prince Leopold, the youngest son of Queen Victoria, died suddenly at Cannes this morning.

The Queen is profoundly affected by the death of the prince, who died in a fit as he was starting for Darmstadt to attend the wedding of his niece, Princess Victoria of Hesse. The residence of the Prince of Wales is besieged by people calling to express condolence.

The body of the Duke of Albany will be embalmed and brought to England the end of next week to be buried at Frogmore. The cause of the Duke's death was effusion of blood into the stomach and lungs. There were no unusual premonitions, but the symptoms have long been threatening. The Queen, receiving the ex-Empress Eugenie, clasped her in her arms and was evidently much consoled by her sympathy. Telegrams of condolence are arriving from all parts of the world.

When the Queen first heard of the Duke's death, she was seized with a paroxysm of weaping. The Duke fell on the steps of the clubhouse at 6,30 on Thursday evening. He was well enough afterwards to write a dispatch to the Duchess, stating that he had fallen, and possibly would not be able to leave for England to-day. The Duke struck on his head when he fell. The escort will start with the body on Tuesday morning.

OTTAWA, March 28.—In consequence of the death of H. R. H. the Duke of Albany, the afternoon party and dinner at Government House on Saturday, March 29, for which invitations have been issued, will not take place.

The Union Jack floated at half-mast from the parliament buildings and other public places in the city after the news was heard here to-day.

GUELPH, March 28.—The flags were flying at half-mast from the city hall and the public and private buildings as a mark of respect to the memory of the late Prince Leopold.

[Prince Leopold was born April 7, 1853, and was married March 13, 1879, to Princess Louise of Prussia. He was of a quiet and studious disposition, and of an artistical turn of mind, taking a great deal of interest in scientific matters. His health has never been good, and his death will be a matter of surprise to few. Just before the appointment of Lord Lansdowne as Governor-General of Canada it was rumored that Prince Leopold would be appointed to the position. This statement, of course, excited much interest. Investigation showed that the Prince had himself suggested that he be appointed to the position, but the proposition was not favorably received by the British Government which replied in a courteous manner giving reasons for refusal.]

She looked at me in a frightened irresolute way, and then she formed with her lips rather than spoke the words.

"Yes—rather cold—now."

"Wouldn't you be more comfortable in one of the rooms up-stairs while the fogs last?" I insinuated shyly.

But I saw that her breath was beginning to come fast, and the faint pink to tinge her cheeks as it did when she was excited.

"Did any one tell you to say that to me?" she asked low in a whisper.

"I told Mr. Rayner, when I wrote, that we had a slight fog here on Tuesday night, and this morning I had a letter saying that he thought it was bad for you to sleep on the ground-floor when the mists had begun to rise high, and that he had told Sarah to prepare the large front spare-room for you."

Instead of looking grateful for this proof of her husband's thoughtfulness, she became agitated, and at last her agitation grew almost uncontrollable; she trembled and clung to the bars inside the window, and I saw that her forehead was wet with the effect of some strong emotion—it looked like fear.

"At last—at last! I have been here too long," she gasped.

I thought that the effect on her nervous temperament of making her leave the room against her will would outweigh any physical good the change might do her. The wild look was coming into her eyes which I had seen there twice before, and I was afraid of her being seized with a paroxysm while I stood there on the other side of the barred window, powerless to help her; so I said gently—

"Of course Mr. Rayner would not wish you to go if you did not wish it."

But she shook her head, and, putting her face between the bars to be closer to me, she said, in a low broken voice—

"Do you know what his wishes mean when Sarah carries them out?"

I stood looking at her, appalled. Her terror was so real that it infected me, and for the moment I almost shared the poor lady's mad belief that there was a conspiracy against her. But her next words restored me to my senses.

"Are you against me too?" she asked piteously. "I always thought you were; but then you were kind to my child—and I don't know, I don't know whom to trust!"

"You may trust me, dear Mrs. Rayner, indeed," said I earnestly. "I would not have suggested your leaving your room if I thought it would cause you so much pain, but I did not know you were so much attached to it."

She shuddered. There was a pause, during which she stared at me sternly and searchingly. But I had no cause to fear her penetrating eyes, so I returned her gaze, and she grew gradually calmer.

"Miss Christie," said she at last, in a whisper, "you have influence in this house. Last night when Haidee was ill you made Sarah obey you. If I may trust you, give me this proof—let me one day's respite. Let me stay in my own room till—to-morrow."

Her voice sank till I could hardly catch the last words.

"I will try," said I softly. "And, oh, Mrs. Rayner, shall I tell Sam to take the dead leaves away in a wheelbarrow? I am sure it can't be wholesome to have them so close to your window."

"No, no, leave them—never mind," said she hurriedly. "You must be in the water. You will catch cold. Go—Heaven bless you!"

She shut down the window in a frightened way, and disappeared into the room. I could not see in, for the window-sill was some eight or ten inches above my head. I turned and splashed my way back, with my teeth chattering, to the house, and changed my wet shoes and stockings, half crying for pity for the poor, helpless, forlorn lady for whom I could do so little.

At tea time she came into the dining-room, and, as Sarah was there, I practised the innocent deception of pretending not to have seen her before that day. I thought it better that the lynx-eyed guardian should not discover that I had found a way of communicating privately with her unlucky charge. So I said again at tea-time that I had had a letter from Mr. Rayner, and that he thought that on Saturday she had better move into spare room.

"Saturday!" interrupted Sarah sharply.

"Yes," said I, rather frightened at telling such a story. "Do you think you would like to go to-morrow, or would you rather go to-night, Mrs. Rayner?" I asked gently.

"To-morrow," said she, with a steady look which I took as an acknowledgment; and I turned to Sarah.

"I will answer for it to Mr. Rayner, if there has been any mistake," I said, as modestly as I could, for it was an awkward thing to have to give orders before the mistress of the house, however tottering her reason might be.

"Very well, miss," said Sarah, to my surprise.

For the second time my use of Mr. Rayner's name had acted like a charm; and I wondered how this woman, who had dared so much to cut me off from communication with Laurence, could camly submit to receive orders from me.

After tea, Mrs. Rayner in her turn surprised me by a warning which seemed to show keen observation. She came and stood by me at the fire-place while Sarah was clearing the table, and once, while the latter was for a moment out of the room, breathed softly into my ear, without turning her head,

"Take care—she hates you, and she is dangerous."

I glanced up quickly; but Sarah was already back in the room, and Mrs. Rayner's face was as impassive as ever.

I was so much used to living in fear of Sarah that the warning did not make any particular impression upon me, and I went to bed neither more nor less afraid of her machinations than usual.

I woke up in the night without being conscious of any cause for doing so. I had started at once into full wakefulness, and I saw that Haidee was sleeping quietly, and that the fire was still alight, but had burnt low: and I thought I would replenish it.

Then, as I raised myself on my elbow, I thought I heard a sound, too faint to be called a noise, outside the door. So I kept quite still and listened intently. I heard nothing for some time, then again a muffled noise as of something being shuffled softly from one stair to another, then again no sound. The turret staircase was uncarpeted; it had once being polished, but the beeswax had worn off long since and had not been renewed. I got out of bed softly, lighted my candle by putting a match to the dying fire to avoid the noise of striking it, crept to the door, and literally put my ear to the keyhole. And, after a few moments, I heard the same soft shuffling again. It might be Nap, Mr. Rayner's retriever, trying to find a stair softer than the rest to lie upon; yet they were surely too narrow for him to make the attempt.

Whoever or whatever it was seemed to be making it way down by very slow degrees, until it seemed that it must be about six or seven stairs from the top. I screwed up my courage and resolved to give the intruder, human or otherwise, a fright. All the locks were kept in good condition at the Alders, and there was not such a thing as a creaking door in the place. I turned the key without the least noise, then the handle, and flung open the door, stamping my foot and brandishing the candle. I heard Haidee scream; I had forgotten her.

My plan succeeded only too well. A figure which had been crouching on the stairs sprang up. It was Sarah.

Before I had time to do more than recognise the savage frightened face, her foot slipped, and, with a piercing cry, she fell backward down the stairs. The staircase had one turn. I, trembling at the door, saw her long thin hands clutching and struggling to save herself at the corner; but she had fallen, and I heard a heavy thud, and then a groan. She had fallen headlong to the bottom.

For one second I leaned against the wall unable to move; then, trembling so that I could scarcely find the top stair, I stepped forward to go down. But on the second stair my foot suddenly slipped, and, if I had not been going very slowly because of my agitation, I must have fallen. On the next stair I slipped again; on the next to that, putting out my foot very cautiously, I found a string fastened across.

With a sudden suspicion, I sat down without advancing farther, and slid my hand along the stair. It was slippery; so were the others. The turret staircase was dark even by day; if I had been running down-stairs at my usual pace, nothing could have saved me. It was a trap set by Sarah, if not for getting rid of me altogether, at least for seriously injuring me. She was greasing the stairs one by one when I had heard her; in her alarm at my sudden appearance, she had sprung up, her foot had slipped on the greasy plate below which she had been using, and she had fallen herself a victim to the trap she had laid for me. And, as the horrible truth broke upon me, I heard another groan and a murmur I could not distinguish.

Sick at heart, and for the moment almost as helpless as she, I crawled down the stairs, wondering and fearing what spectacle would meet my eyes at the bottom.

CHAPTER XXIII.

All the stairs below where Sarah had slipped were safe and in their usual state. At the bottom, an almost senseless heap, lay Sarah, with one arm twisted under her and her head in a pool of blood. She was moaning, with closed eyes, and did not know me when her eyes opened and she stared round her.

The noise of her fall had by this time brought out Jane from the distant nursery; and she ran for the cook, who was an older and more experienced woman, and who indeed proved useful in this emergency. It was past midnight; but, late as it was, I was obliged to send Jane into the village for Sam, to tell him to take one of the horses and ride as fast as he could to Beaconsburgh for the doctor. Meanwhile the cook declared her belief that one of Sarah's arms were broken, for she fainted when it was touched; and then, having discovered that the blood was flowing from a great gash at the back of her head, she bound it up as well as she could to stop the bleeding. Then I ran down-stairs for some brandy, which we put to her lips from to time, but in vain tried to make her swallow. And then we sat in the cold, in the dim light of a candle, both of us crouched on the floor, the cook supporting the wounded woman against her knee, I a little way behind, lest she should recover full consciousness and know me.

It was a ghastly thing to be sitting there with that horrid stain on the floor within a few feet, listening to the feeble moans of the wretched woman whom we hardly expected to live until help came, holding our breath when for a few moments the moaning ceased, I thinking of the awful retribution her malice had brought down on her, not daring to speak to tell her I forgave her, lest my voice should have some terrible effect upon her wandering mind. And so we sat shivering not with cold alone, until the front-door bell sounded through the silent house, and Jane, who had not dared to come up stairs again since she went to send off Sam, opened the door, and we heard the doctor's heavy tread on the stairs.

It was Doctor Lowe. He called first for more light. Jane brought a lamp, and he signed me to bid her to go away. After asking me whether I was hysterical, and hearing me answer "No," he told me to hold the lamp while he made his examination. He said afterwards that I had strong nerves; but nothing but fear of him kept me steady at my post, as, with averted head, I heard the sharp little cries the wounded woman gave two or three times. The cook had been right; the arm that lay under Sarah was broken; the Doctor could not tell yet whether her spine was not injured too. He cut off her long black hair and strapped up her head, which had received a gash which might affect the brain, he said; and he set and bandaged the broken arm. Then we brought a mattress, and very carefully lifted her on to it, carried her to her room, and put her on the bed.

"Who is going to sit up with her?" asked he.

"I will," said I, but added doubtfully, "if——"

"If what?" said the Doctor, turning upon me sharply.

I drew him a little apart and said—

"Doctor Lowe, do you think the sight of any one she disliked very much would be bad for her?"

He looked at me very keenly as he answered—

"No. She won't be able to recognize anybody; but I warn you she will be restless. How did the accident happen?"

"She fell down stairs."

"The staircase leads to your room, doesn't it? How came she to be there at this time of night? Why don't you tell me the truth, and save me the trouble of making stupid guesses?"

I told him the truth, and his only comment was—

"And don't you think the moral of that is that you should leave this place as soon as possible?"

"I shan't stay here long," said I, smiling, and thinking of Laurence.

"Oh, you think that young fellow at the Hall is going to marry you?"

"Yes."

"Well, I tell you frankly, I wouldn't take a wife from this house."

"But then you wouldn't take a wife from anywhere, Doctor Lowe. If you did, you would think more of the girl than of the place she came from, just as Laurence does."

"You have a sharp little tongue. I pity Laurence when he comes home late."

He asked after Haidee; but I could not let him see her, as the staircase was not yet ready; so, after giving me instructions about the treatment of Sarah, he left the house.

There was a fire already in her room, for she was by no means the ill-used creature she liked to think herself. I seated myself in a chair beside it, prepared to watch until morning, when the cook had promised to take my place. Before long the patient began to grow restless, as the Doctor had predicted; she turned her head from side to side, tried to raise her broken arm, which had been set and bandaged tightly down, muttering and moaning incoherently. Presently she was quite quiet, and I hoped she had gone to sleep. I think I must have dozed myself for a few minutes, when I was startled into full wakefulness by a low hoarse cry of "Jim."

She had managed to move her head so that her great black eyes, glittering now with fever, were fixed full upon me; and my heart beat fast, for I though she must know me. But she repeated, still staring at me—

"Jim!" Then she added in a whisper, "They are after you, Jim! It's about the cheque. You must be off to-night. Go to the old place. I'll put 'em off, and I'll let you know."

Then more mutterings and exclamations, and before long she began again to speak coherently—

"It's too risky, Jim. I'll do it, if you want me to; but it's putting yourself in danger as well as me. All right, I'll pass it."

Then she broke out passionately—

"It's an ill thing you're going to do, James Woodfall. What do you want of a lady for a wife? Her money's none so much, and, as for her pretty face, it's the face of a fool. I'm twice the woman to look at that she is, and I'm only twenty-five; and I've stuck to you through thick and thin. Why don't you marry me, Jim?"

And it flashed across me, as she went on addressing to me reproaches, coaxings, encouragement, and defiance, that she was living over again some long-past passages in her life—passages, I could not but gather, of a very questionable character. For it was plain that this Jim, or James Woodfall, who occupied all her thoughts, had been a very bad man indeed, and that Sarah had assisted him in everyway in his wicked deeds.

"Don't go for that, James," she said once imploringly. "It'll be a lifer if they can catch you; and they've had their eye on you lately. There's many a safer way of getting money than that."

Another pause, and then came a speech which chilled me with horror.

"Dead men tell no tales, Jim," said she, in another fearful whisper. "It's easy done, and it's safer. What's an old man's life that you're so shy of touching him? You've done many a riskier thing. Why do you always turn coward at that?"

I could scarcely sit and watch this woman-fiend after that. I seemed to see murder in her fierce fiery eyes; and I shuddered even as I moistened her dry lips and touched her burning forehead. She rambled on in the same style, mentioning other names I had never heard, and not a word of me or Mr. and Mrs. Rayner, or even of Tom Parkes, until she broke out angrily—

"Jim's mad about that little Christie girl, Tom, and he says he'll marry her in spite of everything, and I've got to bring it about," she hissed between her teeth.

What awful confusion in her mind was there to connect me with her criminal lover of years before? There suddenly woke up in my mind the remembrance of the evening when, hidden in my "nest," I had overheard a conversation between her and Mr. Rayner's mysterious visitor, who had afterwards turned out to be Mr. Carruther's manservant, and I remembered that she had then expressed jealousy of some man called "Jim." Was it the same man? How was it that he never appeared? I had thought at the time that she must mean Tom Parkes, and that the woman she was jealous of was Jane; but, on the whole, she got on well with Jane; and the only person in the house against whom her animosity took any serious form was myself. And now she fancied this "Jim" wanted to marry me—and I had never even seen him!

She was rambling again into the present, though, for the next speech that caught my attention was—

"It's a good weight Tom—Jim might have lent you a hand. The water's deep in the cellar; but it won't hurt the jewels, and the plate'll clean. Come on."

Was it the Denham Court robbery that was on her mind now? I held my breath while she went on—

"Tom, that sneaking Christie girl's got wind of it somehow. Jim's that gone on her he won't listen to me; and, if I don't prevent it, she'll be his ruin."

Again that strange confusion of my name with that of the unknown Jim! My brain seemed to be getting as much confused as her own. I held tightly to the arms of my chair as I listened to her ravings, as if in a futile attempt to steady body and mind. I was mad to discover who this James Woodfall was, and I left my chair, and drew, as fascinated, nearer to the bed as she said—

"Take care, Jim. You risk too much. There must be some thief-taker in the world clever enough to recognise the forger James Woodfall in jewel-robber——"

At that moment, while I listened with pulses beating high and eager eyes for the name, the door opened, and the sick woman, distracted by the noise, cried, "What's that?"

It was the cook come to take my place. But the reaction from the high-pressure tension of my nerves during the last few hours was too much for me. I fell fainting to the floor.

The next morning I awoke late, with a headache and an unpleasant feeling of having gone through some horrible adventure. I told Haidee, who had been very much alarmed, poor little thing, by my antics at the door when I frightened Sarah, and by the noise of her fall, a much modified story of the whole occurrence, and then ventured down the stairs very cautiously; but Jane, instructed by the cook, had already removed the grease and made them safe again.

But I never again went down those stairs at night-time without a shudder.

I telegraphed to Mr. Rayner to inform him of the accident, without, of course, mentioning the cause, as soon as the Doctor's early visit was over—he said she was suffering from brain fever, and ought to have a regular nurse. I received a telegram from Mr. Rayner before dinner time—

"Am much distressed about accident. Give her every care. Have sent off an experienced nurse already."

And by the afternoon train she arrived—a silent, middle-aged woman, the very sight of whom inspired respect, which in my case amounted to awe.

The fright in the night had made Haidee rather feverish again, so that I thought it better to delay her coming down-stairs yet another day. But she got up and sat by the fire in my room, and I sat with her during a great part of the day. Just before dinner we heard a light unaccustomed step on the stairs and a knock at the door, and Mrs. Rayner came in. Seeing her in the full light of my four windows, I was shocked by the change in her since I had first come to the Alders, little more than two months before. Her cheeks were so wan and hollow, her eyes so sunken in their sockets, and her lips so drawn and livid that I seemed to be looking at the face of a dead woman. She made little reference to the previous night's adventure, only saying—

"I hear Sarah is ill. I had to go in search of my breakfast myself this morning. I hope she is better."

But the look on her worn face of relief from a hated burden belied her words. She had not dared even to visit her child while that harpy was about. I was sorry Sarah's illness had been caused by me; but I could not feel much sympathy with her; her wandering speeches of the night before had shown her real cruel, vindictive self too plainly.

When we were called to dinner, which Mrs. Rayner said she would have with me to-day, I went down first, in order to leave her with her child for a few minutes. At the foot of the turret stairs, where a mat had been put to hide the traces of the horrible stain, I found the elfish Mona, as dirty as usual, playing with a large bunch of keys—Sarah's housekeeping keys. I thought they would be safer in my care than in Mona's; so I took them from her, nor without a struggle and many fearless screams and howls on her part. I did not come into much contact with this young person now, as, when neither Mr. nor Mrs. Rayner appeared at meals, she had hers in the nursery with Jane, which she much preferred, as it did not entail so much washing and combing.

I thought to myself how much annoyed Sarah would be if she knew her keys were in my possession; but I was glad I had found them when, later in the day, after tea, Jane came to me and said Mrs. Saunders, the nurse, could not drink the draught ale from the cask, and wanted some bottled stout.

"And cook says, 'What shall we do?" miss. She's making such a fuss about it."

"Where is the bottled stout kept, Jane?" said I, thinking of my keys.

"It's either in the cellar, miss—but Mr. Rayner keeps the key of that—or else in Sarah's store cupboard."

"That is in the left wing, isn't it?"—"Yes, miss."

"Very well, Jane. I have found Sarah's keys; so I will look in there and see if I can find any," said I.

I did not much like taking this task upon myself; but it would not do to offend the nurse; and I thought it better to venture into Sarah's domain myself than to trust the duty to Jane.

"Oh, and, if you please, Miss Christie, could you get us out candles and some moist sugar? They are in there I know, for Sarah went to Beaconsburgh for them yesterday."

I said I would; and, lighting a candle, I rather nervously pulled open the heavy door of the left wing and entered that mysterious part of the house sacred to Mrs. Rayner. Oh, how cold it was as the door closed behind me! I was growing nervous after the adventures I had had lately, and I did not like the muffled thud of that door as it swung to after me. The store-room was the first door on the right, I knew; and I tremblingly tried the keys until I came to the one which opened it. I shivered. It was colder than ever in there, a great bare room, with shelves and cupboards, and old hampers and boxes, and odds and ends of lumber. I could not help thinking how angry Sarah would be if she knew I was in the room, where no member of the household but herself ever ventured, and which had therefore grown into an importance it did not deserve, for it was a very ordinary apartment, and the cupboard I first opened, in search of candles and moist sugar, was a very ordinary apartment, with the usual store of jams and pickle jars and household stores of all kinds, except, of course, I thought angrily, as I shivered again with the cold, the candles and moist sugar of which I was in search. I opened another cupboard, I searched on the open shelves, but could not find either of the things I wanted.

A Large English Orchard.

It may surprise our fruit-growing friend to learn that fruit-growing is being tried on a very extensive scale in the British Islands. We learn by the Journal of the Royal Agricultural Society that Lord Ludley has already planted on his estate in Gloucestershire 500 acres with fruit trees, and is intending to plant 200 more. Before planting, the land was deeply ploughed with a stem plough, and well manured. Standard apples, pears, plum, and cherry trees were put out 16 feet apart each way, using about 50,000 trees in all. Between these were planted gooseberry, raspberry, currant bushes and strawberry plants—100 acres of strawberries and 60 of raspberries. The gooseberry bushes numbered 130,000, the red and black currants 228,000. Among the trees at regular intervals, are planted wind-breaks of Scotch fir, and he has ten acres of osiers growing, from which are manufactured baskets for carrying the fruit to market. Should the enterprise prove successful, and orchards on such a magnificent scale become numerous, our American and Canadian growers will be compelled to seek other markets.

THE WIZARD OF WALWORTH.

I was recently in company with the medical officer of health connected with a parish the name of which need not be here mentioned. He was on a dilapidated-dwelling expedition, and in a dreadful little room in one of a long row of rotten old houses we found a man and his wife. It needed but a single glance to discover that they were deeply plunged in poverty. The woman was apparently much older than the man, whose age could not have been more than 26, and she—in a dirty, tattered gown, and with her head tied in a rag as though she suffered from neuralgia—was about to sit down to a meal, of which dry bread and a roasted herring were the chief ingredients. But I was most struck with the husband's appearance. It was unmistakable that he was not of the common back-street type of humanity. He was intelligent looking and smartly built, and, attired in decent clothes, would have presented quite a genteel appearance. At ordinary times he might probably have passed as good looking, but he decidedly was not so now, with his face distorted into an insolent, scowling sneer, occasioned apparently by the medical officer's presence of surprise. "You in this place, Hamshire?" he remarked. To which, with a cringing and deferential manner, the man (the woman, who seemed nervous and afraid of him, began to cry) made answer, "Here—sir. You are precious sorry for me, no doubt; and more sorry still for Mrs. Hamshire, who is always glad of something to set her off snivelling. You may go to h—— the whole lot of you, for all I care, and take her with you."

When we had examined the other rooms of the house and emerged in the street, I remarked to my companion: "You appeared surprised at finding that man, who was without his coat, living here with his wife. Who and what is he?" "He is about as thorough-paced a racal as you would find in a day's marching," was the reply. "I certainly was surprised to see him. I thought he had left the neighborhood months since. I should have supposed he would have been glad to do so, considering how narrow an escape he had of being sent to prison—to penal servitude, probably. His wife, the woman you just now saw—was implicated in the affair I am alluding to. But I believe she was more to be pitied than blamed for the share she took in it. A stupid creature. She should have known better than marry the fellow, and she old enough to be his mother. It was a queer story altogether." Naturally I was curious to know in what its queerness consisted, and enquired to that effect. "Well, the truth is," was the reply, "as I knew all the details of the story I should only spoil it by attempting its recital. There is only one individual who can tell it properly, and that is the victim himself, or rather, I should say, he whom our friend in the dirty shirt-sleeves designed as his victim. There is not much of romance in the matter," he continued, laughing, "as regards the actors who played the leading parts in it. You have seen Mr. Hamshire and his wife. Their confederate was a vagabond who, for many years, had been practicing as a fortune teller, but he has judiciously got out of the way since the exposure. The rest of the tale is a foolish old fellow who keeps a general store in one of the by-streets a few minutes walk from this. If you have a mind to hear the story, I will introduce you to the chandlery storekeeper by and by, and he'll relate it readily enough. But you will understand it better if you are first acquainted with the circumstances that led up to it.

"The chandlery business I have mentioned was not always in the possession of its present proprietor. It belonged to an old person whose name I forget, but we will call her Mrs. Ingledew. The woman who is now Hamshire's wife is her niece, and lived with her assisting in the business for many years. It was a valuable concern, in a small way, the good-will and lease being worth £600 or £700 probably, and it was generally understood in the neighborhood, as a matter of course, that the niece would come in for and continue the business when old Mrs. Ingledew died. It seems to have been so understood at all events, by one individual that lived thereabout—by Mr. Hamshire. I can't tell you anything as to his antecedents, but it seems to have been a fellow who lived by his wits without resorting to downright criminality. He was always, as I am told, smartly dressed, had some pretension to being good-looking, and a large share of impudence, and on the strength of that capital he formed the design of making love to Martha—the niece—who was turned forty, with a view to marrying her and stepping into the comfortable little property that old Mrs. Ingledew must presently leave behind her. And she, like the weak minded creature she is, listened to and encouraged him, though she cared not do so openly, for fear of her aunt, her aunt, though past eighty, was a tyrannical old tartar, and if there was one thing more than another she strongly objected to it was Martha getting married. But that didn't prevent it. The aunt's constitution seemed to be at last breaking up, and Mr. Hamshire, thinking he had so much in hand that he had best secure it without delay, pressed his suit with the result, and they were quietly married shortly, however, but that the old lady was bedridden by this time, never heard of it and was so deeply offended that she made a new will in place of the one in which the niece appeared as the principal seemingly with no other intention to increase the bitterness of her disappointment she bequeathed the whole of her property, with the exception, the whole of her property, including the shop business, to a certain thorough bachelor lodger, who occupied a room in the house—a slow and solitary fellow who lived on a small pension he had from since his retirement from some situation or office. The exception mentioned was that the niece was to have the furniture and stood in two rooms on the premises and the privilege of residing in them rent free for the term of twelve months after the testator's demise. That event happened about a month after the marriage, and you need not be told that Hamshire was furious when the will was read. He was first disposed to quarrel with the unfortunate inheritor, but discovering what a timid and nervous person he was, and how easy it would be to impose on him, he affected to make light of the matter, and, with his wife, took up his abode in the apartments provided for them, while Mr. Wicks, the bachelor, having nothing else in particular to do, resolved on carrying on the chandlery business himself. But now, having revealed so much to you," said my medical friend in conclusion, "Mr. Wicks himself shall tell you what next happened."

Mr. Wicks, on whom we called that same evening, was nothing loth. He is an easy-going looking man, of short stature, and so stout that the only indications of his shop apron being secured with strings appear in the bow in front. He has a polished bald head, and large, mild blue eyes, and is, I should judge, of a nature so unsuspicious that if the credit system is a recognized feature of the concern he will probably extend the business far beyond the condition in which old Mrs. Ingledew left it, whatever his ultimate profits may be. He exhibited great trepidation when he was informed that Mr. Hamshire was still resident in the neighborhood, but became somewhat reassured when he was informed that it was highly improbable after what had transpired that he (Mr. Wicks) would ever be troubled by him again. "I am heartily glad to hear you say so, sir," said the chandler, "but one never knows what such a cunning rascal as he is may be up to. I pity his wife, and forgive her, though she did very nearly frighten out of my life by appearing to me as the old lady's ghost. But no doubt it was he who put her up to it." "But it was some time before you suspected him?" "My good sir, I had no reason for doing so. He used to laugh at my ridiculous nervousness. I well remember how he laughed," continued Mr. Wicks, wincing a little still at the unpleasant recollection, "when I found the devil's coachman in my bed." "Found what?" "The devil's coachman, sir. That was the first of it, and it happened when they had been in the house not more than a week. Three nights in succession the confounded thing reappeared there, though, of course, I killed it each time. I didn't know what it was called till Hamshire told me. It is a sort of beetle, long and narrow, with two little horns on its head. I showed the last one to Hamshire, and he laughed, and said it was a good thing I was a man of too much sense to believe in the superstitious nonsense ignorant people put so much faith in. 'They call the thing the devil's coachman,' said he, 'and they believe that is sent by Old Nick to make known to the person to whom it appears that he will be making a journey his way shortly.' I never was a superstitious man," continued the innocent chandler, "and of course I wasn't frightened, but I had lived in the house a good many years, and such a thing had never happened before, and it wasn't a pleasant thing to happen now. I had the bedding all turned out and the bedstead examined—Hamshire's wife used to attend to that sort of thing, just as she had always done and I saw no more 'coachmen.' But something a great deal worse was in store for me. Two or three nights after, when I had been in bed a little while, and the clock on the mantel shelf had just done striking 12, I heard a sound that caused my head to bounce up off the pillow as though it was an india-rubber ball. It was the most horrid dismal groan, sir, that ever was heard by human ears, and it seemed to come from inside the pillow. I am not a drinking man, I never was. All I had in that way all the evening was one glass of warm rum and spruce after I shut up the shop, so there could be no mistake as to my being sober. The sound was like that of a person with a dreadful pain in his inside, and who was giving vent to his feelings with his lips tight shut to keep him from screaming. I thought that perhaps I might have been in a half dose and fancied it, and I got up and moved the pillow and the bolster: and while I was doing so, as plain as you hear me speaking, I heard the horrible noise again, not in the pillow this time, but in the wall, just at the spot where my head lay. Hamshire and his wife slept in the room overhead, and wishing to be convinced that I was not mistaken—the awful noise was repeated every two or three minutes—I slipped on part of my things and went up and knocked at their door. They were abed and asleep, it seemed, and when I told him through the key-hole what I had heard, Hamshire answered in a pet that I had been dreaming, and advised me to have a glass of grog and go to bed again. However, he got up after a little persuasion, and so did his wife, and they came down to my room. I had heard outside the door that she did not wish to come, and I heard him mutter, 'What good will it be, you fool, if you don't come?' 'I shall faint with fright if I hear anything dreadful,' said she. 'All the better,' said Hamshire. I have been told since, that overhearing this should have opened my eyes, but it did not. I think I wanted her to come down, and rather liked his insisting on it. Nothing had been said over the coachman business, in reference to the old lady, but, somehow, I couldn't help connecting her with the awful noise in the wall, and I had some idea that her niece, who knew her way so well, might be able, perhaps, to throw some light on it. But she was no more able to do that than he was. As we all three stood close to the wall, the stifled cry, or whatever it was, was heard again quite plainly and Hamshire's wife was as good as her word about the fainting and went off dead, crying out: 'Oh, aunt, aunt!' as she was doing so. Of course I didn't faint, but I funked, I confess it. But Hamshire kept as cool as a cucumber. 'I wouldn't care about being her aunt, wherever she is,' he remarked, 'if that is her present voice. 'Pon my word,' said he, 'it is enough to make one believe some of the rubbish we hear about unquiet spirits, who repent some great wrong they did in this life and haunt the place where they used to reside.' Then he suggested that the sound might have come from the room at the other side of the wall, and when he had carried his wife up-stairs, we went there and listened. But there could be no mistake about it. The unearthly noise was still to be heard, and it was in the wall. It was here I on and off—sometimes gently and sometime louder—until the clock struck 1, and then it stopped. I didn't go to bed again that night, but Hamshire did, but next morning he came down and told me he was very sorry, but his wife was that nervous on account of her aunt's spirit haunting the house, that he was afraid they would have to leave. If I had any suspicions before of his having a hand in causing the noises—which I candidly confess I had not—this was enough to disarm them; and I begged him not to leave the house, or, at all events, to wait a little and see if the strange sounds were repeated. They were repeated that night and the next in exactly the same way and at exactly the same time: and what with worrying and having my nerves unstrung by the want of rest, the matter began to tell on me. I consulted with Hamshire as to having a clergyman in to see what it meant. But he said if I did so the whole neighborhood would soon know all about it, and the business would fall off, and the lease of the premises be rendered worth next to nothing. 'Besides,' said he, in an off-hand sort of way, 'it's no use talking to a man like me, who never went to church in his life, about clergymen. I'd just as soon, if not sooner, apply to old Planchard—Blanchard, whatever his name is, the Wizard. He's got quite a reputation for squaring matters with unquiet spirits, I'm told.' But when I asked him who told him, he replied: 'Hanged if I know. Surely you don't believe in such humbug?' Neither could he tell me where the wizard lived, nearer than that he had heard it was somewhere in the neighborhood of Walworth common. 'But you take my advice,' says he, 'and keep the matter to yourself. You saw the 'coachman' three times, remember, and you've heard the noise three times, and now, perhaps, you won't hear 'em any more. My wife,' he says, 'is going away this evening to stay with a cousin for a week, so you won't have her to worry you, and I shall sleep at home as usual.' Well, his wife went away. She bade me good-bye before she went. There were no noises in the wall that night, nor for two nights after. But the night after that I had a twister! I had ventured to go back to my bed again, but I didn't lock the door, in case anything happened and I wanted to run up-stairs in a hurry, and tell Hamshire. I burned a light—a small night-light—standing on the hob in the fireplace. I don't know now long I had been asleep, but a strange sound awoke me, and there was the ghost of old Mrs. Ingledew standing in the doorway, with the door wide open. I was wide awake and sitting up in bed, and there could be no mistake about it. There she was, as though she had just got out of the coffin I had seen her lying in, with one hand screening her eyes, as though to see me better in the half dark, and vengefully shaking her other fist at me. Then the door closed, and she vanished.

"I won't deny, gentlemen, that I was in a mortal fright, if ever a man was, though my conscience was easy enough. If I had ever wronged the old lady, or done anything to induce her to leave me her property and disinherit her niece, it might have accounted for her vindictive appearance. But I had done nothing of the kind. I jumped out of bed, and at first thought I would go up and tell Hamshire; but on second thought I resolved that I would not. He was such a disbeliever, as he had made out to me, that he was almost sure to laugh at me, and he would do so more now that his wife was away. I turned it over in my mind,—and a pretty sort of distracted mind it was, as you may guess,—and I came to what certainly was a most foolish conclusion—namely, to go and find out the wizard Hamshire had mentioned as being somewhere near Walworth common, and take his advice on the subject. I said nothing about the ghost, but, next morning, making a pretence that I wanted to go to Thames street to see about some butter and bacon, I asked Hamshire to mind the shop for an hour or two, and he consented, and off I went. You must understand that I wasn't so much off my head that I went prepared to believe anything the fellow might tell me. If he really was a wizard, of course he would know more than an ordinary man possibly could, and going along, I laid my plans for testing him. I found where he lived without much trouble, and without giving my name obtained an interview with him. He took me all aback by his reply to my first few questions. 'Did he undertake,' I asked, 'to hold communication with spirits of the other world?' To which he answered coolly that he undertook to try: but when, as in my case, the spirit was that of an aged person, and a female, it was sometimes difficult. 'Our friend here,' remarked the simple old fellow, breaking off in his narrative and directing my attention to my companion, who was looking much amused 'can hardly keep from laughing; but he should bear in mind that at the time I had not the least reason to suspect that there was a conspiracy between the three, and that, therefore, when the wizard made mention of an 'aged person and a female,' and further, when, by way of 'going straight to business,' as he said, he offered to write the name in full of the deceased if I would set down the first letter, and he did so, right off—I say it wasn't very surprising if I began to think that he was what he pretended to be. I told him about the hauntings, about the 'coachman,' and the awful noises in the wall, but about nothing else, when he shook his head and said he was afraid more was to follow. 'The next manifestation,' said he, 'is the appearance to you of the old lady herself. By your statement I am surprised that you did not see her last night.' As I have told you, she had already visited me, and I was more impressed than before with his supernatural talent. I asked how many such 'appearances' there were likely to be, and he replied that it was uncertain—it all depended on how soon what the old lady required was ascertained and her wishes complied with. 'The sooner the better,' said he, as no doubt she would continue to trouble me in some shape or other—and some of the shapes were such as I shouldn't care to see twice—as long as she remained dissatisfied. Could he give me any idea of what she was dissatisfied with, and what I had to do with it? Not without communing with her. Would he do so? For a fee of £20 he would; but he was afraid she would prove a troublesome subject, and it would probably take a week. "Well gentlemen," continued the agitated chandler, "I am ashamed to say that I thoroughly believed in the fellow, and agreed to give him £5 down and the rest if he fulfilled his promise. I said nothing to Hamshire, though all through the next week I was troubled; some nights I heard the moanings in the wall, but the ghost did not appear again. It was late in the evening, and he said he was ready for me if I was ready for him, which, of course, meant if I had brought the fifteen pounds. I paid him the money, and then he advised me, since what he had to show me might give me a shock, to brace my nerves with a glass of brandy. I did as he suggested, and he seated me in a chair and told me not to move, and then he put out the lamp, making it pitch dark, and in a few minutes there began to appear in letters of flame reflected in a mirror against the wall opposite me the 'spirit's message.' The letters appeared one at a time, quivering for several seconds and then disappearing, and, speaking in the dark, the wizard told me to remember the letters and make out for myself what they spelled. That wasn't very difficult. What they spelled was: 'Give back to my niece what I have robbed her of, or I will haunt you to the end.' That was all, but it was enough for me. I hardly know how I got home, or what I did when I got there. I had only one thing in my thoughts, and that was to obey the 'ghostly message,' and get my peace of mind restored. I lost no time about it. The very next morning—Hamshire's wife had come home from her cousin's—I had them down and gave up to them all the ready money old Mrs. Ingledew had left me, and I gave up the lease as well, asking nothing in return but a receipt for the property, that I might show it to the wizard in proof that I had done what the spirit required. But I wasn't to get off so easy. My nerves had been so upset that I had brain fever, and came so near to dying that Hamshire's wife when closely questioned by the doctor as to certain things I was always talking about in my 'wanderings,' in a fit of fright, went on her knees and confessed all about it. It was she who, under her husband's directions, had placed the 'coachman' in my bed. The horrible noises in the wall were made by a cat, muzzled and suspended by a string tied to its tail, and let down between the double partition of lath and plaster through a hole in the floor of their room. It was she who acted the ghost, which she could well do, being much like her aunt in features, and of just her stature. She explained, also, how that the wizard was in the conspiracy, and that the flaming letters of the ghostly message were made with phosphorus on the dark wall behind me, and opposite the mirror in which they appeared. The money was to be divided between them; but luckily the division had not yet been made. It was equally lucky for me that my doctor was a man of determination, and that he had a lawyer friend of his own sort. Between them, and by threatening to put the whole affair in the hands of the police, they got back every pound of my money, and that was the pleasant news they had to tell me as soon as I got a bit better, and was strong enough to bear it. And here I am after all, as you see, and where Hamshire is you likewise have seen. As for the 'wizard' he hasn't been seen since.

Famous Caves.

The Famous Kentucky Caves, in the United States, have a formidable rival in Fish River Caves, New South Wales, which form one of the national wonders of Australia. From the official catalogue of the New South Wales Court at the Calcutta Exhibition we learn that these caves are of vast extent, and singularly attractive, having a variety of very intricate galleries or passages, only to be traversed in safety under the care of the experienced local guide employed by the Government. The subterraneous scenes herein disclosed are indeed magnificent — well worth the time and trouble of paying them a visit. There is a whole group of these grand subterraneous halls and bewildering galleries, and each one of these series is known by a different name:—The New Cave, the Lucas Cave, the Bell Cave, the Lurline Cave, &c. Several objects of interest are to be viewed at and in the Fish River Caves; and amongst these are the Great Archway, the Carlotta Arch, the Meeting of the Greeks, the Pinnacle Rock, the Interiors, the outside entrances, and the adjacent woodlands scenes. The Carlotta Arch—a curious natural archway in the roads—excites much astonishment and admiration. These caves, so remarkable for their stalactitic and stalagmitic formations, are of such an immense extent that whole days are necessary for their due exploration. One of these enormous caverns is estimated to be no less than 500 feet in height, and of a proportionate length and breadth. The strange forms gradually assumed by the drippings of the limestone rocks throughout are almost infinite, and not to be anywhere else surpassed in beauty. In one place there is the weird, rock like semblance of a well-stocked menagerie; and in another place the pendants from the roof and slabs below are of a still more fantastic and extraordinary character. When lighted up with the magnesium wire these sublime palaces, "which Nature's hands have deftly formed," present a truly gorgeous spectacle, being filled with delicate pendants and drooping sprays, gigantic columns and shadowy arches—all resplendent with dazzling, illusive gems. In the New Cave, the scene developed by the magnesium light is described (by Barton) as "one of surpassing loveliness," the appearance of a heavy fall of snow being produced; the rocks in the rear presenting to the imagination a black, frowning sky. Occasionally a sparkling waterfall heightens the effect of the scene. The Government has had constructed a number of wire ladders for the convenience of visitors in ascending and descending some of the caves.

HOUSEHOLD HINTS.

Never neglect a cold. The attack may not seem severe, but a cold is a cold, and therefore an enemy to be looked after with the greatest watchfulness.

To ensure the crackling of pork being crisp and eating short, just before the pork is done moisten the skin all over with a little butter, dredge it with flour, and place it near the fire to brown.

It may not be known to some housewives that if flour is kept in a closet with onions or cabbage it will absorb unpleasant odors from them; you may not notice this until the flour is cooked, but then you will.

Irish poplin is likely to be once more fashionable, and interest in its manufacture is again instanced by the action of the Queen, who has selected this material for the bridal dress of her granddaughter, Princess Victoria of Hesse.

PICKLED ONIONS.—Boil some water with salt, pour it over the onions hot, let them stand all night, then peel and put them into cold salt and water. Boil double distilled vinegar with white spice, and when cold put your onions in a jar and pour the vinegar over them; tie them down tight with leather. Mind always to keep pickles tied down close, or they will spoil.

TO WHITEN LINEN THAT HAS TURNED YELLOW.—Take a pound of fine white soap, cut it up into a gallon of milk, and hang it over the fire in a wash-kettle. When the soap has quite melted put in the linen, and boil it for half an hour. Now take it out, having already a lather of soap and warm water; wash the linen in it, and then rinse it through two cold waters, with a very little blue in the last.

A large moustache with elaborately curled ends was the pride and delight of the bartender of the Chicopee Hotel at Chicopee, Mass. He woke from an after-dinner nap the other day and found that "the boys" had shaved it off. Now "the boys" find strange and uncomfortable drugs in their drinks.

A LIVING TOMB.

A Colorado Miner Rescued From a Horrible Fate.

Richard Swan, a mining speculator of Leadville, Col., was rescued from a horrible fate recently, being found in the bottom of a deserted mine shaft, into which he had fallen six days before, and which had since been his living tomb. His rescue was by the merest accident. James Barry and Charles A. Dean, two miners, while on their way to work heard the groans of some one in distress. For some time they were unable to locate the sounds, but finally found the opening of a shaft which had almost been closed by the snow and ice. They could then more plainly hear the distant cries, and knew that the person who uttered them must be lying at the bottom. How deep the shaft was they could not tell, for the depths were black as midnight. Ropes and mining timbers were procured, and Barry was let down the shaft. On reaching the bottom and striking a match, he found a man lying face downward just in the entrance of a drift leading from the shaft. The man was unconscious, and his face unmistakeably depicted the agonies of death from starvation. The unfortunate man was raised to the surface and carried to the city, where, after restoratives had been applied, he recovered consciousness.

He says that six days ago he was walking up the gulch to some mining property, when all of a sudden he was precipitated down the deserted shaft spoken of. He was not aware of its presence, as the mouth was completely blocked over with snow. From the fall he suffered a sprained ankle and a bruised arm, but was not otherwise hurt, as he struck upon his feet. All that night he made attempts to climb out of the shaft, and only ceased his efforts when his strength had completely given out. His suffering was terrible. As near as he can tell, for three days and nights he kept up the endeavor to escape from his tomb. Frequently he says he heard men passing by, but he called to them in vain. Finally the hunger and the exposure made him so weak that he could not stand up, and giving up in despair he lay down on the spot where he was found. He must have lost consciousness soon afterward, for he says he knew nothing more till he awoke in the cabin where he was taken after being rescued.

Salmon Fishing on the Coast of Labrador.

One of the most important of the Labrador fisheries next to the cod is that of the salmon, though they are by no means as extensive here as they are in the lower Canadian provinces, especially of Restigouche and the Bay of Chaleur, on the south side of the River St. Lawrence. The salmon go up the river to spawn; returning, they are found in the adjacent waters of the river along the coast, in the late summer and early fall. The number of fish annually captured is immense. The best, and in fact only real season for capturing these fish is a few weeks in the early autumn. They are caught in gill nets, large or small, with a regulation mesh of six inches. The nets are placed along shore at the mouth of the river, or across some channel of the stream, and visited every day. The fish entangle themselves in the meshes, which are made sufficiently large to allow the young fish to escape by passing entirely through them, and are held until the fisherman comes and secures his catch. The fish are then cut open from head to tail, and carefully cleaned inside and out, all the black skin being peeled off the backbone. They are then soaked in fresh water, then in salt brine, and finally packed in barrels. There are seldom more or less than twenty-three fish to a barrel. As each barrel brings about $12 cash, each fish is valued at fifty cents. This, of course, is the first cost of the fish.

Salmon-fishing is only in its prime for about four weeks, between, say, July 25 and August 25. This fishing is plentiful all along the rivers on this coast, and there is seldom one that has not several fisheries upon it. I should say that a barrel of salted salmon will average about 200 pounds in weight. Salmon are, other than above, preserved by drying, smoking, and canning. The latter process is rarely, if at all, employed in Labrador; the other two seldom. They are smoked much as herring are, and dried in the sun much as codfish on the fish-flakes. Salmon are caught with the hook and line by those who care to angle for them and as the rivers and bays are quite full at the proper season, it is a work of pleasure and profit to practice the rod with this king of fish in his native element and at home, when he is most abundant.

Early Life of Osman Digma.

With reference to the early life of Osman Digma, the Suakim correspondent of the London Times writes that he was originally a broker and trader, and principally a slave trader, in Suakim and Jeddah, where he received a severe financial blow when, some years ago, a British cruiser captured two slave dhows full of victims, on the way to Jeddah. Osman Digma's trade then fell from bad to worse, his house property in Suakim was all mortgaged, and he became hopelessly involved. Being of no great distinction by birth, his selection by the Mahdi to lead a religious rebellion is attributed to the accident that Osman Digma, in one of his incursions far south for slaves, met the Mahdi, who formed a high estimate of his ability and of his influence, acquired through successful trading. If this history be trustworthy, passions for other objects than holiness are the key note of Osman Digma's character and motives, and it is against all probability that he will cast his goods and his position into the broken balance of battle. He is no ignorant fanatic, and he cannot himself believe the myths which he multiplies in order to control his followers.

There is a physician in Rochester whose heart makes only twenty-six pulsations a minute. He is 44 years old, and enjoys excellent health. The average of healthy men is sixty-five heart beats to the minute.

M. Jules Claretie said that a high medical authority told him lately that he attributed the great increase of drunkenness among women in Paris to the war. During the siege, especially, they contracted the habit, when there was little to eat and they wanted to keep themselves up. Fifteen years ago, he says, habits of intoxication were rare among Parisiennes.

The Standard.

MARKDALE APRIL. 3, 1884.

Married in Haste to Repent at Leisure.

Our readers will doubtless remember a notice in the STANDARD, early in January, of a young couple being engaged to be married, and after having secured the license, engaged the minister, and ordered dinner at the Markdale House, she changed her mind and married another at the appointed time, (New Year's day). The parties referred to in said notice was Miss Mathewson, of Artemesia, and Mr. Phillips, of Osprey, while the third interested person was Mr. Louis N. Thibaudeau, of Artemesia. The couple, however, started housekeeping shortly after, while the disappointed suitor did'nt even suicide. No further developments of a serious or sensational character was heard until about two weeks since when matters grew so unsatisfactory and boisterous in the new household, that a hasty and informal separation was made, the unfortunate bride returning to her father's, while her heartless husband left for parts unknown. There are various rumors as to the causes of unhappiness, and who is to blame; but one thing is evident, it should be a warning against hasty marriages. In this Canada of ours where a divorce is next thing to impossible, young people should thoroughly understand each others disposition before embarking on a life voyage in which it is most desirable for happiness to reign supreme throughout.

Correspondence.

NOTICE.—We wish it distinctly understood that we do not hold ourselves responsible for the opinions expressed by our correspondents.

To the Editor of the Standard.

SIR,—According to promise I shall send you a few items concerning this great State, called "Texas," which has to bear so much unmerciful abuse and slander from the jealous journals of the North. Such fearful reports relating to wild cow-boys, six-shooters, and bovine knives, have a tendency to produce that prejudice which exists in the minds of many people.

Let me say right here that the inhabitants of this favored land are as peacable and law-abiding as can be found anywhere, and life is just as safe as in Ontario, and maybe a little safer. Of course she has a rough class of individuals, like all countries, but these characters do not meddle with one who keeps out of their ranks and minds his own business.

Churches, schools and colleges are found in her towns and cities. I don't believe she has any villages, for such is her rapid rate of progress, that where the buffalo roamed over two years ago in his solitude, now booming towns and cities are towering above the plains with their thousands of inhabitants.

One from the North would be surprised to see the enterprise and business activity which can be seen in all her tows. Railroads are penetrating every corner of the State, and as predicted, Texas will be one of the greatest States in the Union in the near future.

She possesses excellent facilities for the extension of commerce, having already more miles of railway than any other state, and also over 1000 miles of sea coast.

Her soil is exceedingly fertile and will produce abundantly all Northern as well as Southern productions. Her climate is delightful, the summers not being as oppressive as in the North, and the winters so mild as to allow the farmer to plough and the cattle to graze through the entire season. If there is money in stock raising in Canada and the Northern States, where feeding is required for five or six months in the year, should it not be much more remunerative in this state where your stock keep in good condition throughout the year on pasture. This certainly is the country for all classes of mechanics, the agriculturalist, and the stock-raiser. Nowhere can a man of large or small capital, make investments to such advantage.

Lands are cheap, but are daily increasing in value. Texas is receiving a daily average of over 1000 well-to-do emigrants from all parts of the world, and especially the Northern States and England. Canada is also well represented as she has over 2500 sons residing in Texas.

Now we do not wish to represent this country as a Paradise, for she has her disadvantages and drawbacks as well as any other; the only difference is she has not so many.

I am sorry to say dollar bills do not grow on trees of this land; but men possessing brains and muscle and a willingness to use them, need not have a doubt regarding their success here.

The weather at time of writing is beautiful, and resembles a Canadian May or June.

The farmers completed their spring work by the middle of February.

No wonder that car loads of people from Dakota and other Northern States, fleeing from the winters to come, are daily seen coming to Texas.

If any of the readers of the STANDARD desire a change of climate we will heartily welcome them to this fair land of promise.

T. W. P.

Fort Worth, March 1st.

To the Editor of the Standard.

DEAR SIR,—In the first week in February, 1884, I boarded the cars at Hillsburg, on the Credit Valley R. R. for Springboro, Pennsylvania. I judge it unnecessary and uninteresting to the readers of the STANDARD to describe the country from here to that place; but I have other matters to speak of which I think will be interesting, especially to the farming community of the County of Grey. My object was to visit the world renowned breeding establishment of the Messrs. Powell Bros. After a rather tedious journey I arrived at the depot at Springboro, where a carriage was in waiting to convey me to the palatial residence occupied by those gentlemen, where I met with such a reception and hospitality during my stay as almost made me imagine I was somebody. Visiters at the Messrs. Powell's are made to feel at once that they are welcome.

After breakfasting, several gentlemen from as many different States of the Union, who had come to purchase thorough-bred stock with myself, then visited the stables for the purpose of seeing the stock, and verily we did see stock: There were Clydesdale stallions from 2 to 10 years old of every conceiveable grade from the lofty and rangy to the very lowest and heaviest type of this noble breed. There was alse trotting bred roadsters and coachers in great variety, and English draughts which reflect credit to the judgment and enterprise of the proprietors of this noted establishment. In addition to those already mentioned they have a large stock of the Norman Percheron race of horses. Those horses appear to be fast gaining in favor, and judging from what I saw of the choice of the gentlemen who came there to purchase, they are more sought after than any other of the draught breeds. The chief reason for this seems to be that possessing all the size, bone and muscle of the other breeds which go to make a good draught horse, they have the quality of more rapid and easy movement. I do not wish to say anything disparaging to the other valuable breeds mentioned, but I state this fact, that no one can view a large number of each of those breeds moving round in the show ring, but will be impressed with a sense of their great superiority in this one respect, while they are by no means deficient in other qualities. I brought home a dark gray colt of this breed, coming 3 years old, possessed of bone and sinew and action seldom excelled, at a large cost. This colt is in rather low condition, from the effects of the voyage across the ocean this winter. This voyage was very rough and long, taking 14 days, and was so severe that 10 of the horses in this shipment died from its effects. He is a thoroughbred, and is recorded No. (2932) Percheron Stud Book, and No. (2559) Norman Stud Book. Name "Ribant." This colt will be kept at home this season for service on lot 23, 3rd range, S. D. R., Artemesia. Any man wishing to see this animal, if he comes here, will be made welcome and will be shown every courtesy, and treated hospitably whether he engages his services or not.

THE FALSE PROPHET.

He who prophesies falsely of the weather, leaves off his flannels and overshoes, and catches cold, is indeed unwise. If you follow this false prophet your rescue lies in taking Hagyard's Pectoral Balsam. It is the best cough cure and the safest throat and lung remedy known to medical science.

Miss. Sarah Millsap is home from Toronto on a visit.

Miss. Maggie Miller returned last week from Sunderland.

Miss Tilda Millsap is home from Latona.

Mr. John Porter gave us a call this week.

Mr. David Goodwin was in town Wednesday.

Mr. Robert Walker formerly of Artemesia was in town Wednesday.

Alex McLoughry returned yesterday from southern Illinois.

Mr. Gilbert Cooledge is in town this week.

Mrs S. Miller returned last night from a visit to Cleveland, Ohio.

Mr. E. Taylor, of Parry Sound is spending the week with his brother-in-law, Thos. Matthews.

Flesherton.

From our own correspondent.

Messrs. Wilson & McKechnie, the contractors on the new Presbyterian church, in course of erection, and near completion now, having failed to quite complete the contract, their sureties, Mr. R. J. Sproule and Mr. Thorp Wright, have had to take up the contract, and intend to complete the work. Messrs. Strain & Large, plasterers, will have the plastering about complete this week. The furnaces in the new church here, which were made by Gurney & Co., of Toronto, we understand works very satisfactory.

Mr. M. Richardson is fast pushing to completion the work on his new block, and hopes to occupy it early in the summer.

The social, given under the auspices of the Ladies' Aid, (Presbyterian) in the Town Hall last Thursday evening, was poorly patronized. A very creditable program was gone through with. Messrs. McDowell and Vanzant rendered some sweet music on the organ and violin. Miss Hopkins recited in her usual able manner. Miss Damude and Miss Power each sang very sweetly, and Miss Millie Van-Dusen sang in her usual popular manner. "Mortgaging the Farm," which was rendered by Mr. A. Macpherson and Mrs. W. W. Trimble & Company, was received with loud applause. H Meldrum, Esq., occupied the chair.

Mr. Geo. Dale and family took their departure from Flesherton Station for Manitoba last Monday morning. Mr. Dale's family, which have been favorably known and highly respected in this locality, carry with them the best wishes of all.

Dundalk.

From our own correspondent.

The question of the erection of new school buildings is now agitating the minds of the ratepayers. It is acknowledged by all, that our present school house is entirely unfit for the accommodation of the pupils, yet the thoughts of the cost of new buildings, taken in connection with the hard times, will, we fear, deter the ratepayers from favoring the erection of a suitable school-house.

The drains have done most excellent service. Places where water was known to lie all summer are now, at this season of the year, almost dry. The most sanguine could scarcely have expected such beneficial results, so early in the season.

Our three saw-mills appear to be doing a rushing business.

The new building in process of erection by Messrs. Hanbury and Bell is approaching completion.

The "McCullough House" is now occupied. Mr. Pringle, of Orangeville, is the lessee.

Mrs. Rooke, of your village, brought her youngest child here last week, to be under Dr. Griffin's care. It died early on Saturday morning.

Our police trustees have made preparations to increase the sidewalk accommodation. The purchase of a large bell to be used in case of fire has also been decided on. We hope they will not neglect looking after the sanitary condition of our village.

Mr. E. M. Williams, of this village, has been very ill for the past six weeks. Mrs. John R. Marshall has also, during the past week, been very ill.

The Band intend giving a concert in Shelburne on Thursday, and in Dundalk on Friday evening. The citizens, while pleased at the progress of the Band, think they might favor them with music more frequently.

Kimberly.

From our own correspondent.

Dr. Campbell has been lecturing on phrenology, physiognomy, matrimony, hygiene, etc., here the past week. He is apparently master of this very interesting subject or science, and his lectures and readings of character were highly interesting as well as instructive.

The ice has gone out of Beaver River, and Burton Bros., lumber merchants, have a number of men employed running the timber down the stream. The water is not near as high as last spring, but is quite sufficient for all practical purposes.

Mr. Teater, lot 5, con. 3, Euphrasia, had his house and contents burned one night last week. The family had a narrow escape. Nothing was saved. No insurance. Mr. Teater has the sympathy of the entire neighborhood.

Our royal mail is very unregular lately. This is a matter of great importance to the public. It's strange that our rich government or P. O. department cannot afford us something that would go through a little mud or snow.

A Hanging in the North-West.

JESSIE WILLIAMS EXECUTED FOR MURDER DONE IN CALGARY.

THE execution by hanging of Jessie Williams, the negro who murdered James H. Adams at Calgary, Northwest territory on February 8th, last Saturday morning, being the first execution that ever occurred in the territories. The murderer was born in Texas, and had been roaming about the States till six months ago. Willams attempted to rob adams' store but when the latter discovered him in the act he turned on him, knocking him down with a weight, and then cut his throat with a razor. He confessed his guilt when arrested.

A serious riot broke out in Cincinnati on Friday night and was continued on Saturday. the result being a collision between the military and the mob, in which numbers of persons were killed and a vast amount of property destroyed. The tronble originated out of the failure of a jury to return a verdict of wilful murder against William Berner, who has been accused of killing Wm. H. Kirk, The verdict returned, which was one of manslaughter, caused intense excitement and a number of hot-headed citizens called a mass meeting to protest against it. Inflammatory speeches were delivered, and the audience were worked up to such a pitch of frenzy that they rushed from the place of meeting and attacked the gaol with the object of getting possession of Berner and hanging him. The movement was resisted and a fearful loss of human life followed.

BODY FOUND.—The body of a newly-born male child was found on Water Street last evening by Messrs. Geo. Woods and Samuel Nolan. The body was wrapped in a white cloth, and has been thrown over the fence near where Sutherland's hay house had been burned. They saw it as they came along the sidewalk; and immediately informed Chief Constable Egerton, who took charge of it. An inquest is being held by Coroner Cameron at three this afternoon, the result of which we will give in next issue.—O. S. Times.

THE handsome residence and grounds belonging to the late A. W. Lauder, M. P. P., were sold by auction by Messrs. Oliver, Coate, & Co. Wednesday to Mr. W. F. Carrier, jeweller, for $18,000. The general opinion seems to be that Mr. Carrier is to be congratulated upon having acquired one of the most valuable and desirable suburban residences in the vicinity of Toronto. The household furniture was also sold at the same time, and realized a very handsome figure.—Globe.

THE many friends and well-wishers of Mr. Finlay MacRae will be pleased to hear of his success in the capture of one of the parties who induced him to invest a large amount of money in real estate and attempted to deliberately swindle him out of it. Mr. MacRae has always been known as a swrewd business man, and we are glad to hear that he is likely to recover a good part of the some invested, but that it will take some time to have the matter finally adjusted. With reference to the above we copy the following from a Davenport, Iowa paper:

A Mr. MacRae from Durham, Ont., Canada, after a long and persistent search for the real estate swindler got on to him the other day. He has hopes of making him disgorge some of his ill-gotten wealth.—O, S. Advertiser.

FOR THE FARMER.

Swarming, and How to Manage It.

In the writer's apiary two large tin pails filled with water are always kept near the shop door, with a fountain pump hanging over them; and if a swarm shows any disposition to leave, or is slow in clustering when other swarms are expected, it receives such a sprinkling that it soon "hangs itself up to dry." With such a pump and plenty of water it is next to impossible for a swarm to abscond. The implement is also useful to prevent uniting or clustering of swarms issuing at the same time. Near the tin pails stand two splint clothes baskets, lined with cotton cloth, and each basket is furnished with a burlap cover stitched to one side of it. As soon as a swarm has clustered it is taken into one of these baskets, the cover flopped over, and if another swarm or something else demands immediate attention the basket and its contents can be set to one side, to be disposed of at leisure.

After seeing the ease with which bees can be managed when allowed to swarm naturally, the energy with which they work, and the excellent results obtained, the writer is decidedly opposed to artificial swarming—and also to queens with clipped wings. In the first place, when the bees swarm, the queen has to be found and caged. The bees roam around a long time, and sometimes finally cluster. If another swarm comes out they are certain to unite with it. When the bees do return they often go piling into the wrong hive, perhaps hives; and if they do catch on to the proper one, instead of going in they often cluster all over its outside. Sometimes, after the queen has been allowed to run in she comes out again then of course the bees will follow her. In my experience a swarm having an unclipped queen can be hived and be at work in that "whooping," "zipping," go-ahead style, in just about the same time that it takes a swarm with a clipped queen to make up its mind, sullenly and doggedly, to go back home.—American Agriculturist.

Plantain and Other Weeds.

As to destroying the weeds after they are once on the farm—there are weeds and weeds, and a knowledge of their nature will be a great aid in the warfare against them. Like other plants, they are annual, biennial, or perennial. Annual weeds come up, and die the first season, and that is the end of them. But before they depart, they make abundant provision for a succession, by producing a multitude of seeds to carry on the work. The earlier such weeds are destroyed, the better, as some perfect their seeds when quite small. The cultivation of crops that must be frequently worked by hand or horse implements, is the most ready way of getting rid of them. Biennial and perennial weeds the first year from sowing, prepare to produce seeds the next year, and are usually not conspicuous the first season, there being only a tuft of leaves lying close to the ground, looking innocent, but preparing for mischief, by laying in provisions for an active growth the next year. The biennial, the second year, shoots up a flower stalk, perfects its seeds, and dies. The perennial shoots up a flower stalk, perfects its seeds and don't die, but on the contrary lays up in its roots provisions for a more active campaign the third year, and so on continuously. When such weeds are established, their spread should be prevented by cutting off their seed-stalks, or rather flower-stalks before seeds are formed. If the flower stalks of a biennial weed are cut away, the plant will die sooner or later, and give no further trouble. Not so the perennial weeds, the measures for their extermination must differ with the nature of the plants and their numbers. In some cases, pulling or digging up the roots will be cheapest; in others, the constant cutting of the leaves as soon and as often as they appear at the surface of the ground, will answer. Again, it may be best to smother the weeds with a heavy growth of Buckwheat, or the Southern Cow Pea. This last makes a remarkably dense mat of vines and foliage, under which nothing can live. We have thus indicated the general methods to be followed in the destruction of weeds. Those persons will be most successful in applying them who acquaint themselves with the plants known as weeds, and are able to recognize them at every stage, and who consider their habit of growth in undertaking their destruction. Every farmer should recollect that a sharp hoe properly applied to any weed in its youth, will avoid much trouble in future.—American Agriculturalist.

Kitchen and Market Garden.

Success in the garden largely depends upon having good seeds and sowing them in the right time. Do not depend on seeds of doubtful vitality, but test them beforehand. Count out twenty seeds and sow them in a cup or other vessel of soil, and note what share comes up. The seeds of tender vegetables should not be sown until the proper time to plant corn. In raising vegetables for market sow those kinds that are popular in the locality.

Plants in hot-beds should be hardened off gradually to prepare them for the open air. Hot-beds at this season need close attention. If the sashes are left closed a short time, the hot sun will destroy the plants and undo the work of weeks. In sowing seeds success often depends upon bringing the soil in close contact with them. Some gardeners tread down the soil over the seeds with the feet.

Asparagus is a crop well suited to farmers, always in demand and the market rarely overstocked. If not sold at once it will keep several days. Sow seeds to raise plants with which to set out a field next year. Prepare the soil as for a root crop, mark out drills fifteen inches apart and sow the seeds rather thinly, covering an inch deep. When well up keep clean by use of the hoe and thin with the hoe, leaving the plants as far apart as the width of its blade. If they have good soil and good cultivation the plants will, in one season, grow large enough to set out next Spring.—American Agriculturist.

The Berry Patch.

Former notes upon the cultivation of the small fruits, have been given from time to time. Perhaps the very persons for whom they are especially intended—the farmers, thinking they have no fruit garden, have passed them by. By fruit garden, we mean essentially a berry patch. As farmers more than most others deprive themselves of the small fruits, which they might and should have in abundance, we have endeavored to show that their culture is a simple matter. Let the determination once be made to have an abundance of small fruits and all the rest is easy. To make a beginning, unless some friendly neighbor will furnish plants, there must be a small outlay at the start. If only a few plants of each kind of fruit are procured to begin with, these can be increased very rapidly, indeed some multiply themselves. No investment will bring such a large return in health and family comfort, as that expended for the plants to stock a berry patch. Send to some reputable dealer for his catalogue, make a selection and send the order early. The express or mail will bring the plants in due time. When the plants come, there must be a place ready to receive them. Select the best land that can be found near the house. It is well to have it in sight, as trespassers will be less apt to trouble it. It would be better to have prepared the soil for the patch last fall, but do it now, rather than to postpone the garden for a whole year. Prepare the soil as well as you know how with the means at hand. This means well-rotted manure, and thorough working with the plough and harrow.

Saving the Road Wash.

Every road not on a dead level has more or less debris which has a fertilizing value washed off upon its side. The water itself is valuable, and will make grass wherever it spreads. In a hilly country or one of gentle grades, nearly all this water, and the fertilizing matter it carries, may be turned off at frequent intervals upon the adjoining pastures and meadows The dust and debris of the highway consists of finely pulverised soil and stone, which contains more or less lime, potash, and other valuable material so minutely divided that water makes it immediately available for plant food. Iron and steel tires, horse and ox shoes, and above all the frost, have been at work upon it all through the winter. Appreciable quantities of manure have been dropped upon it by beasts of burden, and their feet have mixed it with the road dust, and made a nice compost. Its value is seen in the rank growth of grass and briars wherever it lodges. It will pay big wages for all the labor needed to turn this wash off, through culverts or an open ditch, on to the adjoining pastures and mowing land.—American Agriculturist.

QUEER ANIMALS.

The Museum of Comparative Zoology at Cambridge has received a crab from Japan that measures, from claw to claw, nearly twelve feet. In some observed by Professor Ward the claws were five feet in length.

Professor Noury, director of the Museum of Natural History at Elbeuf, in hunting the grebe, noticed a nesting bird push its floating nest from shore, sitting upon its side and paddling the nursery that contained the eggs, thus conducting it out of danger.

A frog discovered in Germany has an ingenious method of protecting its eggs from birds. They are deposited in a swampy place, and immediately become luminous in the dark, predatory animals avoiding it, thinking it fire. The light of fire-flies has been proved a means of communication between male and female.

A vessel off Para reports falling in with a mass of spiders floating in the air. The rigging and sails were covered with the web, the long threads of which formed the balloon for the tiny aeronauts. For several miles this spider swarm continued, the captain estimating that there were millions, which had undoubtedly been blown from land.

A gigantic jelly-fish stranded at Ceylon weighed over two tons, and at night gave out a light sufficient to read by. In ten days it had evaporated so that it weighed only a few pounds. In specimens of the genus aurela aurita there is 92 82 per cent. of water, the solid matter forming a small of 1 per cent. In large forms of Rhigostoms there is 5 per cent. of solid matter.

Professor Elliot of New York City, is conducting some interesting experiments to test the sensibility or insensibility of insects to pain. A dragon-fly was fastened to a board and its abdomen severed from the rest of its body. The latter was then fed to the insect by piecemeal, which it ate with evident relish, the parts eaten of course dropping out of the severed end. Having eaten its own abdomen, it was served with six spiders and sixty flies, swallowing them all and losing them immediately, evidently suffering no pain.

The forthcoming report of the "Challenger" on deep-sea fishes will contain some remarkable forms new to science. Many are luminous, showing fiery spots upon the head, like the headlight of a locomotive, or along the fins. It is supposed that these are their means of communication. Some of the localities from which they were taken were two or three miles from the surface, where, if a man stood, the pressure would equal that of two obelisks like the one in Central Park piled upon his back. The temperature of the water is just below freezing.

The Population of Russia.

On Jan. 1, 1882, the inhabitants of Russia numbered 91,118 514 living in sixty-three provinces and eleven districts. During the year 1881 there were 4 848,863 births and 2 826,438 deaths registered, the growth of the population being 1 217,425 inhabitants. At this rate the population would rise to a hundred million in 1890, and in sixty to seventy years it would double. At present the population of the empire is ninety-four millions. The growth of population is largest in the southern parts and smallest in the northern, where also the mortality is greatest. It is difficult to say whether this is to be attributed to the climate or the economic conditions of the country. The average of life in Russia is twenty-six years in Europe and thirty-one in Asia. This fact is explained by the enormous mortality of young children. It has been ascertained that sixty per cent. of the children die under the age of five years, which means one and a half million of deaths per annum among young children. It has also been proved that more than half of the male population die before attaining the age of military service. On an average, a person is born in the Russian empire every eight seconds, and a death occurs every eleven seconds. In St. Petersburgh a human being passes away every fifteen minutes.

A LIFE ON THE OCEAN WAVE.

On Feb. 19 the brig A. G. Jewett, loaded with coal and machinery, left Philadelphia bound to Matanzas, Cuba. She was a trim vessel of 371 tons, was under the command of Capt. Joseph Reed, and hailed from Belfast, Me. She had picked up her crew in Philadelphia a few days before sailing. These were the Captain, two mates, six sailors, and a cook.

On the day after setting sail the brig passed the Delaware Breakwater. On Feb. 21 and 22 the weather was foreboding, but the winds favored the vessel's course. During the night of the 22nd the brig struck the Gulf Stream. A strong wind, which had been blowing from the south east, turned into a violent gale. The sea rose high and the waves broke over the vessel, which labored terribly. The storm increased in violence, and the gale shifted and came from the south-west. The buffeting of the waves shifted the brig's cargo, and she sprang a leak. The storm was so fierce that the pumps could not be worked with any effect. At 5½ o'clock on the morning of the 23rd a heavy sea struck the brig, throwing her on her beam ends. She foundered shortly afterward. Capt. Reed and the cook sank with her.

The two mates and the four seamen swam toward a boat which the waves had torn loose from the vessel, together with a spar to which it had been spliced. The boat was full of water, and would have sunk but for the spar. The men climbed into her, and clung to the gunwales. The waves broke over them again and again. They had no food, water, oars, or sails. At daylight the gale had decreased in violence, but the water was still terribly rough. It became frightfully cold. The men to keep the upper part of their bodies out of the water stood on the boat's seats, still clutching the gunwales, which were the only part of the boat not submerged.

In the afternoon Mr. Clarke, the first mate, said that his strength was leaving him. He could not stand on the seat any longer, and sank down into the water, his body resting on the boat's bottom. For a time he managed to keep his head and shoulders above the gunwale. A succession of chop seas swept over his head, and a little while after he died. His companions, to lighten the boat, threw his body into the sea. Not long after the death of the first mate one of the sailors died from exhaustion. His body had hardly been let over the side of the boat when another sailor loosened his grip on the gunwale and fell back dead. He also was dropped into the water. Only three remained when night came. There was no moon or stars. The flooded boat was tossed high one moment and submerged the next. The night was terrible, and it seemed like a lifetime to the two men who lived to see dawn. The other had died in the darkness.

At noon on Feb. 24, Second Mate James Pratt was the sole survivor of the crew of the brig A. G. Jewett. For nearly two hours longer he was tossed around. He had been in the boat fifty-four hours when he saw the bark Edward Cushing bearing down upon him. He was too weak and numb to make even a signal of distress. The bark was out from Boston and bound for Aspinwall, where Pratt was landed on March 14 He was anxious to return to the United States, but was entirely destitute, all his effects having been lost with the A. G. Jewett He told his story to the United States Consul at Aspinwall, who sent him home on the Pacific Mail steamship Acapulco, which arrived in New York recently.

The California "Big Trees."

A correspondent of the Advance says:—"The largest tree is the fallen 'Father of the Forest,' with a traceable height of 452 feet, and measuring 112 feet in diameter at its base—a stupendous ruin truly! The interior, a hollow cavity, probably burned out centuries ago, is sufficiently spacious to afford ample room for a couple of mounted horseman to ride abreast for 200 feet, then dismounting, if so disposed, our cavaliers could ascend a ladder, and through a very respectable-sized knot-hole emerge into the outer world again—by no means a formidable undertaking, as we can cheerfully testify. The noble 'Mother of the Forest,' 327 feet in height, denuded of her bark, and, of course, dead, white and ghost-like, is still standing, though her top limbs are beginning to fall. The bark removed from the poor defrauded Mother' was exhibited at the Sydenham Csystal Palace, where it was burned with the partial destruction by fire of that building some years since. In 1853 one of the most imposing of the family group was cut down, occupying five men twenty-five days in performing the herculean work, which was accomplished by using augers, the borings being made toward the centre of the tree. Upon the top of the stump, smoothed and polished, a pavilion had been erected, and the sizeable room enclosed upon festive occasions serves for a dancing hall, and is large enough to accommodate thirty-two 'sets' upon the floor, it is said, at one time.

"The Mariposa Grove, in Mariposa County, is a public domain, having been given by an act of Congress in 1864 to the state of California. It is two miles square, and from its greater area, larger number of trees and the wildness of the locality, was even more impressive to us than the Calaveras Grove. Many of the big trees have been scathed by fires, particularly in this forest, where, as Professor Whitney says, they have evidently swept through again and again, greatly marring its beauty. But amid all these fierce conflicts, though scarred and battered, many of these brave old veterans have sturdily maintained their hold upon life while others have bowed their lofty heads in the dust. There are not a few of these prostrate monarchs here in the Mariposa Grove, in the debris of whose mouldering trunks, shrubs, loveliest wildflowers and soft, velvety mosses spring up, gracefully beautifying all that remains of their former stately majesty and grandeur. Through one of the standing trees—the monster 'Wawona'—the stage road has been made to pass an aperture not quite equal to a similar one cut through the stump of the 'Dead Giant,' in the Tuolumne Grove, through which wooden tunnel our loaded six-horse horse stage-coach was driven in easiest transit."

The truest wisdom is resolute determination.

How Contracts are Made.

To make an agreement binding, one party must make an offer, and the other accept it. It takes two to make a bargain. The parties must be of the same mind at the same time. A man asks the dealer what the price of an article is; the dealer answers, giving the price; the buyer says he will take it. There is no contract here unless the dealer then agrees to sell it. When a man makes an offer and another accepts it, the second must let the first know that he accepts it. If a man agrees to guarantee that another will pay for what he purchases, those who trust the party on the faith of the guaranty must notify the person who made it, or he will not be bound.

Again, if one offers to pay one hundred dollars for a horse, the seller to accept within twenty-four hours, the proposer is not bound unless the other does accept within that time. More than this, one who makes an offer can withdraw it at any time before it is accepted.

If an offer is made and no time is stated for the buyer to decide whether or not to make the bargin, the buyer must decide within a reasonable length of time. The length of time that is reasonable differs according to the commodity that is bargained for. Railway and mining shares, for example, must be bought quickly or not at all, for the law will not permit a buyer to wait until the price of goods is sure to have changed, before deciding. With other things that have a steady value, a longer time for reflection is permitted.

The offer must be accepted as it is made. If a seller offers ten barrels of flour at six dollars a barrel, he is not bound to sell five barrels at that rate. When land is offered for sale and the buyer offers to take it if the title proves to be good, the buyer has not made a contract that will bind the seller.

A contract that is made in sport, or as a mere matter of form, is not binding.

If a man makes a promissory note while showing another how well he can write, the note is not binding upon him, unless it has been sold to some person who knew nothing about it and paid for it.

A man who is embarrassed in business gives a bill of sale of his property to a friend, so as to cheat his creditors. No contract exists and the creditors can hold the property. But the person in whose favour the bill of sale is made out can hold the goods against the fraudulent debtor.

Another case of this kind is often seen in newspaper articles. We read that a lady and gentleman go through the marriage ceremony at a public entertainment to amuse their friends, and afterwards find that they are really married. This is not true. The marriage contract is no more binding than any other contract unless it is made and intended seriously, not in sport.

The contract must be made freely and not under compulsion. If a robber holds a pistol at a traveller's head and threatens to shoot him unless he gives a note for a sum of money, the note thus obtained is worthless. Again, a landlord takes a boarder's wedding suit from him on the day the latter is to be married, and refuses to give it up until a note is give for board due. The landlord cannot enforce the payment of a note so given.

False statements made by either party will make a contract worthless. If a person buys land, the seller saying that there are twenty five acres in the plot, the buyer may refuse to accept it, is there are in fact only twenty-three acres.

The Poppy Fields of India.

As we got further southward, we came upon the great poppy fields, cultivated for opium, which formed a remarkable feature in the landscape. They were scarlet in color, mingled occasionally with pink. In other parts of the country we had seen the beautiful, though baleful fields of poppies, dressed in bridal white. The effect of either is very fine when the eye measures the singular display by miles in extent, the rich, glutinous flowers nodding gracefully in the gentle breeze. We were told that from six to seven hundred thousand acres of land, mostly in the valley of the Ganges, were devoted to the poppy culture. A large share of these opium farms, as they may be called, belong to the English Government, and are cultivated by their agents. Those which are conducted on private account are very heavily taxed, and are carried on in the interest of the Parsee merchants of Bombay, who control a large share of the opium trade, handling not only their own product, but also that of the Government.

Some Marvels of the First Ice-Palace.

The inside of this great "plaything" was more wonderful than the exterior.

One of the apartments was the royal chamber. In it was a dressing-table fully set out with a looking-glass and all sorts of powder and essence boxes, jars, bottles, a watch, and a pair of candlesticks and candles, all fashioned in ice. In the evening these candles were smeared with naphtha and set in a blaze without melting. A great ice-mirror was hung against the wall. On the other side of the room was the bedstead, with bed, pillows, counterpane, and curtains, deftly wrought in ice. A large fire-place was on the right, with an elegantly carved mantel, and within it, upon the curious andirons, were placed logs of ice, which were occasionally smeared with naphtha and ignited.

The other principal room was alternately termed the dining-room and the drawing-room. An elaborately constructed ice-table extended through the apartment. On each side were settees or sofas handsomely carved. In three of the corners were large statues; in the other was a handsome timepiece provided with wheels of ice, which were visible through the transparent case. All the other parts of the palace were fitted up in a corresponding manner.

There are 81 000 masters and mistresses teaching in the public schools of France, and out of this number no fewer than 48,043 receives salaries below $200 a year, while only 579 receive salaries above $530.

A striking proof of the force of the wind storms in England in December and January last was afforded at the annual sale of timber on the Clumber Park and Worksop Manor estates of the Duke of Newcastle. The catalogue contained no fewer than 67 lots, which included 2,613 trees uprooted in Clumber Park, and 673 trees and 159 poles blown down in Worksop Manor.

CASHIER BARRON'S MUR...

Lately rumors have been started that ... wife of one of the murderers, now dec... had revealed certain facts confided to her ... her husband. It was the theory of the ... tectives who worked on the supposition ... "What do you know about Chase and ... ing in the murder of Barron?" was asked.

"I only know that he told me that ... assisted in killing him," he replied.

On being pressed for details of that co... versation he said:

"About three years ago I was work... with Chase in the woods, and to satisfy ... suspicion I had about his connection w... the case, I ran into the camp one day a... said. 'The Sheriff is after you for ... Barron murder.' 'The devil!' he said a... started for the woods. These circumstances, taken in connection ... with the supposed bad character of the men, ... form the only basis upon which the theory ... of murder is revived.

Origin of the Post Office.

The Post Office is an example of the mode ... in which things change while names remain. ... It was originally the office which arranged ... the post or places at which, on the great ... roads, relays of horses and men could be ... obtained for the rapid forwarding of Govern... ment despatches. There was a Chief Post... master of England many years before any ... system of conveyance of private letters by ... the Crown was established. Such letters ... were conveyed either by carriers, who used ... the same horses throughout their whole ... journey, or by relays of horses maintained ... by private individuals—that is, by private ... post. The scheme of carrying correspon... dence of the public by means of Crown ... messengers originated in connection with ... foreign trade. A post office for letters to ... foreign parts was established "for the ... benefit of English merchants" in the reign of ... James I., but the extension of the system to ... inland letters was left to the succeeding ... reign. Charles I., by a proclamation issued ... in 1635, may be said to have founded the ... present Post office. By this proclamation ... he commanded "his Postmaster of England ... for foreign parts to settle a running post or ... two, to run night and day between Edin... burgh and London, to go thither and come ... back again in six days, and to take with ... them all such letters as shall be directed to ... any post town in or near that road." ... Neighboring towns such as Lincoln and Hull ... were to be linked on to this main route, and ... posts on similar principles were directed to ... be established on other great high roads, ... such as those to Chester and Holyhead, to ... Exeter and Plymouth. So far no monopoly ... was claimed; but two years afterwards a ... second proclamation forbade the carriage of ... letters by any messengers except those of ... the King's Postmaster General, and thus the ... present system was inaugurated. The ... monopoly thus claimed, though no doubt ... devised by the King to enhance the Royal ... power and to bring money into the Exche... quer, was adopted by Cromwell and his ... Parliament, one main advantage in their ... eyes being that the carriage of correspon... dence by the Government would afford "the ... means to discover and prevent any danger... ous and wicked designs against the Com... monwealth." The opportunity of an exten... sive violation of letters, especially if they ... proceeded from suspected Royalists, was no ... doubt an attractive bait; and it is rather ... amusing to notice how the tables were thus ... turned on the monarchal party by means of ... one of the Sovereign's own acts of aggression. ... However, from one motive or another, Roy... alists and Parliamentarians agreed in the ... establishment of a State Post, and the insti... tution had come down without a break from ... the days of Charles I. to our own.

A jealous husband slapped a man's face on a Providence street car because the man's wife had been staring at his wife's face. The car stopped a block further on, and a pretty girl entered and led the man away. He was totally blind.

Detroit has been boasting of its oldest inhabitant. There seems to be no doubt that he is 105 years old. He was born on St. Patrick's Day, 1779, and was in the Irish rebellion of 98. He drinks whiskey and smokes a black and wicked-looking pipe.

At the meet of the Southdown fox-hounds at Ratslade, in England, the other day, a fox went straight for Poynings, ran into the church, and took refuge in the pulpit. He was quickly brought out of the sacred place and turned loose, when he was immediately run into by the hounds and killed.

A man named Chenworth, who lives in the village of Cowboy, Kan., owns a horse which he sends to a store three miles distant for provisions. A note tied to the horse's mane has a list of the articles wanted. They are strapped in a bag to his back. The animal never stops to nibble grass, but goes the whole distance at a brisk trot.

A young Parisian who lately came suddenly into funds and by the knife of a comrade was found to be curiously tattooed. Between his breast a serpent raised his head in the direction of the heart, and all around it was inscribed: "I have been deceived in my past; the present torments me; the future frightens me." The death wound came the words, "I have been deceived in my past."

At Brussels lately an elderly porter, who was an excellent character, was sent by his employer to take some money to the bank. He did not return, and his wife found him at the Morgue. He had been found dead of cerebral appoplexy in the street. It was surmised that he had been robbed of the money, and had wandered around in a mental agony, afraid to go home.

An interesting ceremony took place at Birmingham, England, recently, on the occasion of the "home coming" of a man named Hall, after twenty years' penal servitude for wife murder. Thousands of people, it is said, met Hall at the railway station and gave him an enthusiastic reception, greeting him with loud cheers until he was driven off in a cab with his relatives. These tokens of sympathy and esteem must have somewhat surprised Hall. Wife murder is, twenty years ago, looked upon as a very serious offence, even when, as in the case of Hall, it was committed under circumstances of extreme provocation.

A peer's daughter, who is the wife of a lieutenant Colonel, and has lived with her husband for seven years in India, and accompanied him to the Mediterranean, in a letter to the London Standard, declares that "the moral tone of English ladies (especially of those whom one is forced to associate with in military life and at military and naval stations) is decidedly low. Most of them, from their school days, have wasted their time poring over dangerous novels and immoral books, and their everyday conversation is such as most gentlemen in civil life would blush to hear."

A singular instance of kleptomania was brought before the Criminal Court in Paris the other day. An Englishman and his wife, the former aged 67 and the latter 63, were arrested for stealing some objects of trifling value at the Magasins du Louvre. They live in the neighborhood of Paris, and are in possession of an income amply sufficient for all their requirements. Both of them declared that the impulse to appropriate the stolen articles was irresistible. They were subsequently examined by physicians, who gave their opinion that this statement, extraordinary as it may appear, was perfectly correct, as regards both husband and wife. The prisoners were in consequence acquitted on the ground of irresponsibility for their actions.

The writer of a paper recently read before the French Academy of Medicine expresses the opinion that one in every 5,000 persons is buried alive, while official statistics show that the mortality among sailors from shipwreck averages one in 4,000. The question has of late been much discussed by the medical body just mentioned; and it seems to be settled that none of the accepted indications of death, with the single exception of the unmistakable decomposition of the body, are to be regarded as perfectly conclusive. It is certain that the possibility of such a frightful death weighs on the mind of many of the French, as, according to a recent declaration of the President of the Chamber of Notaries, express instructions are given in one will out of every ten to have the testator's heart pierced by a qualified surgeon before the lid of the coffin is screwed down.

Floods and Forests.

For two successive years the dwellers in the valley of the Ohio River have been visited by the disaster of destructive floods. Whole villages have been submerged beneath the swelling waters. Thousands of persons have been made destitute by the ruin these floods have wrought and many lives have been lost.

The flood this year exceded in volume, in violence and destructiveness that of last year, and caused greater distress. Scarcely, too, had the Ohio begun to subside when the news came of a frightful cyclone, sweeping through several of the Gulf states, and carrying widespread desolation with it.

Each of these calamities carries with it a distinct warning. Both were rendered possible, and even inevitable, by the reckless destruction of forests, which has been going on for years in the regions visited by flood and tempest.

The same result, indeed, follows wherever the woods are cut down regardless of their uses to the land, and of their protection of the safety and health of man. Floods and cyclones are now common in California, where the forests have been wantonly destroyed. Once these dread visitors were almost unknown on our Pacific Slope.

The bed of the beautiful river Ural in Asiatic Russia has become in process of time the channel of frightful torrents, which rush down and wreck the human settlements on its picturesque banks. The river used to be broad and clear, and full of fish. The destruction of the forests in the upper valley has caused it to dry up into a small and sluggish stream, no longer navigable, and deprived of its finny habitants. When the deep snows upon the Ural Mountains begin to thaw, there is no longer any barrier to the freshets which come roaring down to the river-basin.

The floods which, overflowing the banks of the river Danube, carried such havoc and misery to the Hungarian dwellers on its banks a few years ago, must be attributed to the same cause. In many parts of Europe, Asia and America, indeed, regions may be found, once flourishing and fruitful, which are now dreary wastes, deserted long since by human beings, as a result of the cutting down of the forests.

In Norway alone, of European countries, is great care taken by the Government to restrict the wholesale destruction of the timber growths; where floods of a serious character are unknown.

The reason why floods and wind-tempests invariably follow the disappearance of forests is a very simple one. Forests hold the moisture which proceeds from heavy rainfalls. They enable that moisture to be gradually distributed, and to filter slowly to the river valleys, instead of rushing into them from mountains and hills. They hold the snow, and protect it from the rays of the sun, so that it takes weeks for it to melt and flow down the slopes.

The rivers, when thus protected, are supplied with only a moderate and normal amount of water. As soon as the forest disappears the rivers and streams inevitably dry up; and the floods pour from the highlands down through the channels, when the thaws come, unimpeded by the protecting trees.

It is stated that for some years past there had been a wanton and reckless cutting down of the forests in the region of the Alleghanies, and near the sources of the Ohio River; and we can easily trace the recent floods to that unwise policy.

Cyclones, too, are necessarily more violent and desolating in districts where they sweep, uncheked by the barrier of dense forest growths, over many miles of open country. They thus acquire a force which, if broken by meeting in their progress the obstacle which the woods interpose, would lose much of its violence.

A Chinese Wedding Procession.

I had not been to the hotel in Hong Kong five minutes before my attention was distracted by a terrific noise. Rushing to the front balcony I was just in time to see quite a remarkable wedding procession. At first from the noise and general style of the affair, I thought it was a funeral, but I soon discovered the difference. A funeral procession is a more cheerful institution than a wedding procession, with the possible exception, perhaps, of the hired mourners. Besides this there is the other differences; the corpse at a wedding is a live one instead of a dead one. I think if I had my choice I would rather be the dead than the live corpse.

The inferiority of the female sex is one of the fundamental principles to which the Chinese hold. Even Confucius does not seem to have had a very broad and elevated sentiment in this regard, for he is quoted as having said:—"Of all people women are the most difficut to manage. If you are familiar with them they become forward, and if you keep them at a distance they become discontented." Many women are in the habit of praying that they might be born men in the next world.

But this wedding procession. First came a dozen musicians who were beating gongs and blowing fish-horns, each apparently without any reference to the rest. They followed a company of men and boys bearing flags and lanterns, after which came a series of gilded tables with elaborately carved and pointed canopies over them, and all sorts of eatables upon them. The display of fruit was quite tempting, and I longed for a slice of the roast pig and the roast sheep. But there were also native dishes, which, by experiment, I found to be far from appetizing. Thus far everything was arranged just as the funeral procession would be, and was composed of the same features.

But now there was a slight departure from the funeral order of things. There came a magnificent sedan chair, the windows of which were thoroughly curtained, but which I was told contained the happy bride. This gorgeous sedan chair was followed by others, also by gaily decerated jinrikishas, in which were seated the relatives of both the contracting parties. More so-called musicians followed, and the procesions wound up with a load of boxes, which I inferred contained the marriage offerings, and, perhaps, the trousseau of the bride.

In a fit of rage Adelbert Clark, of Elba, N. Y., beat his wife cruelly. The neighbors who were attracted by the noise took Clark into the woods, thrashed him, tarred and feathered him, and sent him home.

The White Elephant.

From the published descriptions and illustrations we have now a good idea of what Barnum's so-called white elephant is like. Mr. Tegetmeier, of the Field, has described it as having patches of colour, caused by the absence of the usual colour cells about the head, ears and forelegs. Properly speaking, the animal is a pied elephant, and I have seen several in India marked very like it. Mr. Sanderson, who has great experience in elephant catching, says it is not very uncommon to find such, and denies that there are any white elephants in existance. He has caught, I think he wrote, about two thousand elephants and had only come across two that were entirely of a much lighter colour than usual. One of these gradually grew dark with time, and the other, which had sandy coloured hair, died. This may be his experience; but Mr. Carl Bock, author of "The Head Hunters of Borneo," has just published his "Temples and Elephants," being a narrative of explorations in Upper Siam and Lao. He arrived in Bangkok in June 1881, a few days before the arrival there of an albino elephant, a coloured portrait of which he gives in his book.

The King of Siam has for one of his titles "Lord of the White Elephant;" and the Order of the White Elephant was sent to her Majesty Queen Victoria and the Prince of Wales in 1880 by his Majesty. For many years pied animals, such as the one brought here lately, have had to do duty in Bangkok for the real sacred albino, which is very rarely found. Mr. Bock says there is a record of one having been caught in 1658, and another two years later. His description of the arrival of the rare animal is as follows;—"Then came the hero of the day, the white elephant himself, in company with three others, all so-called white elephants, in comparison with which he certainly deserved the proud title. Were I to describe him as white, I should lay myself open to the charge of colour blindness, but he was quite an albino, the whole body being of a pale reddish-brown colour, with a few real white hairs on the back. The iris of the eyes, the color of which is held to be a good test of an albino, was a pale Naples yellow."

It is strange that the Siamese, who regard the white elephant as sacred, have not long ago established a race of them; for although the elephant will not readily breed in captivity, by enclosing a large tract of suitable country and turning into it such as were heavily marked with large patches, a sure sign that they were inclining towards albinism, the desired result would be attained in time.

The delays of good and dutiful intentions, which ultimately lead to the defeat of them, cause more regret and repentance in men's lives than any other class of causes.

Each competitor must, in every case, send fifty cents for one year's subscription to the Ladies' Journal with their answers. It may be of some advantage to you if you mention where you first saw this notice. The letters must all be post-marked where mailed not latter than April 21st, the closing day of this competition. The correct address is Editor Ladies' Journal, Toronto, Canada. The names and post-office addresses (and street and number, when in the city), of those who are successful in obtaining these rewards, will be given in the May number of the Journal. Our readers may be assured that all the rewards, as given above, will be promptly and cheerfully handed over to the successful ones, as soon as possible after the close of the competition. We know the publisher of the Ladies' Journal, and we are certain he will do as stated above, or we would not give all this space to this long description of this plan. The Ladies' Journal is a 20 page Monthly Fashion and Domestic Magazine. Two full pages of newest music are given in each issue; large illustrations of the latest things in fashion circles; one or two serial stories and a short story; domestic and household hints; besides a large quantity of miscellaneous reading, particularly to interest ladies. In short, it is the cheapest publication, and the best for the money we know of. So if you don't succeed in obtaining a reward, you cannot fail to be pleased with your fifty cent investment.

Don't forget that the regular annual subscription to the Ladies' Journal is fifty cents. So you pay nothing additional for the privilege of competing for these costly rewards.

WHO IS UNACQUAINTED WITH THE GEOGRAPHY OF THIS COUNTRY, WILL SEE BY EXAMINING THIS MAP, THAT THE

CHICAGO, ROCK ISLAND & PACIFIC R'Y,

Being the Great Central Line, affords to travelers, by reason of its unrivaled geographical position, the shortest and best route between the East, Northeast and Southeast, and the West, Northwest and Southwest.

It is literally and strictly true, that its connections are all of the principal lines of road between the Atlantic and the Pacific.

By its main line and branches it reaches Chicago, Joliet, Peoria, Ottawa, La Salle, Geneseo, Moline and Rock Island, in Illinois; Davenport, Muscatine, Washington, Keokuk, Knoxville, Oskaloosa, Fairfield, Des Moines, West Liberty, Iowa City, Atlantic, Avoca, Audubon, Harlan, Guthrie Center and Council Bluffs, in Iowa; Gallatin, Trenton, Cameron and Kansas City, in Missouri, and Leavenworth and Atchison in Kansas, and the hundreds of cities, villages and towns intermediate. The

"GREAT ROCK ISLAND ROUTE,"

As it is familiarly called, offers to travelers all the advantages and comforts incident to a smooth track, safe bridges, Union Depots at all connecting points, Fast Express Trains, composed of COMMODIOUS, WELL VENTILATED, WELL HEATED, FINELY UPHOLSTERED and ELEGANT DAY COACHES; a line of the MOST MAGNIFICENT HORTON RECLINING CHAIR CARS ever built; PULLMAN'S latest designed and handsomest PALACE SLEEPING CARS, and DINING CARS that are acknowledged by press and people to be the FINEST RUN UPON ANY ROAD IN THE COUNTRY, and in which superior meals are served to travelers at the low rate of SEVENTY-FIVE CENTS EACH.

THREE TRAINS each way between CHICAGO and the MISSOURI RIVER.

TWO TRAINS each way between CHICAGO and MINNEAPOLIS and ST. PAUL, via the famous

ALBERT LEA ROUTE.

A New and Direct Line, via Seneca and Kankakee, has recently been opened, between Newport News, Richmond, Cincinnati, Indianapolis and La Fayette, and Council Bluffs, St. Paul, Minneapolis and intermediate points.

Mr. Lauder's Will.

The last will and testiment of the late Hon. A. W. Lauder only covers one sheet of foolscap paper, and is dated the 26th day of June, 1866. In it he makes no mention whatever of his widow, and bequeaths all his property, both real and personal of whatsoever kind and wheresoever situated, to his son, William Waugh Lauder, and his adopted daughter, Miss Elizabeth Harriet Perry, the daughter, of Daniel Perry of Guelph, in equal shares or moieties.

He also directs that before his son, takes his share, he has to make over to Miss Perry one half of his, W. Waugh Lauder's life assurance policy.

When the will was first drawn up, James Alfred Proctor, barrister at-law of this city, was appointed executer, Mr. Lauder at the same time bequeathed all his interest in the estate of the late Jeremiah Carty, to Mr. Proctor, but on 19th December 1881, he added a codicil to the will in which he appoints Alfred Duncan Perry to act instead of Mr. Proctor.

The signatures attached to the will as witnesses are those of William, Kersteman and Henry E. Kersteman. Those who witnessed the signing of the codicil Parker Ellis, W. H. Draper and J. Baldwin Hands.

Mr. Lauder left personal property worth over $14,000.

FLUID LIGHTNING.

There are but few that have never suffered almost intolerable pain from Toothache, Neuralgia, or like acute pains. To them such an instant relief in Fluid Lightning is an untold blessing in time of trouble. No disgusting offensive medicines to be taken for days. On application of Fluid Lightning cures. Sold at Hill Bro's. A. & M. 1

NEVER GIVE UP.

If you are suffering with low and depressed spirits, loss of appetite, general debility, disordered blood, weak constitution, headache or any disease of a bilious nature, by all means procure a bottle of Electric Bitters. You will be surprised to see the rapid improvement that will follow; you will be inspired with new life; strength and activity will return; pain and misery will cease, and henceforth you will rejoice in the praise of Electric Bitters. Sold at fifty cents a bottle by A. Turner & Co. 6

National Pills are sugar coated, mild but thorough, and are the best Stomach and Liver Pill in use.

Care of the Teeth.

While it is a fact that good and bad teeth are largely inherited, yet good ones may soon be injured by neglect. Not only as a matter of health should the teeth be preserved as far as possible, but for appearances. Nothing more detracts from the comeliness of a young man or woman, than the display of teeth yellow and black from neglect; the better looking the person, the more glaring is this blemish. Parents are often greatly to blame in this respect. As soon as a child gets its permanent teeth he or she should be taught to use a tooth brush, with water, at least once a day. This would often save the child from much mortification and perhaps misery in after life. The use of a tooth brush not too stiff, with water simply, morning and night, is all that most teeth require. If tartar collects in spite of this, the use of Castile (the white is preferable) upon the brush will generally answer. If something more is needed to keep the teeth clean, prepared chalk is one of the safest tooth powders. Avoid all tooth powders that are at all gritty. Some contain powdered pumice stone, which will remove both the tartar and enamel. In using the brush, it is equally as important to apply it to the back-side of the teeth as to the front. and instead of only moving it across the teeth, a part of the brushing should be from the gums upward and downward, to remove any particles that have lodged between them. Never use a metallic tooth-pick; a sliver of wood is preferable even to the quill so commonly used. Whenever decay is noticed in the teeth, go to the dentist at once. —American Agriculturist for April.

"Why! What's the matter?" Lady—(With face enveloped in roll of hot cloths)—"Oh! I'm crazy with that Neuralgia that continually troubles me." —"Well, how foolish! Why don't you go to Hill Bro's. and get bottle of Fluid Lightning? It cured me in less than one minute. I always keep a bottle in the house. It only costs 25 cents. A. & M. 2

AN UNPROTECTED FAMILY.

BUCKLEN'S ARNICA SALVE.

The best Salve in the world for cuts, bruises sores, ulcers, salt rheum, fever sores, tetter, chapped hands, chilblains, corns, and all skin eruptions, and positively cures piles or no pay required. It is guaranteed to give perfect satisfaction, or money refunded. Price 25 cents per box. For Sale by A. Turner & Co.

SANITARY INSPECTION.

If you would avoid sickness clear away the filth and rubbish about your premises, establish proper drainage and admit pure air. The skin, kidneys and bowels are the sluiceways of the human body. Regulate these channels of health with Burdock Blood Bitters which act directly to purify the blood and regulate the stomach, liver and kidneys.

MUCH IN A LITTLE.

Many proprietary medicines, if they cure at all, require such a large quantity to produce effect that it makes them very uncertain and expensive remedies. Not so with Burdock Blood Bitters. It is highly concentrated and of all diseases of blood, liver kidneys, one or two bottles will cure more than gallons of the weak mixtures usually sold. Send for facts and figures.

A MEETING was held yesterday of the Owen Sound District of the Methodist Church to arrange respecting the adjustment of the work for next year, consequent upon Union. The following ministers were present: Revs. E. Roberts, D. C. McDowell, J. E. Howey M. A., R. Godfrey, A. Thibandeau, J. Pepper B. A., D. Perry, J. Hart, W. Casson, T. Grandy, T. Snowdon, S. Edmunds B. D., W. Torrance and W. A. Strongman B. A. Also the following lay representatives: G. S. Bowes, H. Bonnell, J. Vanstone and Robert Walker. Several alterations were made in the boundaries of circuits. Two new missions were formed. Markdale circuit remains as it was.

SORE THROAT.

This common and painful affection may be readily cured by the prompt application of Hagyard's Yellow Oil, taking it internally at the same time according to directions. In croup, asthma, colds, swollen glands, rheumatism and other painful diseases it is equally efficacious.

A CASE MUCH TALKED OF.

The case of Mr. John Morrison, of St. Ann's, N. S., who was afflicted with a serious disposical disease of the kidneys. The best medical aid having failed, his life was despaired of. Two bottles of Burdock Blood Bitters cured him. His statement is vouched for by J. D. McLeod, J. P., who knew of his condition. The cure is considered marvellous in his town.

SEVERAL complaints have come to hand from Glascott subscribers Owing to their papers not coming to hand on Friday as hertofore. WE ASSURE our patrons that the fault is not ours as all papers are mailed on Thursday each week and should reach Glascott the following day. The mail from Berkely to Glascott is only twice a week, Friday and Tuesday consequently any irregularity which would cause the packages to miss Friday's mail would throw them 4 days later which would certainly be annoying to our many staunch patrons at Glascott. The Post Master's and Railway Mail Clerks interested will please make a note of this.

FLUID LIGHTNING.

Fluid Lightning is the only cure for Toothache, Headache, Earache, and Neuralgia. It does not take a day or an hour to cure it, but in less than a minute all pain is gone. Thousands have tested its merits within the last year. Fluid Lightning is also a positive cure for Rheumatism. The worst possible cases have been permanently cured in one week. Price 25 cents at Hill Bro's. A. & M. 3

The Hectic Flush, pale hallow cheeks and precarious apetite, indicate Worms. Freeman's Worm Powders will quickly and effectually remove them.

A serious accident occured about noon yesterday while loading timber in this place, a very large stick was being loaded on the car and when just about landed one end suddenly gave way and slipped back striking Mr Martin Burton, of the firm of Burton Bros of Barrie, on the back across the hips and crushing him to the ground. He was at once conveyed to the Markdale House where medical assistance was procured. Dr. Barnhart of Owen Sound was telegraphed for and arrived on 5 o'clock train when he and Dr. Carter examined the suffering man finding his hip bone broken, he was also badly crushed and lies in a critical condition. Later this morning there is no particular change and hopes are entertained of his recovery. His brother arrived last night from Toronto.

THESE ARE SOLID FACTS.

The best blood purifier and system regulator ever placed within the reach of suffering humanity, truly the Electric Bitters. Inactivity of the Liver, Biliousness, Jaundice, Constipation, Weak Kidneys, or any disease of the urinary organs, or whoever requires an appetizer, tonic or milk stimulant, will always find Electric Bitters the best and only certain cure known. They act surely and quickly, every bottle guaranteed to give entire satisfaction or money refunded. Sold at fifty cents a bottle by A. Turner & Co, Markdale. 4

Dundalk.

From our own correspondent.

Public sentiment has of late very rapidly developed in favor of a new school house, and a third teacher. Our present school accommodation is entirely inadequate. The probability is that a new site will shortly be chosen, and a two-storey brick building take the place of the present unsightly one.

Mr. A. G. Hunter has removed to his brick residence.

Mr. E. Williams has been ill for six weeks, and is still very low.

Dr. Campbell, the celebrated phrenologist, is at present in our village. His lectures are fairly attended, and his delineations of character very correct.

It is current, that we are to have a visit from the Salvation Army shortly. Several of our citizens have been pronounced by Dr. Campbell as likely to prove very hard cases for the army to tackle. It has been suggested that if they visit your village, that they seek out the former foreman in the Herald office, as one of their first converts.

[Would it not be pleasant to have one of the female members of the Salvation Army put her arms around this correspondent's neck and say, in a very sweet and solemn tone, "Won't you be mine."]

It is confidently expected that before long our village will seek incorporation, and yet become a fitting centre for a High School.

Dominion Licenses.

The Board of License Commissioners met in the Court House, Owen Sound, as directed by statute last Monday. The work of the Board was facilitated greatly by the admirable method the Chief Inspector, Mr. Robinson, had everything arranged. A better official is impossible, systematic, quick and thoroughly business like, Mr Robinson is well adapted for the difficult position of Chief Inspector.

The whole Board were present, viz: His Hon. Judge Macpherson, John Cameron, Esq., and J. J. Johnston, Esq. Every application was carefully gone over and the following persons granted licenses:

NORTH GREY.

Osprey.

From our own correspondent.

Times are dull; business quiet; sugar making the order of the day. Some commenced plowing a week ago and had to cease owing to the cold wave.

Mr. John Miller, of Artemesia, has moved to Maxwell, and is starting an ice house, butcher shop, alley hall, billiard table, etc. Maxwell will soon be equal to Markdale.

Mr. W. H. Calquet has rented his farm, on the 10th line, and moved last week to Maxwell, where he intends dealing in agricultural implements. A young agent was added to his family on "All fools day."

Mr. Flanigan, of the 12th line, met with an accident while chopping, a week ago, by which he had his leg broken below the knee. Dr. Kerr was called on and set the limb, which is doing well.

Coal Oil Explosion.

FATAL RESULT OF AN ATTEMPT TO PUT OIL IN A BURNING LAMP.

TIVERTON, April 5.—The eighteen-year old daughter of a farmer named Ross, of the sixth concession of Bruce township, attempted to fill a lamp with oil without extinguishing the light with terrible results. The oil in the can became ignited, and both can and lamp exploded, the shock of the explosion shaking the building, extinguishing every light, and leaving the inmates in total darkness. The other members of the family were unaware of what had happened, as the oil was kept in an upper room, and as a consequence the unfortunate girl was terribly burned before she was rendered any assistance. She only lived a short time after the accident.

The present system of superannuation of public officers ought to receive serious consideration from the people. As matters now go, the burdens laid on the taxpayers in this connection are serious, and they are growing heavier every year. This year it will require nearly a quarter of a million of dollars to meet the claims of the officers superannuated, and it is quite safe to predict that next year it will be still greater. The amount required has been regularly increased for years. As the law now stands, any officers may be superannuated at any time on a retiring allowance for the end of his days. It is a well known fact that a number of officers have been so retired during the past ten years who are yet strong and healthy, a number of whom did not wish to be superannuated at all. The system opens the way to remove officers who may possibly stand in the way of favorites being appointed. Of course every vacancy so created makes an opening for some friend, and openings are sometimes pressed for on that very account. Both parties have been doing very questionable things in this superannuation business, and so long as the system continues it may be expected that abuses will arise. Just why there should be any general system of that kind at all may be very well questioned. The public officers in Canada are fairly well paid and ought to be quite as able to lay by for the evil day of incapacity as other people. If they are not well enough paid to enable them to thus provide for themselves, by all means let an adequate amount be paid them. Other men engaged in business, quite as trying to themselves and quite as important to the country, do not expect any retiring allowance, and do not get it. By all means let the matter receive through attention speedily.

IN GOLDEN BONDS.

At last I caught sight of a black bag lying on the floor; it looked like the very black bag Sarah had had in her hand when I saw her start for Beaconsburgh on the previous day; perhaps she had not taken her purchases out yet. I took it up; but suddenly my attention was diverted by the fact that in one of the boards of the floor on the spot where it had lain there was a tiny ring. If I had not had my attention very much on the alert in this unaccustomed place, it would have escaped my notice. As it was, I put my finger through it, and found that it raised a trap door.

I raised it only a few inches, and shut it again directly—not that I had no curiosity about it, but that I had also some fear. An unsuspected trap-door in a house so full of surprises as the Alders had an interest of a rather appalling kind. At last I gathered up my courage, and little by little raised the door and put it right back, not without a horrid wonder whether there was any spring in it which would shut me down if I ventured on the ladder I saw below me.

The rush of cold air when the trap-door was wide open seemed to take my breath away. I held my candle over the opening, and saw that some three feet below the ladder was green and slimy, and that a foot below that there was water. Was it a well? Suddenly there flashed through my mind Sarah's words in her delirium of the night before—"The water's deep in the cellar." I looked about me for something to try the depth of the water with, for go down I must. I found a rod that looked like those used for the bottom of window-blinds, and I cautiously, candle in hand, ventured on the ladder. It was quite firm.

As soon as I was on the bottom dry step, the fourth from the top, I saw that I was in a large cellar, on one side of which were empty wine-bins which looked rotten and green. Above the level of the water the walls were green too. There was a tiny grating high up, from which down to the water there was a long green streak, as if water continually ran down there. I heard the drip, drip at intervals while I stayed. The cellar ran to the left—under Mrs. Rayner's room, I suddenly thought with horror. Did she know that she might as well be living over a well? I tried the depth of the water; it was between three and four feet. Then I looked through the rungs of the ladder I was standing on, and thought I saw something behind it. Putting out my rod, I felt something soft which shook at the touch. I peered round the ladder and saw on a big deal table the top of which had been raised to about eight or ten inches above the water's level, the little brown portmanteau I had seen Tom Parkes carry across the lawn, the same that I had afterwards discovered inside the back-door. And I remembered now where I had seen it before—stowed away at the bottom of a cupboard in the room I had occupied at Denham Court. I knew it by an old Italian luggage-label, "Verona," which I had noticed then.

It was within arm's reach through the rungs of the ladder. With trembling fingers I opened it—for it was not even fastened—and, to my horror, drew out from a confusion of glittering things with which it was half filled a serpent bracelet I had seen Lady Mills wear. I put it back, closed the portmanteau with difficulty, and clung to the ladder, overwhelmed by my discovery.

Again my brain seemed to whirl round, as it had done on the previous night when Sarah had been on the point of revealing James Woodfall's other name. My candle slipped from my fingers, fell with a hiss and a splash into the water below, and I was in darkness.

CHAPTER XXIV.

I gave one cry as my candle fell, and then, instinctively shutting my eyes, as if to from hide myself the dreadful fact that I was in darkness, I felt my way up the ladder out of that dreadful cellar into the store-room above. It was seven o'clock, and only just enough light came through the one little grated window high up in the wall for me to see that there was a window there. But, once on the store-room floor, I crawled cautiously round the square hole I had come up through until I came to the door, which I shut down with a strong sense of relief. Then I groped about, stumbling over hampers and boxes now and then, and scarcely able to repress a cry at each fresh obstruction, until I came at last to the door. I had left it unlocked; and the moment after I reached the handle I was on the other side. Luckily I had slipped the keys into my pocket at first sight of the black bag; and, after long but impatient fumbling, I managed it in the dark to fit in the right one and to turn the lock securely. Then I groped my way along the passage; and I never in my life felt such a thrill of heartfelt thankfulness as I did when the great baize-covered door swung to behind me, and I found myself once more in the lighted hall.

I flung myself into a chair, overwrought and exhausted by what I had suffered in the left wing, and it was not for some minutes that I noticed an envelope directed simply, in Mrs. Manners's handwriting, to "Miss Christie, The Alders," which lay on the table beside me. I tore it open, and, scarcely glancing at her kind little note saying she had received the enclosed when she called at the Beaconsburgh post-office that afternoon, pressed Laurence's letter to my lips again and again before I opened it. It said—

"Nice, Friday.

"My own sweet Violet,—I had hoped to find a letter from you waiting for me on my arrival here: but I know very well it is not your fault that I am disappointed, even if I do not hear from you for a whole week—for I will never doubt my darling again. I have had the battle with my mother prematurely, and gained the victory. I intended, as you know, to break my resolution to her gently; but she herself hurried the denouement. We broke the journey at Paris, stopping there last night. As soon as we got there, I opened my writing-case and wrote a tiny note to my darling, just to tell you how I walked up and down the deck of the steamer and sat in a railway carriage, thinking of you and the last look I had into your beautiful loving gray eyes in the drive on Tuesday night—such a long time ago it seems! I left the room for a minute to order something to eat, with my letter closed up and addressed to you on the table, ready to be enclosed to Mrs. Manners. When I came back I found my mother there; she had torn open my letter and was reading it. Then we had a scene. I asked for my letter, and she tore it up and flung it into the fireplace, with some words about you that sent my forbearance to the winds, and I told her she was speaking about my future wife.

"'Your future wife,' answered she, drawing herself up to her full height and rolling out her voice in a way that always reduces my father to nothingness, 'is Miss Langham of Greytowers.'

"'You have been misinformed, mother. In such a matter it is always better to get your information at first hand. Your future daughter-in-law is Miss Violet Caristie, the most beautiful girl in Norfolk or out of it. And as for Miss Langham, if you are so bent upon having her for a daughter-in-law, and she doesn't mind waiting, you can save her up for Jack.'

"I expected a lot more nonsense; but she was so much taken by surprise that that speech broke the back of the difficulty; and now, though she receives all my attentions frigidly and we are getting along very uncomfortably, she knows her control over her eldest son is at an end. I only wish, my darling, that my promise to my father had not prevented my telling her this while we were still in England, for I begin to fany this journey 'for her health' was nothing but a trick—a plot, for there were two in it—for getting me away from you. However, I suppose I must live through the two months now somehow, as I promised her. She will keep me to that.

"But I am in a fever of anxiety about you. I will not distress you by a lot of vague suspicions that are rising in my mind to torture me; but I beg of you, my beautiful gentle love, to let me know every little event that happens at the Alders. I pray Heaven you may have very little to tell. And now I entreat you to comply with this my earnest, solemn request. Don't trust your letters to any one to post—don't even post them yourself—but give them to my youngest sister, to send on to me. She teaches in the Sunday school. Get Mrs. Manners to send you up to the Hall on some pretext on Sunday; get Maud alone, and you will find she will do what you ask. Tell her to remember her last promise to me in the conservatory, and I'll remember mine.

"Keep this letter where no one can get at it—not in a desk—if you don't tear it up. I feel already such a hunger for a sight of your sweet face—I can't think of the touch of your little clinging hands about my throat without the tears rising to my eyes. I think I must jump into the sea if I cannot find some means of getting back to you sooner. Good-bye; Heaven bless you! Write to me; don't forget. Keep safe and well, till you are once again in the arms of

"Yours devotedly for ever and ever,

"LAURENCE."

It was new life to me, it was heartfelt unutterable joy, to read this and to put my cheek against the signature, to tuck it inside my gown and feel that I was in possession of the most precious treasure the whole world could produce, the first real long letter from the man I really loved.

I went into the dining-room, took it out again, and began kissing each line in turn, I was so silly with happiness. I had got to the middle of the second page in that fashion, when the iron bar which fastened the shutters suddenly fell down and swung backwards and forwards almost without noise. I thrust my letter hastily back into my gown and stared at the shutters, too much startled to think what could be the reason of this, when one of them slid softly back, and a man was in the room before I could get to the door. With a cry of relief I sprang towards him.

"Oh, Mr. Rayner, how you frightened me! I thought you were a burglar."

"My poor dear little girl, I often come in this way to save kicking my heels at the door; but I wouldn't have done it, frightening you out of your wits, if I had known you were in here. I thought everybody would be occupied with the two invalids. And how are you, little woman?"

I was so delighted to see him back once more, to feel that at last there was some one to look up to and trust in the house again, that I laughed and cried together as he shook my hands and patted my shoulder, and told me that it would never do to leave me at the Alders in his absence again; he should have to take me with him. I laughed.

"Why, I am too useful here, Mr. Rayner! I don't know what they would have done without me, with first Haidee ill, and then Sarah. You see, as Mrs. Rayner is never well enough to give any directions, I was obliged to take a good deal upon myself; and I hope you won't be angry when you hear all I've done."

"No, my child, I am sure I shall not," said he, helping himself to some cold beef on the sideboard—there was no regular supper at the Alders, but there were always meat and biscuits on the sideboard after tea for those who cared for them. "How is Mrs. Rayner?"

I told him that she was no better and no worse, and that she had moved to-day into the front spare room.

"To-day?"

"Yes. She was so reluctant to leave her own room that I took the liberty of telling Sarah I would answer to you for delaying the change this one day. Was it too forward of me?" I asked timidly.

"No," said he very kindly, drawing me into a chair beside him at the table; "I give you full permission to use my authority in any way you think proper."

"Thank you, Mr. Rayner. And, oh, I don't know what you will say, but I made Sarah take Haidee's cot up to my room! The dressing-room in the left wing is so very cold. And then I sent for Doctor Lowe. Was that right? I had heard he was the best doctor in Beaconsburgh."

I asked this rather nervously, for I knew Mr. Rayner disliked Doctor Lowe. But he was in too good a humour to find fault with anything.

"All that you have done is perfectly right, and always will be, in my eyes; so you may never fear what I may say to you, child. Have you any more news? I want to hear about Sarah's accident, and whether you were very much alarmed when you heard about the robbery at Denham Court."

"I have a lot to tell you," I said hesitatingly; "but I won't tell you any of it to-night, Mr. Rayner, because it is all bad, miserable news, and I won't spoil your first evening. It is bad enough to come back to a house as full of invalids as a hospital. But it will all come right again now you are back."

Mr. Rayner laughed, and seemed much pleased. He put his hand on mine, which was lying on the table, and looked into my face very kindly indeed.

"Do you think so, my child? Are you so glad to see me again?"

"Yes, indeed I am. You can't think how dull the place is when you are away. There is nobody to talk or laugh, and one creeps about the house as if one were in a Trappist monastery, and didn't dare to break the sacred silence."

"Thanks, my child; that is the very prettiest welcome home I have had for—years," said he, with much feeling in his voice.

And he kept me a long time chatting to him and listening to his account of what he had seen in London, until at last I grew very sleepy while he finished the story of his adventures; and I said I must really go to bed, or I should never be able to get up in time for breakfast. As it was the clock struck eleven before I went up stairs.

The next morning at breakfast the talk war chiefly about the robbery at Denham Court. Mr. Rayner had read the accounts of it in the newspapers, besides the bare mention of it I had made in my letter to him; but now he wanted to hear all we had heard, and whether we were very much alarmed by it. Mrs. Rayner said very little, as usual; and I only told him Mr. Carruthers's story, reserving the suspicious things I had seen for when I should be able to talk to him alone. The opportunity soon came.

I went into the schoolroom after breakfast, thinking I would employ the hour and a half there was to spare before church-time in just beginning my letter to Laurence. But I had not got beyond, "My own dearest Lou——" when Mr. Rayner came in and smiled in a mischievous manner that brought the color into my cheeks when he saw what I was doing. I put away my letter at once, so I do not know how he knew to whom I was writing.

"Am I disturbing you?" he said.

"Oh, no! I was only writing a note to pass away the time."

"Well, and now for all the 'bad, miserable news' which was too overwhelming for me to hear about last night."

"Oh, Mr. Rayner, I don't know where to begin, and it seems ungenerous to tell it you now, as the person it concerns most is ill and unable to answer for herself!"

"Well, trust to my generosity, child," said he gravely. "I suppose you mean Sarah. Has she been annoying you again?"

"Oh, yes! But that is not the worst. If it had been only that, I would not have told you anything about it until she was well enough to defend herself. Indeed I am not so inhuman as to have any vindictive feeling against the poor woman now, when her very life is in danger. But I must tell you this, Because I know something ought to be done, and you will know what it is."

"Tell me first how she has annoyed you, and—how the accident happened."

"She stopped a letter of mine by running after the postman and getting it out of the bag by some excuse or other."

"When was that?"—"On Wednesday."

"That is the most unwarrantable thing I ever heard of. I knew the woman was prejudiced against you; but one has to forgive old servants a good many things, and I never guessed she would dare so much as that."

"Oh, don't be so angry with her, or I shall never dare to tell you the rest, Mr. Rayner!"

And it required several questions and guesses on his part to draw out from me the account of the accident to Sarah, and the inevitable suspicion as to how it came about, Mr. Rayner turned quite pale when I came to my slipping on the stairs and catching my foot in the string, and he looked up and out of the window from under his frowning brows with an expression of hard fury that made me instinctively move away from him on my chair, it was so terrible, so merciless. And I had still so much that I must tell him! It was with averted head that I whispered all the suspicious things I had seen and heard connecting Sarah and Tom Parkes with the Denham Court burglary—my view of Tom carrying something across the lawn; his returning with Sarah; the fact of two men in a cart having been seen outside—I did not say by whom, but I fancy Mr. Rayner guessed; my seeing the brown portmanteau inside the back-door; and lastly my discovery of the portmanteau in the cellar under the store room, and my recognition of it and of the bracelet I took out of it at haphazard as having both come from Denham Court.

Mr. Rayner listened with the deepest interest, but with some incredulity.

"My dear child, it is impossible—at least I hope from my soul it may turn out to be so! Poor old Sarah is, I acknowledge, the worst-tempered and most vindictive woman alive. But the accomplice of thieves! I cannot believe it." He got up and walked about the room, questioned me again closely, and then remained for a few minutes in deep thought. "She would never dare! Sarah is afraid of me, and to bring stolen goods into my house would be a greater liberty than even an old servant would take, I think."

"Ah, but you were away, Mr. Rayner! She may have reckoned upon getting the things out of the house before your return," I suggested.

"And Tom Parkes too, a fellow I have a great liking for, and whom I have trusted with money too over and over again," he went on to himself, scarcely noticing my interruption

I wondered Mr. Rayner did not ask me for the store-room keys and go himself to prove at least one part of my story; but I did not like to suggest it, half fearing, coward that I was, that he would ask me to go with him to that dreadful cellar.

"Don't say a word about this to any one, child," said he at last. "I must sift the matter to the very bottom. It is possible that they may both have been cheated by some clever knave into assisting him innocently. But didn't you say you saw Tom Parkes carrying what you took for the portmanteau on Tuesday night?"

"Yes, Mr. Rayner."

"But the burglary was on Wednesday! No, no; you may depend there will be some explanation of the matter as soon as Sarah is able to give an account of herself. In the meantime I will make inquiries, and I will set your mind at rest as soon as possible." He remained silent again for a little while, then shook his head, as if to dismiss all disagreeable thoughts, and said, in his usual bright tone, "And now I have a little bit of news for you, which I hope you will think neither bad nor miserable. How would you like to leave the Alders for a short time, and spend a couple of weeks on the borders of the Mediterranean?"

I looked up at him in bewilderment, which amused him.

"You look at me as if you thought me a magician who could transport you against your will to the uttermost parts of the earth by a wave of my mind. This is how it is. I have to see one of Mrs. Rayner's trustees on important business at once. He is staying at Monaco, which is, as you know, not far from Nice, where, I learnt by a letter from Mrs. Reade the other day, she and her son are staying. But I dare say that is stale news to you, and anyhow it is a matter of no consequence."

This was said so mischievously that I could not help growing very red indeed and being thankful when he went on—

"Having to go there myself, I thought the change might do my wife good; and this morning I tried every inducement to persuade her to go, but in vain, as I expected. But for Haidee some change is absolutely necessary, as the Doctor told you. And, as I cannot look after the child entirely by myself, I pondered as to who could do it for me, and I decided upon you."

"Oh, but," I began, the impossibility of my travelling alone over Europe with Mr. Rayner and Haidee being clear even to my not very wise brain.

"Now listen, and hear how cleverly I have managed it. Haidee goes to look after her papa. Miss Christie goes to look after Haidee, Mrs. Christie goes to look after Miss Christie."

"My mother!" I exclaimed.

"Yes. I went to see her yesterday, and proposed the plan to her, not forgetting to put in a word about our friends at Nice. She was delighted, and asked your uncle's consent at once. We have already settled that she is to meet us at Liverpool Street on our arrival in town next Friday morning."

"Next Friday!" said I, utterly bewildered. "And leave Mrs. Rayner all alone here?"

"Unless you can persuade her to go with us. You can wheedle a bird off a bough, and I really believe you have more influence with her than I have."

Indeed it seemed so; for I had often wondered how she could be so obstinate with him, when to me she always seemed as weak as a reed.

"There, child," said Mr. Rayner, taking a letter from his pocket and putting it into my hands. "You don't seem able to take it all in. Read that."

It was a letter in my mother's handwriting. I opened it, still utterly bewildered. It said

"My darling Violet,—Your kind friend Mr. Rayner is waiting; so I can pen you only these few lines; and I don't know how to express my feelings at his generous offer. He says I am to write to you and persuade you to go; but I do not think you will need much persuasion. He has directed me to provide an outfit for you at his expense, and bring it with me to Liverpool Street Station, where I am to meet you on Friday, though I don't like starting on a journey on a Friday. Heaven be praised for sending us such kind friends! I have no time for more, as Mr. Rayner is waiting. With best love from your uncle and cousins, in the fond hope of seeing you very soon,

Your affectionate mother,

"AMY CHRISTIE."

My dear mother! It was just like her to see nothing so very extraordinary in this offer, to take it as a matter of course, and thank Heaven for it in the most simple-minded way, while it troubled me somewhat still. I read the letter twice through, and then tried deprecatingly to thank him for the outfit he had got her to provide.

"Oh, does she mention that? I told her not to do so," said he, laughing.

"You don't know my mother. When she has anything to tell, she can not resist telling it. This letter is just like her. But she has done two things she never in all her life did before—dated her letter and put na postscript."

CHAPTER XXV.

As soon as we came out of church that morning, I found an opportunity of speaking to Mrs. Manners, and asked her shyly if she could give me any message to take that afternoon to Miss Maude Reade at the Hall.

"Laurence told me to ask you," I whispered timidly; it is because he particularly wants my next letter to be enclosed in hers. He didn't say why; but he is very emphatic about it.'

"Dear, dear," said kind Mrs. Manners anxiously, "it is a pity young people cannot get on without so many subterfuges! I don't know whether Mr. Manners would approve. But there—I promised Laurence I would help you—and there is no harm in it—and so I will. Come up to the Vicarage after afternoon service, and I'll give you a packet of tracts for her."

I thanked her; but she had already turned to reproach a deaf old woman bent with rheumatism for not coming to church oftener, and to promise to send her some beef tea jelly next day. I made my way to where Mr. and Mrs. Rayner were standing, the former advising old Mr. Reade to send his plate, which was known to be valuable, to the bank at Beaconsburgh for safety.

"Jewel-robberies are epidemic, you know, and I dare say we haven't seen the last of this series yet," said he. "There was Lord Dalston's, and now Sir Jonas's; but they never stop at two. You remember some years ago, when there were five big robberies within six weeks? I shouldn't wonder of the same sort of thing occurred again."

"They wouldn't try for my little store; it wouldn't be worth their while," said Mr. Reade, with undisturbed good-humour. "If Laurence were at home, perhaps I'd get him to send the lot off; but I can't see after things myself; and, if I put 'em all in a cart and packed 'em off to Beaconsburgh, the chances are they would all get tilted into a ditch. So they must take their chance in the old chest at home. I've given Williamson a blunderbuss—but I think it frightens him more than it would a thief—and I sleep with a revolver at my bedside; and a man can't do more."

"Don't you think the thieves will be caught, Mr. Rayner?" asked Gregson, the village carpenter, timidly. It was rumoured that he had fifteen pounds and a pair of silver muffineers hidden away somewhere; and he turned to Mr. Rayner, who always took the lead naturally in any discussion, with much anxiety.

Books Made of Clay.

Far away beyond the plains of Mesopotamia, on the banks of the river Tigris, the ruins of the ancient city of Nineveh. Not long since huge mounds of earth and stone marked the place where the palaces and walls of the proud capital of the great Assyrian empire stood. The spade, first of the Frenchman, then of the Englishman, has cleared all the earth away, and laid bare all that remains of the old streets and palaces where the princes of Assyria walked and lived. The gods they worshipped and the books they read have all been revealed to the sight of a wondering world. The most curious of all the curious things preserved in this wonderful manner are the clay books of Nineveh. The chief library of Nineveh was contained in the place of Kouyunjik. The clay books which it contained are composed of sets of tablets covered with very small writing. The tablets are oblong in shape, and when several of them are used for one book the first line of the tablet following was written at the end of the one preceding it. The writing on the tablets was of course done when the clay was soft, and then it was baked to harden it; then each table or book was numbered and assigned to a place in the library with a corresponding number, so that the librarian could readily find it, just as our librarians of to day number the books we read. Among these books are to be found collections of hymns (to the gods), descriptions of animals and birds, stones and vegetables, as well as history, travels, etc., etc. Perhaps those little Ninevite children of long ago took the same delight as the young folks of to day do in stories of the birds, beasts, and insects of Assyria. The Assyrians and Babylonians were great students of astronomy. The method of telling time by the sun, and of marking it by the instrument called a sun dial, was invented by the latter nation. None of our modern clocks and watches can be compared to the sun dial for accuracy. Indeed we have to regulate our modern inventions by the old Babylonian one.

Dr. M. Souvielle's Spirometer Given Free.

Encouraged by the fact that during the last five years thousands of patients who have used my Spirometer have been cured of Asthma, Bronchitis, Catarrh, Catarrhal-Deafness, Consumption, or Weak Lungs, and finding that many who could be cured are financially unable to procure the instrument. I WILL GIVE THE SPIROMETER FREE to any one suffering from any of the above ailments who will call at 173 Church Street, Toronto, and consult the Surgeons of the International Throat and Lung Institute. The medicines above to be paid for. If unable to call, write for particulars and treatment which can be sent by express to any address. Dr. M. SOUVIELLE, Ex-aide Surgeon, French Army.

Shade Trees.

The importance of shade trees should, under no circumstances, be overlooked by the farmer, and where there is a vacant space where these gifts of Nature can be given a location, it should be done. Now is the time to prepare for spring planting, and this should be accomplished the moment the frost is out of the ground, and before the buds of the spring trees to be transplanted begin to swell. They can be used for both utility and ornament around farm dwellings, and they may be planted near the borders of cattle yards, thus affording the luxury of shade for domestic animals in the sultry warm weather. In pastures, trees can be set out in groups for the like purpose, especially when the fields are to remain permanently in grass. The cost is so unimportant that there is no excuse for its omission by any farmer. The prettiest country home is the one that is almost hidden from view by foliage.

Value of Milk to Young Animals.

To wean a calf as soon as it can crack corn and eat grass, is to wean it earlier than nature intended, and earlier than it is profitable to wean it. The same rule applies to suckling pigs. Abundance of milk at the sow and farrowing time can only be secured by artificially piling the drain and keeping the dam up to a reasonably high standard during the winter, and feeding liberally during the flow. The parent animal that starts in with a full flow, because kept in a condition to make this possible, can, without undue trouble, have the flow kept up to the maximum, but if she starts in a low condition, with an udder scarcely filled, she will not be likely to come to a high standard of milk production during any portion of the season.

The Bee of the Future.

"I'm an apiary, sir!" said a shiny being who called upon me the other day. "An apiary!" "An apiarist is, I believe, the more correct term, sir, and I am soliciting orders for my new hives!" How that man did talk. He had got hold of some scheme—I am seriously informed it is actually possible one—for increasing the normal size of the common domestic bee (Apis ligustica) enormously (proportionately) somehow knocking two cells into one, and producing a sort of a double-headed bee, "and adding enormously to our stock of honey, sir." It appears that we can absolutely increase the size of our bees indefinitely, and that the men of the future will have hives as roomy as an omnibus. Appalling prospect! Think of a bee as big as a rat bouncing into your greenhouse, bellowing hoarsely while he ravishes the orchards, or flopping into the nursery bird-basin, glaring with its huge eyes at the terrified baby. Edith Evangeline—for Miss Anne have gone to a better world—would drop down mane, a lump of hysterical despair. We shall have to suppress these things by act of Parliament at last. Meanwhile, my shiny friend does not lack orders, and if he has his will he will speedily improve off the face of the earth the little busy bee whom we used to sing of, all because we sang of, to love.

Farmers' Homes.

Frank D. Curtis, in his address before the New York State Agricultural Society, said several good things in regard to farmers' homes, but none more to the point than the following, in regard to the location and surroundings of the dwelling:—"A house on a hill with no trees around it, looks cheerless and unhomelike. Have grounds around the dwelling. Tear away the fences, they cost money, and are useless. I mean fences shutting the house up as if there was danger of it running away. Let there not be less than an acre of dooryard; ten will be better. Have a rich lawn of this and cut the grass. There can be no waste, but it will be a thing of beauty; and a thing of beauty is a joy forever. There need not be any loss to be useful; nature and beauty are synonymous; and taste and economy can therefore be the handmaids to each other. Set your fruit trees in this inclosure, and dig around them with a spade each year, and top dress the whole, and the trees will grow finely, and the grass will grow luxuriantly, and the house will grow beautiful, the children will grow contented, the fathers and mothers as they grow old will grow happy, the neighborhood will grow to emulate and excel, the friendship will grow attractive, and the young men and the young women will grow up to know that there is no place after all, like Home, Sweet Home.'"

How Cheese Can be Made in India.

The close connection and interaction of religions, statescraft, and science in the modern world is illustrated in an interesting way in a recent number of the "Proceedings of the Royal Society of London." The British Government, desiring to introduce cheese-making as an Indian industry was met by the difficulty that the religious beliefs of a large portion of the population of India placed an absolute veto on the use by them of cheese, in the manufacture of which rennet obtained from the stomach of an animal had been employed. The leaves of a species of Pinguicula are used by the Finns to coagulate reindeer-milk; and the Government circulated in India a request for information as to any Indian plant which was known to have a similar property. Lieutenant-Major Aitchison called attention to the Withania coagulans, a Himalayan and Western India plant, the seeds of which were said to coagulate milk. A quantity of the material was sent from Kew to Mr. Sheridan Lee, of Cambridge, for examination. He was able to extract from it a ferment identical with the rennet ferment of the gastric mucous membrane of animals, and capable of preservation in solution as the commercial article in a similar way. The ferment exists in the seeds in considerable quantity, and is readily and cheaply extracted from them.

Roots for the Dairy.

Recently the writer visited a large dairy which was daily giving hundreds of pounds of very rich milk. The ration fed was clover hay, a small feed of grain and about a half bushel of sugar beets per day. The point noticed is, why this particular herd of cows, mostly due to calve in March, should, within fifty days of calving time, give each more than eighty pounds of milk per week. The dairyman could not explain the fact, but this he knew, that clover hay and beets not only made the cows give good yields of milk, but it also caused them to give milk ten months instead of six or seven, as when fed on hay or grain. The beets, we think, are not rich in nitrogen, but they do contain an abundant supply of natural juices. Clover hay is very rich in nitrogen, and if oat shorts are fed, all the better. This brings up the inquiry: Do not the juices of roots—and ensilage, for that matter—possess a food value, although rated by chemists as water?

The discrepancy between what should be the proportionate value of green grass and the same grass in the form of hay, can but raise the inquiry why the superior feeding value of green and naturally succulent food. Does this explain why the owner of the dairy in question was so successful in extending the season? The feeding value of the beet, as rated by the chemist, is small, estimated by what he can find in it, and the fraction found would not account for the increase in production unless the water reported be given a food value when combined with the acids, alkalis, etc, of the stomach of the cow. This is an interesting point, and one in which we wish every dairyman would interest himself. Who will be the first to raise an acre or two of sugar beets next season, and try their feeding value, as compared with dry foods?—Pennsylvania Farmer.

Queer Conveyances.

Some birds are known to fly long distances, carrying their young on their backs. Small birds take passage across the Mediterranean Sea on the backs of larger and stronger ones. They could not fly so far. Their strength would give out, and they would drop in the water. Along the northern shore of the sea, in autumn, the little birds assemble to wait the coming of the cranes from the north, as people wait for the train at a railway station. With the first cold blast the cranes arrive, flock after flock. They fly low over the cultivated fields. They utter a peculiar cry as of warning or calling. It answers the same purpose as the ringing of the bell when the train is about to start. The small birds understand it; they get excited. They hasten aboard, scrambling for places. The first to come get the best seats. If the passengers are too many some will have to flit back again to the hedges until the next train. How they chatter their good-byes—those who go and those who stay. They have no tickets, but all the same they are conveyed safely. Doubtless the great birds like this warm covering for their backs. In this way the small birds pay their fare. And it is these last who must be out in the wet if its storms. The little passengers are of different species, like Americans, Irish, Germans, and Chinese, travelling together in steamships. Their journey takes them through the air, high above the waters. They are close companions on the way. By-and-by they reach the beautiful south country. There they build nests and sing—as they build here and sing for us in our happy summer time. Surely it is plain that God cares for the sparrows.

Hunting Fish with Dogs.

Captain Mayne Reid in his last story, "The Land of Fire," now appearing in St. Nicholas, gives in the March installment the following interesting description of a peculiar Fuegian manner of fishing: "By this, the four canoes have arrived at the entrance to the inlet, and are forming in line across it at equal distances from one another, as if to bar the way against anything that may attempt to pass outward. Just such is their design; the fish being what they purpose enfilading.

"Soon the fish-hunters, having completed their 'cordin' and dropped the dogs overboard, come on up the cove, the women plying the paddles, the men with javelins upraised, ready for darting. The little foxy dogs swim abreast of and between the canoes, driving the fish before them,—as sheep dogs drive sheep,—one or another diving under at intervals, to intercept such as attempt to escape outward. For in the translucent water they can see the fish far ahead, and, trained to the work, they keep guard against a break from these through the enclosing line. Soon the fish are forced up to the inner end of the coves, where it is shoalest; and then the work of slaughter commences. The dusky fishermen, standing in the canoes and bending over, now to this side, now that, plunge down their spears and fizgigs, rarely failing to bring up a fish of one sort or another; the struggling victim shaken off into the bottom of the canoe, there gets its death-blow from the boys.

"For nearly an hour the curious aquatic chase is carried on; not in silence, but amid a chorus of deafening noises,—the shouts of the savages and the barking and yelping of their dogs mingling with the shrieking of the sea-birds overhead. And thrice is the cove 'drawn' by the canoes, which are taken back to its mouth, the line reformed, and the process repeated till a good supply of the fish best worth catching has been secured.

Suspicions.

Groundless suspicion is not only a cause of torment to the suspicious person, but it often proves a positive injury to the person suspected. Many a man, originally innocent, has been driven, through the pressure of unworthy suspicion, to become that which he was once falsly thought to be. There is hardly a single action which is not susceptible of more than one interpretation; and those who would do justice to their fellow-men should not only remember that fact, but also the wise old Roman law, that, in a doubtful matter, the kindlier interpretation is not less just than safe. And those who profess to follow Christ will have the additional incitement to careful watching of this possible means of influencing others for evil, that one of the offences for which the sorest punishment is reserved in Christ's kingdom, is the giving occasion for any of his little ones to stumble. Take the kindlier interpretation, act on no suspicion which is not supported by grave reasons, if you would avoid putting a rock of perhaps fatal offense in the pathway of a brother.

A teacher asked a bright little girl what country was opposite to us on the globe. "I don't know, sir," was the reply. "Well, now," pursued the teacher, "if I were to bore a hole through the earth, and you were to go in at this end, where would you come out?" "Out of the hole, sir," replied the pupil, with an air of triumph.

STUFFED MONARCHS.

Ridiculous Collection in a Corner of Westminster Abbey.

Many, even among Londoners, are unaware that one of the weirdest relics of "pomp and vanity" in connection with the grandeurs of the past, lurks in a recondite corner in Westminster Abbey—in an eyrie up a winding stair, triple veiled with dust, defended by a low door of venerable oak. In Pope's "Life of Seth Ward" we find the fact recorded that "'Tis the custom of the servants of the church on all holidays to show the tombs and the effigies of our sovereigns to the meener sort, at a toll of two cents per person;" and a brave sight it must have been to look on Henry VII. and his fair Queen, Henry V., and the noble Prince Henry, King James' eldest son, and James and Elizabeth and Anne, all in the chapel, done in wax, clad in their own garments, as they lived. And these Old World royal phantoms are there still, visible to the inquiring and practical eye of the adventurous explorer of the nineteenth century! Not all, alas! for wax, silks and velvets are perishable substances, and Father Time has scant respect even for regal periwigs and farthingales. It is said to have chronicled that there exists, hidden away under the antique abbey roof, a certain vast cupboard, as close locked as Fatima's blue chamber, whose ancient and worm-worn door conceals a veritable Golgotha, to wit, the straw-stuffed body of Edward III., clad in mouldy rags, his whilom beauteous Queen with a battered plate, and illustrious Elizabeth of York with naught save a ruff to cover her, and a half a hundred gruesome things beside. Such of these figures as still remain more or less erect (eleven in all) are rickety, and need a friendly prop; and yet they are wondrously fresh, considering their tale of years and all the London fogs that have enwrapped them. Charles II.—what we can see of him through a glass plentifully scrawled with the names of visitors—looks debonnaire enough, if wan, for one who was nothing if not merry.

In George III.'s time (1754) the figures of Willism III., Mary, and Anne are described in a local chronicle as the gems of the collection, "greatly admired by every eye that beholds them;" and they are worthy of admiration still. Anne is conspicuous for gaudy attire and a redundancy of paste jewels, the meretricious effect being relieved by the magnificence of a pair of lace sleeves, into the fabric of which the royal arms of England have been introduced. William looks as saturnine as might be expected and turns away in seeming pettishness from the wife he loved so well; nor can his displeasure be in any way quite justified, for Mary, if the least steady and dignified of the distinguished company, has propped herself with becoming caution in the angle of her dress, and seems in no present danger of falling on her face. Not so Lord Chatham, the "Great Commoner," who is in a shamefully tottering and imbecile condition, with periwig awry and ankles bent, and, though one may recall to memory the fact that he was a martyr to the gout, yet it is a pleasant relief to find that this figure is a spurious one, having been manufactured on the premises in 1779, the popularity of the distinguished statesman rendering it possible to raise the exhibition fee by his mimic presence from three to six pence, to the benefit of the minor canons and lay vicars. The Guide Book of 1783 observes: "The eagerness of connoisseurs and artists to view this figure, which hath been introduced at considerable expense, and the satisfaction it affords, justly place it among the first of the kind ever seen in this or any other country." Well, it must be admitted that the earl of Chatham makes but a poor show now—no finer a one than that of great Queen Bess, close at hand, whose plastic representative is mentioned by Dryden as having perished in his time. The present figure stood in King Henry VII.'s Chapel so late as 1783, and is probably the one which was specially fashioned by order of the chapter to commemorate the bi-centenary of the Collegiate Church in 1760. At any rate the present Queen Bess is a fraud of the deepest dye, fit only to fright babes withal. The phantom of Nelson—who, cheek by jowl, stands poised upon one toe—is chiefly remarkable for an accurate portrayal of his diminutive size, and for the breeches and vest of white cloth, which are his own. So, it may be presumed, is his hat, for it was borrowed and used by Maclise, R. A., when at work on his fresco in the Parliment House hard by. The original and identical coat worn by the hero at Trafalgar is, as all the world knows, one of the most sacred relics of Greenwich Hospital; but this hat and these breeches, to say nothing of sundry gold medals and other decorations, may also be looked upon without suspicion, and treated with respect accordingly.— London Telegraph.

A Sixteenth Century Breakfast.

Mr. W. S. Caine, M. P., has been holding forth to the inhabitants of Peckham on the advantages of a "free" breakfast-table. It is to be feared that in this degenerate age we shall never think of that solution of the question which commended itself to our ancestors and even to the epicurean Brillat Savarin. "I breakfasted," he says somewhere, "as one should—that is, not at all." In Holinshed, whose chronicle appeared in 1577, one reads: "Heretofore there been much more time spent in eating and drinking than commonly is in these days; for whereas of old we had breakfast in the forenoon, beverages or nuntions after dinner, and thereto rear suppers generally, when it was time to go to rest . . . now these odd repasts, thanked be God, are very well left, and each one in manner (except here and there some yong hungry stomach that cannot fast till dinner time) contenteth himself with dinner and supper only." And yet one scarcely knows whether the nineteenth century man would be most depressed at having to go without his breakfast or at being called upon to fact the kind of morning repast which was in fashion in the earlier part of the sixteenth century, as one gather from the household book of the Percy family. The following is a pretty substantial breakfast for two persons in Lent and seem to indicate a healthy appetite in "my lord and lady" of Northumberland: A loaf of bread in trenchers, two manchets, one quart of beer, one quart of wine, two pieces of salt fish, six bacconn'd hearings four white herrings, and a dish of sprats."— London Paper.

MAKING THE DUMB SPEAK.

Not by a Miracle, but by Patience, Ingenuity, and Practice.

A hundred years ago most persons if asked how the dumb could be made to speak would no doubt have answered without hesitation: "By a miracle!" Yet nearly a quarter of a century earlier, in 1763, a German, Samuel Heinicke, had started a school in Leipsic for teaching deaf mutes to talk. This school is still in existence, and other schools based on Heinick's method, which, of course, has been greatly improved, have been founded in different countries, so that at the present time the teaching of the dumb to speak forms an important branch of education. Few persons who have not paid special attention to the subject have any idea of this.

On the west side of Lexington avenue, extending from sixty-seventh to sixty-eight street, New York, stands a five-story brick building with a quaint little cupola over its central division. It is called the institution for the Improved Instruction of Deaf Mutes. Within its walls nearly 150 little tongues, upon which nature has imposed the burden of silence, are daily taught the intricacies and usefulness of speech. As a rule children are dumb solely because they are deaf, and therefore unable to hear and imitate the vocal sounds uttered by those around them. It is very rare that the vocal organs of a deaf mute are defective. On the other hand, children under 7 years who have learned to speak perfectly almost always become mute if they lose their hearing, as they frequently do by such causes as measles, scarlet fever, and cerebro-spinal meningitis. Children born deaf are technically termed congenital deaf mutes, and those that become so in early childhood are called semi-mutes. Strange as it may appear, it is generally easier to teach the former than the latter to talk.

Since the child cannot hear, his other senses must be enlisted as substitutes for hearing and the method of teaching him to speak must, therefore, consist in making him see and feel the words spoken to him. How this is done can best be seen in the primary class, made up as a rule of children from 6 to 9 years old. At present it consists of about a dozen little boys and girls and is taught with much skill, patience, and good humor by Miss Keeler. These little ones who entered the institution perfectly dumb in September last are all able now to utter simple words and sentences distinctly while one or two can speak almost fluently. But another thing that surprises the visitor quite as much as their speaking is the youngest of these children can write readily and legibly as well as spell correctly any word he can utter.

The difficulty of teaching the dumb child to speak is in reality, not so great as it may seem to the reader. Nearly all deaf mutes can utter inarticulate sounds resembling somewhat "An," "Oo." The first step is to teach them to utter those simple vowel sounds correctly as well as o, ou, o, i, and the easier of the consonants, as p, b, t, f, and c.

"To teach the vowel sounds," says Mr. David Greenberger, the principal of the institution, "it is generally sufficient to let the pupil place his hand on the teacher's chest, where he can feel the vibration, and to let him watch the shape of the teacher's mouth, for, in order to distinguish between their varieties, the deaf mute depends entirely on watching the relative positions of the lips and the tongue. These organs are the two principal agents in vowel modification."

The details of instruction are, of course, numerous, and, as a full examination of them would be tedious in a sketch of this kind, the following characteristic examples are selected to give a general idea of the process; In the formation of ah, the most open of full vowel sounds, the mouth and throat are opened wide and the tongue lies in its natural, almost horizontal, position, while in forming long e, the closest lingual or palatal sound, the mouth is much less opened, and the tongue is raised convexly within the dome of the palate, pressing against its sides and leaving only the smallest possible passage, through which a vowel sound can be uttered. Ah is consequently the easiest and e the most difficult vowel sound to teach. In teaching the pupil, besides having his attention directed to the teacher's mouth, which is opened as wide as it can be consistently with the production of the sound, is also made to place one hand on the teacher's and the other on his own throat, so as to feel and imitate the peculiar vibration. The vibration of e can also be felt under the angle of the jaw and upon the crown of the head. Another method of teaching e is to make the pupil feel that while in sounding o the larynx is depressed, in sounding e it is raised.

Modulation of the voice is taught from the very outset. When the pupil's voice is too high and shrill, pressure on the front of the larynx diminishes the tension of the vocal chords, and thereby lowers the pitch. Simultaneous pressure on both sides of the larynx increases the tension of the vocal chords and elevates the pitch. The nasal tone is corrected by directing the pupil's attention, through holding the back of his hand alternately to his own and the teacher's mouth and nose, to the fact that in the proper utterance of the sound the breath escapes through the mouth, and not through the nose. If this does not succeed, the teacher closes the pupil's nostrils by pressing them between the thumb and forefinger, and thus forces the breath through the mouth.

The simplest consonant sounds, and consequently the most readily taught, are r, t, and k. The pupil is made aware of the differences in the utterances of them by having the back of his head held close to the teacher's mouth, and then he is encouraged to exercise his own vocal organs until he is able to emit his breath in the same manner. He is assisted in the production of the sound by having the fore part of his tongue pressed downward and a little backward with a paper folder.

As soon as a pupil has succeded in uttering a sound correctly, the letter or combination of letters, representing it is written on the black board and he is encouraged to repeat the sound, and write the letter himself so as to clinch the indentification. As soon as he is able to utter simple vowel and consonant sounds he is taught to combine them into easy words, as "toe" "tea," "out," "eye," "cow," which are immediately written upon the blackbord. At the same time the meaning of such words is explained to the pupil by means of pictures and objects. Thus he is simultaneously taught to utter articulate sounds, to read them from the lips of his teacher, to associate words with their signification, and to write the letters and words as he learns them. the most difficult sounds for a deaf mute to learn are the hissing sound of s, ch, and j, but these are acquired like the rest by patience and practice.

The pupils in most cases show a remarkable aptness to learn, and they express a peculiar delight when they first find out the real object of the funny puffs, blows, and hisses, which they learn to produce, and they labor cheerfully to overcome the difficulties necessarily attending their attempts at articulation.

The development of speech sounds occupies, according to the capacities of individual pupils, from three to four or, at the utmost, five months. They are kept in the primary class generally for one year, then instructed in the English language, and finally carried through higher branches of study. The more advanced pupils, as a rule, enunciate clearly, though they are apt to fall into a kind of lisp. But when their attention is called to it they quickly remedy the defect. It is not an uncommon thing to see one of these advanced pupils talking with his hand on his chest. Being asked why he holds his hand there, he replies that it assists him in modulating his voice.

Progress on the Panama Canal.

There are many who yet doubt whether De Lesseps and his associates will eventually succeed in piercing the Isthmus of Panama with a practical canal. The work has now been fairly commenced, and some $40,000,000 has thus far been expended, not including the money paid for the Panama Railroad, but it is plainly apparent that the magnitude of the undertaking has been greatly underestimated, as it is also that the canal cannot be completed by the year 1888, the time announced by M. de Lesseps for its opening.

Lieut. Raymond P. Rogers, of the U. S. Navy, has lately passed over the line of the canal, where every facility was afforded him of making a thorough inspection, and his report brings our information considering the work up to date. The number of men employed in all sections is probably at least 15,000 brought chiefly from Jamaica and Carthagena, and the amount of excavation has gradually increased until 700 000 cubic meters per month have been reached. It was hoped that the month of February would produce 1 000,000 cubic meters, and that later the amount of 25,000,000 meters would be removed each month. The rainy season begins in May and continues till December, and it is estimated that the rains will reduce the examination of the dry season by about one-fifth, so that it is not unlikely that from the 1st of May next an annual excavation of 25,000,000 cubic meters may be counted upon.

It is not impossible, with the requisite money, that the sections of the canal, exclusive of those of Obispo, Empire, Culebra, and Paraise, may be ready for service by the year 1888, but it does not seem possible that these most formidable sections, with their cuts of great depth and width, can be made ready, nor that the ports at the extremities can be completed for some years later. Consider the section of Culebra, with its great excavation of more than 25,000,000 of cubic meters, and suppose that the large amount of 300,000 cubic meters be removed each month from it; at this rate it would take seven years to complete the section.

There is an immense amount of machinery and material now on hand or contracted for, and it is probable that there remains sufficient funds from the amount already subscribed to meet promptly the current expenses for two years to come. After that, with the enterprise well begun and with a fair proportion of the whole excavation already removed, it would seem plausible that the prestige of M. de Lesseps' name, and the confidence which the investors of France have in his ability to carry through successfully this great work, would procure the further necessary subscriptions. Whether the estimated sum—600,000,000f.—will prove sufficient time alone can decide; but as one third of this amount has already been expended, it would seem insufficient to complete this most formidable undertaking.

The climate has thus far not proved so fatal in most of the sections as might have been anticipated. Of course, exposure to the sun, heat, and fatigue have produced fevers and have occasioned mortality; but, as a rule, the employes of the company seem in fair health, and the Europeans have suffered more than the laborers, natives of the tropics. But, while most of the sections have not been very sickly, the neighborhood of Panama has proved an exception to the general rule. Here, during the past six months have appeared, in larger numbers than usual, pernicious fevers, and there have been several cases of yellow fever which have proved fatal.—Scientific American.

For Want of Money.

It is now generally admitted by the German military authorities that financial considerations alone prevent the immediate adoption of a magazine, or repeating rifle, as the general armament of the infantry of their army. Not only would the direct expense of providing the new weapons be very great, but the cartridges now used with the Mauser, of which immense supplies are stored in the German fortresses and arsenals, would be rendered useless, as, owing to certain weak points in their manufacture, they could not be safely fired from a magazine rifle. How enormous must be the amount of ammunition which would have to be replaced may be deduced from the fact that, according to lately published returns the war establishment of the German army comprised on the 1st of January last, including all ranks and arms of the service, no fewer than 2,075,563 officers and men, while the total number of trained men available in the empire will shortly not fall far short of 3,090 000. Of the actually organized forces 1,521,405 are infantry soldiers; so that, even leaving out of account altogether the ammunition which would be required for magazine carbines carried by troopers, gunners, engineers, &c., it is evident that the cost of substituting new cartridges suitable for a magazine weapon for the present stores of breech-loading ammunition would be very great. That the general introduction of a magazine rifle will be sooner or later inevitable is no longer denied, but the change of armament will be deferred by Germany to as distant a date as possible, unless some one or other of the great European armies, by adopting the new arm, obliges Germany to follow her example.

The Standard.

MARKDALE APRIL. 10, 1884.

DO NOT WEARY, &c.

Some of our correspondents are doing admirably, and adding materially to the value of the STANDARD as a local paper by their almost weekly contributions; there are others who, well perhaps they have invested in oxen or purchased a farm or married a wife, and all with one accord begin to make excuse. We would like to hear from them again however. Send along the items, and do not be surprised if we should take the liberty of boiling them down, or even they should be left on too long and boil all away, try again. We want to know what is going on in every section of the district. Write on one side of the paper only, seal in an envelope, clip a piece of one end part way across, mark "Printers Copy" and put a one-cent stamp thereon, and those who are out of our printed envelopes will please let us know and we will renew their supply. Any who would like to contribute in the above line will please communicate.

ALMOST A MIRACLE.

MR. BURTON, whose sad accident we noticed last week, is now in a fair way for recovery. Drs. Barnhart of Owen Sound, Aikens of Toronto, and Wells of Barrie being Telegraphed for arrived on first train after the accident and, together with Dr. Carter of Markdale, rendered valuable Medical aid, the wounds consist in a broken thigh bone, two broken ribs and severely crushed across the kidneys. Had it not been that Mr. Burton was a strong robust man the results would probably have been fatal. The T. G. & B. Railway official coach was secured for the removal of Mr. B. to his home in Barrie and he was conveyed thereto via Cardwell Junction, and thence per Hamilton and Northwestern R. R. without change of car on Tuesday.

The Burton Bros. are a wealthy firm and are widely known as men of integrity. Great anxiety was felt by the employees of the firm in the timber business here, as also by our citizens, and we are glad to be able to say he is now out of danger.

WEDNESDAY, 9th.—We learn by telegraph, that Mr. Burton arrived safely at home, and is doing well.

Correspondence.

NOTICE.—We wish it distinctly understood that we do not hold ourselves responsible for the opinions expressed by our correspondents.

To the Editor of the STANDARD.

SIR,—Is it legal for an executor or executors to settle the estate of a deceased without public notice being given, Constant reader. Our opinion is that it is not legal to wind up such business without publishing an executors notice, for which there is a legal form. but you had better consult your solicitor for a definite answer, Ed.

B. C., March 21, 1884.

To Editor Standard:

DEAR SIR,—I again send you a few lines, trusting it may reach you. Mails are so very uncertain here that one never knows where to look either for letters or papers. This is now the 4th time I have addressed you from here. We have now fairly emmerged from a British Columbia winter. The three preceding months have passed and only two or three slight skifts of snow, which soon disappeared Like the past summer which was exceptionally dry, so has the winter followed with not one week's rain altogether since the month of November. This is something unlooked for by me; and I am told that the thermometer has not been below zero; but I must say that it frose pretty keen during the nights, and clear and bright sunshining days. I have been looking and waiting for the winter to set in, but have been pleasantly disappointed. Seeding has now commenced and every indication of beautiful weather.

Immigration has set in. Every boat from Victoria brings its quota. Among the passengers you find Canadians, Oregonians, Californians, and numbers from the lower province. A man from Oregon says they cannot live for fever and ague and malerial fevers in Oregon. I find quite a number from Ontario. Your old Johnnie, from Markdale, Browne. He is doing a rushing business in Westminster. He is said to be the best photographer in B. C. He adjusted his camera and took our picture in quick time out of friendship you know.

I feel very much afraid that this Immigration business will be overdone, as a great many will come without, or very little means, and will meet with disappointment. This country requires that you must have capital to make a successful start. 25 cents at home will go as far as a dollar here.

I do not like the system of taxation in B. C. It must have been nearly bankrupt at one time. You are not well landed when you are pounced upon for $2, road tax; then if the Revenue Collector get his eye on you, he will politely ask you to contribute the small sum of $3 to his department. Unimproved lands are heavily taxed. You have the municipal tax in addition. You cannot engage in any kind of business without a license, not even as a cattle drover. All schools are under government control; and teachers salaries range from $60 to $100 a month.

The country is rich in mineral, gold, iron, coal and fish, but its mountains of timber are, oh, you can form very little idea of these mountains; look where you will it is mountains winte with snow all the year round, and you must not venture into the bush, it is so dense you lose yourself in a few rods.

I must finish for this time. Perhaps this may be of no interest to your readers. I do not see my last letter to you in the paper.

This is the third letter we have received, all of which has been published. They are quite interesting, write again. ED.

Yours truly,
J. M. WEBSTER.

Personals.

S. G. Ketchum of the Hanover Post gave us a friendly call on Thursday last.

Miss Littlejohns returned to Leeds Co. on Tuesday.

Miss Millie Lyons, is gone to Collingwood to complete her Millinery education.

Dr. Campbell is in Dundalk this week,

Griffins Corners.

I send you a few items, Mr. Editor, from here, trusting that the STANDARD will find its way into many homes in our neighborhood. The Corners is not a very pretentious place. The business portion consists two stores, two blacksmiths, and one waggon shop. Mr. Austin is worthy of the patronage of the farmers wanting good rigs.

The hotel trade centres in Mr. O'Marra, who keeps a good hotel in a second-class house. We know persons who keep a second-class hotel in a first-class house. This is a fact. He alwas shows a clean front, while the Miss O'Marra, (the landlady) caters to the wants of the inner man abundantly and with exquisite taste. But we have our grievance; a pit-hole of misery, a mild term to apply to a grog shop; a license for which the Council of Bentinck and the Inspector should cancel, and confer a boon on the residents of three adjoining townships, whose interests centre here. The stock in trade in this liquor store consists in gallon or two, got as occasion demands, and served in the cellar and other dark rooms. Boys and young men who hardly ever enter the hotel, get drunk in this den, and sometimes make night hideous with their noises.

Miss McClements, of Latona, is suffering a great deal from cancer in the chest.

One of our young men got hard hit in the back with a stone while coming home from the D. Club a few evenings ago. His only offence was in escorting a lady home. Truly the boys are a jealous lot.

Mr. G. McDermid is home from the Medical College, Toronto.

THE FALSE PROPHET.

He who prophesies falsely of the weather, leaves off his flannels and overshoes, and catches cold, is indeed unwise. If you follow this false prophet your rescue lies in taking Hagyard's Pectoral Balsam. It is the best cough cure and the safest throat and lung remedy known to medical science.

SARGENT'S LOAD-LIFTING MACHINE,

PATENTED IN 1881.

JUST WHAT HAS BEEN WANTED FOR A CENTURY

Will save you from one to three hands every day you haul in grain or hay. It elevates the WHOLE LOAD, with the rack to which it is attached, at one operation, thus saving all the heavy work of pitching in a high mow or stack. Can house at least a quarter more in a day. Old farmers say it is the most valuable invention yet patented.

ANY DESIRED HEIGHT

In a moment, Parties desirous of making money should purchase a right, (Township or County) at once. They are selling fast. Those who invested last year are highly pleased with their speculation, and many of them have applied for additional territory. Address

Wm. Sargent, BERKELEY P. O.
PATENTEE.

☞ This machine was awarded FIRST PRIZE, and also highly recommended at INDUSTRIAL EXHIBITION, TORONTO, in 1883, and DIPLOMA at Provincial Exhibition at Guelph, also first prize and highly recommended at every exhibition where shown. ☜

See Testimonials below.

READ THE FOLLOWING.

MR. WM. SARGENT,
Dear Sir—I have been down to Markham and the load lifter is working splendidly. Our boys, as well as all the farmers who are using them, say they cannot speak too highly of them. I also send you the following testimonials.
Alma P.O., Aug. 27, 1888.

This is to certify that I purchased one of your Load Lifting Machines from Thomas Glassford, agent for Markham and Whitchurch, and have used it this harvest, and that I am well pleased with it. I believe it to be one of the best labor saving machines yet introduced, and would most strongly recommend it to all farmers.
HENRY D. SANDERS,
Sept. 4, '88. Fair Bank P.O., York Tp.

This is to certify that I have used one of Sargent's Load Lifting Machines and that it has given me entire satisfaction. I consider it one of the best labor saving machines yet introduced, and would most strongly recommend it to all farmers.
HENRY D. SANDERS,
Sept. 4, '88. Fair Bank P.O., York Tp.

The following are the names of others who are using Sargent's Patent Load Lifter with satisfaction, and whose testimonials our space will not admit of :—

MR. JOHN HANBURY, Brandon says in a letter of 2nd April, we are having beautiful weather now, and there was consid rable quantity of grain sowed in March. I am going to put in about two hundred acres of grain this year and after harvest I will give your readers an idea of how we do farming up here and the profits in it, if any.

MR. CHAS. PORTER, late of this office, goes to Collingwood this week to take a situation in one of the offices there. Charlie is a steady young man and a good practical printer, is a very clean compositor, is also tasty and skilful in job work. We wish him success.

MR. PANE, of this village, has invented a churn which is said to work well and do its work thoroughly. He has a number manufactured, and they are selling fast. We hope he has struck something valuable in the above, as hundreds have tried, and as many failed in their endeavors to invent improved means of churning.

OYSTER SUPPER.—Mr. Frank Wismer was treated, by the Gymnasium Club to an oyster supper at the Revere Hotel last Thursday evening on the eve of his departure for Toronto. After the oysters, salmon and sardines had been disposed of, songs and speeches were rendered in great style by some of the members of the club and others. Mr. Wismer rendered some very fine pieces on the violin. A very sociable and quiet time was spent. Mr. Wismer takes with him the best wishes of all.

THE steam snow plow for clearing railway tracks invented by Orange Jull, of Orangeville, has been patented by E. Leslie, and the first one built. A test was made on Tuesday, but sufficient power to run it could not be got from the locomotive, and a boiler for the purpose will be attached to the plow. Instead of pushing the snow aside this plow projects it 150 feet away. Those who have seen it pronounce it a success. A number of them will be in running order next season.—Shelburne Free Press.

FIRE IN HOLLAND.—On Saturday last the house of Mr. Fred. Janstz, about two miles south of Williamsford, caught fire and was totally consumed, the fire extending also to the barn, which was destroyed, with its contents. Mr. Janstz was away from home at the time, and his wife, who was sick in bed, had a narrow escape, some of the neighbors rescuing her after the roof had fallen in. The loss will fall heavily on Mr. Janstz, as there was no insurance, and much sympathy is felt for him in the neighborhood.—O. S. Times.

A STARTLING DISCOVERY.

Physicians are often startled by remarkable discoveries. The fact that Dr. King's New Discovery for Consumption and all Throat and Lung diseases is daily curing patients that they have given up to die, is startling them to realize their sense of duty, and examine into the merits of this wonderful discovery; resulting in hundreds of our best Physicians using it in their practice. LA SEVERINA.

The Tra l Sequel to an Abduction.

It was on the eve of the battle of Solferino. The French regiments, which had arrived from Milan du ing the day, by long and dusty roads, under a broiling sun, exhausted by fatigue, were encamped on an immense plain, shut in by a chain of hills, on which towered the white houses of the town. Lightning, playing among the leaden-colored clouds, illumined at intervals with lurid light the battle field of the morrow. Nothing else lit up the camp. No fires were allowed, as a measure of prudence.

All were not asleep, however. Besides the outposts and pickets, many in camp were wide awake. Here and there groups of men, lying on the grass around their tents, conversed in a low tone and discussed the probable issue of the coming battle.

In the middle of a small group of officers, who talked over the chances of the m rrow, was Col. Eugene de Valmont, who commanded a regiment of light dragoons. He had the well earned reputation of b ing one of the most splendid officers in his own branch of the service. Although a strict disciplinarian, he was beloved in the regiment by officers and men alike, and deservedly so.

Col. de Valmont appeared to pay but little attention to what was said. He seemed in a profound reverie, as he bit rather than smoked a half-consumed cigar. Turning suddenly to his surgeon-major, a veteran with a well-bronzed face, he said:

"Brisac, do you believe in presentiments?"

"It depends, Colonel. One may have them, no doubt; but to admit that they are ever realized is another matter."

"You look upon them as valueless, devoid of any prophetic importance?"

"Quite so."

"Ah! It is true, as is said, that all you doctors are more or less materialists." After a pause, he added: "You are right, perhaps, and so much the better. There are some thoughts which should be banished on the eve of a day like that to-morrow promises to be."

So saying he got up, and added: "I shall turn in and get some rest and advise you all to do the same. In a few hours we shall need all the strength we can command."

One by one the group broke off, and presently there were left only three officers—the Maj r, a captain and a sub-lieutenant.

"What did the Colonel mean by presentiments?" asked the younger of them. "We know he has no fear about to-morrow; yet his manner and his last words, to say the least, are not reassuring."

"Had you been longer in the regiment, young fellow," replied the Major, "you would know that the Colonel periodically gets the 'blues,' but we take no notice of them. They soon pass, and he becomes himself again."

"But what is the cause of his recurring depression?"

"The cause?" said the Captain, "Why, all the regiment know the cause."

"Except myself. I only joined three months ago."

"Well, here is Brisac back from his rounds. He can tell the story best."

The Surgeon-Major being appealed to, lay down upon the grass, lit a cigar, and said:

"In 1834 De Valmont, appointed lieutenant in the Chasseurs d' Afrique, which had just been raised, landed in Algiers, where I was assistant surgeon attached to the military hospital. Though I was older than he, we soon struck up an acquaintance that ripened into friendship, which time has not impaired. Eugene was young, good looking and a man of fascinating manners. He came of a distinguished family, and his friends kept his purse well filled; in short he could get money as fast as he wished to spend it.

"We served three years together, when De Valmont got leave to exchange and return to France. His mother was the cause of this, for she had in view for him a marriage with a rich heiress. Leaving Algiers would have been all plain sailing except for bidding 'farewell' to a certain lady called La Severina, a danseuse at the theatre. In appearance she was decidedly handsome, of an olive-colored complexion, and with raven black hair. In her large, expressive eyes and in her grimly cut mouth there was a significant indication of determination which suggested that the young lady would be more desirable as a friend than an enemy. She said she was an Italian, having been born at Rome, but her parents were Bohemians, who travelled through all countries—rope dancers by profession.

"La Severina had conceived for Eugene a passion as violent as it was hopeless. When she heard of his proposed departure she was wild; when she learned the motive of it she turned a demon. Failing in a determined attempt to baulk his plans by stabbing him with a stiletto, she assured him with her last words that she would be revenged. De Valmont laughed at the threat. I, however, determined to keep my eye on the actions of the young lady. In this resolve, however, I was foiled. She left Algiers about a month after, and I never knew what became of her.

"Nearly four years had passed since Eugene's return. We kept up a constant correspondence, and I learned of his marriage and the birth of one son, whom he called Lucien. He continually pressed me to exchange and go back to France.

"At length I got appointed to a cavalry regiment quartered in Paris, and left Algiers to take on my new duties. Landing at Marseilles, I put up at the hotel Castellane, where the first names I read in the list of arrivals were those of the Count and Countess de Valmont. Eugene introduced me to his wife—a lady as lovely as she was charming—and showed me with pride his son—a fine chubby child, with curly hair, and the splendid blue eyes of its mother. He simply worshipped this boy—poor fellow!—and his life and soul seemed wrapped up in his being and existence. And now to the sad sequel of my tale.

"De Valmont was on leave, and at his wife's desire they were about to visit Italy. Not to fatigue the child their route was mapped out in short stages. They were resting two days at Marseilles before going to Genoa by La Corniche, so I decided to stay and see them off.

"In the afternoon of my arrival, as the weather was glorious, little Lucien was sent with his nurse down to the sea, on that magnificent beach where the splendid palace of Prado stands. Two hours after the nurse returned alone, looking like a mad woman. The eyes were starting out of her head, and sobbing and crying, she threw herself at the Countess's feet, and said she had lost the child. She and her charge were playing on the beach, when they were attracted by the performance of some acrobats. A small crowd had assembled, and the boy was not out of her sight for half a minute. On looking round he was gone; and she sought him in vain. He seemed to have been spirited away. She called his name at the top of her voice and ran up and down the beach until exhausted. Bystanders who heard her cries helped her in the search; but they found—nothing.'

"Was Lucien drowned?" asked the sub-lieutenant.

'This was the question started, but it seemed well nigh impossible. The child could only toddle, and the sea was too far from the place indicated by the nurse. So this hypothesis was given up. The police considered it a case of kidnapping, and went to work, but failed to find a clue. They searched for weeks through all the slums of the city—the low quarters where the dregs of the population congregate, the scum of the Mediterranean—but with no success. A description of the child was sent to every consul, with orders to make full inquiry. De Valmont himself obtained special leave of absence from the war office and spent a year in trying to solve the mystery. He returned more dead than alive to bury his wife, whom grief had killed.

"As to the Colonel, at first he had serious intention of joining the Trappists and retiring from the world. But hope sustains him still. He believes, if his boy was not drowned, that Providence will take pity on him. Vain delusion! But we humor him in his hope. He has since devoted his whole life and soul to his regiment; but the wound at his heart was never healed, and when it breaks out afresh he becomes sad and sorrowful and talks about presentiment.

"La Severina, I believe has kept her word, and wreaked a terrible revenge!"

Brisac finished his story and wished all good-night.

"We have six hours for sleep, my boys, and then—!"

On the morrow, at the early hour of six o'clock, a double line of smoke extended for a distance of two miles on each side of the plain. The French had brought almost all their guns into action. The Austrian batteries posted on the opposite hills replied with a well directed fire. In this artillery duel, which lasted for some hours, the advantage remained with the French. The superiority of the Austrian position was more than counterbalanced by the deadly effect of the rifled guns of the French, which were first employed in warfare at the memorable battle of Solferino. The carnage was frightful and the result disastrous to the Austrians, who were obliged to retreat.

At 3 o'clock on that day—23rd June, 1859—the French were formed up to advance under a withering musketry fire to assault the Tower of Solferino, the key of the enemy's position. Marshal Benedek then called on his cavalary to make a supreme effort which had it been successful, would have changed the fortunes of the day. The Austrian cavalry were massed behind a fringe of wood which effectually concealed their movements from the French. Suddenly they were seen to emerge from their shelter and to prepare for a determined charge, to take in flank those battalions which had already reached the slopes of the hills. Gen. Niel saw the danger, and immediately hurled against them the Marguerite division of cavalry, in which De Valmont's Light Dragoons charged in the first line.

The shock was terrific! The elements contributed to swell the frightful storm of war. Peals of thunder bellowed forth and vivid lightning played over the ghastly sight beneath.

It was after the delivery of the charge "home" that Col. de Valmont suddenly saw rise before him about a dozen hussars, in white, of the Archduke Albrecht's regiment. Led by a young lieutenant with fair hair and a budding moustache, they sabered the French dragoons with maniacal fury, making their way through them like a cannon ball. With one bound of his horse the lieutenant was by the Colonel. De Valmont saw his sabre flash as he raised it to cut him down. He had only time to pull the trigger of his pistol, and the Austaian fell, killed by a bullet in the forehead.

At the end of the engagement Col. de Valmont, returning to camp, passed over the scene of the conflict. The body of the lieutenant still lay there on its back. A thin trickle of blood marked the spot of the wound. The face of the young officer was as calm and placid as a child asleep. De Valmont gazed at him with profound emotion. A few yards off some dismounted men were guarding Austrian prisoners, among whom was an officer of Albrecht's hussars. Pointing to the dead body, the Colonel asked:

"Sir, can you tell me the name of that brave fellow?"

"Karl Gottfried," was the answer.

One month after the peace of Villafranca, Eugene De Valmont returned to Paris with the Army of Italy, where he found the following letter awaiting his arrival:

MILAN, 6th August, 1859.

MY DEAR OLD FRIEND: You know I am still at the military Hospital here, where I shall remain until all our wounded are removed. They brought in the other day, several marauders caught by our men rifling the dead, and on some of them who tried to escape, they fired. Among them was an old woman disguised as a man. A bed was found for her, as she was on the point of death. I offered my services to dress her wound, and judge of my amazement when I heard her say: "You don't remember me, De Brisac. I am La Severina." Under the withered features of the woman I recognized your former acquaintance in Algiers. By what series of misfortunes she came to be a despoiler of the dead, I shall not attempt to explain. Enough to know that before dying she allowed the priest to communicate a part of her confession, and, as I have for long thought, she it was who stole Lucien at Marseilles!

After a host of adventures, which I shall tell you later on, poverty compelled her to abandon the child at Vienna. She left it to the charity of the landlord where she lodged—No. 20 Rosenstrasse—and never heard of the boy after. This address will give you some trace. Apply at once to the Austrian Embassy. Tout a toi.

BRISAC.

Mad with joy, the Colonel ran to the embassy and explained the object of his mission. For a fortnight after, which seemed to him a lifetime, he lived in a fever of suspense, and was going to bed one night, when his valet brought him an official letter with a large red seal bearing the Austro. Hungarian arms. He read as follows:

MONSIEUR LE COMTE: I am instructed by the Minister of Foreign Affairs to inform you, in answer to your inquiries, that the child abandoned in Vienna, at the address given, on the 20th of September, 1846, was adopted by benevolent a gentleman. He was educated at the Military School of Olmutz, which he left last year with the rank of sub-lieutenant. Posted to S. A. T., the Archduke Albrecht's regiment of hussars, he was killed at the battle of Solferino. He bore the name of his adopted father, Karl Gottfried.

One hour afterwards the valet entered the Colonel's room, and found him sitting in his chair! His face was deadly white. His eyes dilated and immovable, were fixed upon the fatal letter.

The servant touched him lightly on the shoulder, and his master dropped motionless on the floor.

He was dead.

Oscar Wilde's Mother.

Clever man as Oscar Wilde certainly is, he has had the art to get himself laughed at to an extent that would startle, if not subdue, a man less bold. It has not greatly troubled him, and he tells his innocent little tales about himself, and puts himself at the mercy of contemporary wits, with as placid and self-approving a smile as ever.

But there is one side of him which the public does not know, and that is the kindly, dutiful, domestic side; for a better son and brother than Oscar Wilde it would be hard to find.

His mother, Lady Wilde, is a woman of strong mind and a warm heart; but she is far more eccentric than Oscar himself. She is full of enthusism, and her mind is so fresh, she forgets that her life's spring is over, and wears at sixty the colors and the fashions of sixteen. She looks, sometimes, very much as if one of Madame Tussaud's wax-works, suddenly endowed with a voice and a smile and a touch of Irish blarney, had gone forth to make a visit.

She wears the spotted white muslin of the debutante, with pink feathers or roses, and a white lace veil, and she amuses with her aspect as much as she entertains with her tongue. And beside her, on these occasions, you will see Oscar, unconscious, apparently, that there is anything about her other than her wit to provoke a smile, and devoting himself to her with the most respectful and assiduous tenderness. An American friend who had just formed Lady Wilde's acquaintance, made some comment to Oscar on his mother's kindness of heart.

"You may well say that," was the answer. "No one knows her so well as I do, and I give you my word that from my earliest recollection I have never heard her say an unkind thing of any human creature. She is incapable of harshness or injustice. No one is ever condemned in her presence but she finds something to offer in his defence—no one assailed without her coming to the rescue. In all my life, I have never heard from her one harsh judgment, one uncharitable word; and its not everyone who could say that of a witty and clever mother."

"Happy the son who can," was the answer; and must it not also be true that the son of such a mother has something in him that will survive his follies, and outlive his absurdities?

Teach the Boys to Use Tools.

Last year a friend of mine, who has three boys, selected a Chest of Tools as a premium for collecting clubs for an agricultural paper, and surprised and delighted the lads with it. They went to work and fitted themselves up a workshop in the loft over the waggon-shed, and there they contrive to spend many an hour pleasantly and profitably. My friend said to me, "I am surprised to see how proficient the boys are becoming in the use of their tools. Why, they have made us many little articles for use about the house and barn, to more than pay for the cost of the tools, if I had bought them for cash, and if they keep on thus, a carpenter will be unneccessary here." This experience can be repeated in any family where there are boys, to the satisfaction and benefit of all concerned. Give the boys a chance to show what they can do. A set of tools will keep them busy on rainy days and odd spells, and out of mischief. Every success will encourage them in larger undertakings, and quite unconsciously they will develop a knowledge of mechanics which will be practical and useful to themselves and others all their lives, and almost every day, the year round, on the farm, about the house, anyway, and everywhere. The cost of a set of tools good enough for them to experiment with, is small, and cannot be invested to better account. If you can not spare the money, encourage them to get up a club for a paper giving premium chests of tools. If they do not quite succeed, help by contributing a little cash for the difference. The investment will come back before you know it. Most farmers having more expensive tools, do not like to have boys use them for fear of possible damage, and they grow up almost entirely ignorant of saw, and plane, and chisel. Let them have tools of their own, and show them how to take proper care of them. Teach them all you know about them, and set them at little easy jobs. When they do these well, let them know their work is appreciated, and they will become ambitious to do still better work, and take pride in it; so will you, when you come to see that they are able to do what you have herotofore depended on outside labor for. One of the most convenient things about the house or farm, is a man who can use tools.

Not Left Out.

There were three of 'em on the corner. One said that his wife was cleaning house and had every room upset.

The second observed that he had just left six painters at work on his house.

The third said he was tearing out partitions and building on a wing.

The fourth smiled sadly and added that he was going to have four ceilings whitewashed, three rooms repapered, a chimney torn out and his hall widened.

"Gentleman," said the fifth man as he drew a long breath, "I don't want to be looked upon as one who is trying to crowd out of his fair share of the world's misery, and I therefore take this opportunity of informing you that, in order to buy new carpets and a parlor suite, I have been obliged to mortgage my house and shall probably lose it."

BOUND FOR ARCTIC LANDS.

The Staunch Ships that will Steam North to Succor Greely.

"I've been mate of a merchant ship, a big ship too, and I never had better quarters at sea than these men will have, while as for grub ——"

No combination of letters will represent the smack of his lips which ended the words of the old sailor on the Thetis, recently at the Brooklyn Navy Yard, who was talking of the Greely relief party.

In July, 1881, the steam whaler, Proteus was chartered by the Government to take Lieut. Greely, his assistants, Lieuts Klingsburg and Lockwood, five officers of the Signal Corps, and fifteen enlisted men to Lady Franklin Bay. These twenty-three men went north to man one of the eleven polar stations which the leading Governments of the world had agreed to maintain within the Arctic zone to make simultaneous scientific observations.

It was one of the best equipped parties that ever went north. The outfit included a comfortable house. Dr. Rae of London, an authority on Arctic matters, wrote that its equipment of dogs and sledges was superior to that of any previous party. The hope was expressed that, in addition to its scientific duties, the party would be able to take up the work of Sir George Nares, where he left it, and add many miles of explored coast line to the maps of Greenland.

The food supplies were ample to last over two years, but the hunters were expected to supplement these supplies. While the Proteus remained with the party twenty musk oxen were brought in. A large part of the meat was packed in snow for winter use. This was considered only a beginning of the operations.

Relief expeditions were to be sent anually from the United States, but so far none has succeeded in reaching Lieut. Greely. The expedition of last yeat under Lieut. Garlington resulted in the loss of the Proteus and a demonstration of the incapacity of Gen. Hazen to direct such matters.

The expedition of this year will consist of three steamers—the Thetis, the Bear, and the Alert. The Thetis is the flagship. She was a whaler, and was bought in Dundee, Scotland. She is now at the Brooklyn Navy Yard with as many men at work on her as can stand on the different decks without jostling each other.

The Bear was a St. Johns sealer. She has been at the Navy Yard some time, and work has so far progressed that a visit to her gives some idea of what is needed for an Arctic cruise

When the Bear arrived she was a greasy and foul-smelling ship, with unscraped spars and rusty metal work. A gang of men went to work at her the same day. The upper spars were sent down and the rigging was stripped off. The hold was cleaned out and the cabin bulkheads were knocked out. When the dismantling was finished there remained a hull and three lower masts, and a boiler and engine which were in good condition.

Then, when she was in the dry dock, heavy cant pieces, or sticks of timber having a triangular cross section were bolted on each side of the keel and up through the garboard streaks to protect the keel from ice. Heavy straps of iron were placed around the forefoot. The hulk formerly had a few crossbeams beeween decks, but additional ones were put in and a three-inch deck laid on them. New stanchions were put in from the keel to the berth deck and from the berth deck to the spar deck. From the centre of the berth deck beams diagonal braces run to the bilge strokes on either side, to strengthen the frame in case of a nip in the ice. At the same time two water-tight bulk-heads were put in.

A new jibboom was put in and part of a new suit of rigging. The running gear is all new. The floor of the cabin is on a level with the berth deck. It was first ceiled with inch pine, at a distance of four inches from the walls of the ship and the bulkhead. Two layers of fearnaught, a gray woolen felt nearly a quarter of an inch thick were tacked to the ceiling, and another pine ceiling was nailed over that. The four-inch air space was to secure the cabin from dampness.

The quarters for the men are built on deck. Beginning at the break of the top-gallant forecastle, a house 26 feet wide and 40 feet long was built on the main deck. The bulwarks were extended up, forming two-foot gangways on each side of the house. These were decked over and doors put in at each end, thus forming air spaces. The walls of the house were made with four-inch air spaces and traps were put in along the decks so that the snow which forms in the spaces from condensed moisture can be cleared out.

The house is lined like the officers' cabin. Inside there are twenty-six large berths, with lockers beneath. A skylight with a scuttle for ventilation, is put in the upper deck. A small stove will keep the air dry. The house is put on deck to secure dryness, and in this respect the men are probably better cared for than the officers.

The estimated cost of the alterations in the Bear was $29,850. This does not include the rigging or engines. Five whale boats, two dories, and a thirty-foot steam whale boat will complete the outfit of boats.

The men will receive, in addition to a comfortable lot of thick ordinary flannel clothing, a suit of deerskin lined with lamb's wool and a deerskin bag, which will wholly envelope the body and cover the head, except the face. These will be found very comfortable when on lookout or travelling on sleds.

No house has been built over the wheel as is commonly done on California clippers that round the Horn. A canvas screen will partially serve instead during bad weather.

The bill of fare which excited the approbation of the old sailor is very long. It begins with 32,750 pounds of bread, and ends with assorted flavoring extracts. It includes an almost unlimited quantity of cured, cooked, and canned domestic meats. These are supplemented by generous amounts of roast chicken, roast turkey, fried oysters, turtle and ox tail soup, and other delicacies. Fruits and vegetables are abundant. The list contains 111 different articles which when on board will weigh about seventy-five tons.

The sledges, which are nearly constructed, are made after designs furnished by Chief Engineer Melville, and consist of two stoutly-made frames shaped like a shuttle and joined together by straps of hide.

The Thesis, which is to be the flagship and the leading exploring vessel, was Dundee whaler, built especially for the regions. She will probably start north a few days in advance of the Bear, and will provided with an outfit of boats and sledges and Arctic clothing like the other vessels.

The Alert, which has sailed from London, was presented by the English Government to the United States. She is one of the most substantial wooden vessels of the British navy and when fitted out for Arctic expedition of 1875 6 an enormous amount of money was expended upon her. Her hull was planked with teak as a protection against the ice. She is reported in sound condition, and her masts, yards, anchors, and boats, which have been stored at Sheerness since October, 1882 have been restored to her.

THE LATE PRINCE LEOPOLD.

An Unreported Disaster and its Consequences—Life of the Prince.

A most extraordinary presentiment on the part of Prince Leopold is now related on the highest authority. On his way to Cannes the Prince was conveyed aboard the fine private yacht owned by his favorite companion, Capt. Perceval. It is not generally known that this yacht was wrecked with the royal party aboard in the Gulf of Napoule and when but a short distance off Cannes. The wreck of the craft was complete, but no lives were lost, as help was near at hand. But the young prince was much prostrated by alarm, and upon his recovery issued the strictest orders to keep secret the story of the accident, because he feared the result of the intelligence upon the health of the Princess. That afternoon, when Leopold had safely reached his private apartments in the Villa Nevada, he lay down to sleep away his nervousness. When he awoke he sent for Capt. Perceval, and talked with him about the wreck. Leopold was unusually melancholy. He sat at a window overlooking the beautiful bay, and casting a sorrowful look towards the place where the accident occurred, said plaintively:—

"Perceval, I don't know why it is, but I have the most gloomy forebodings. I have such ill-luck. I would not mind it if it affected me only. But my evil fate seems determined to make my friends share my misfortunes. I believe I am doomed to bring sorrow and disaster to all those I desire to be with me as my friends. This feeling oppressed me inexpressibly to-day, and I have been unable to rid myself of the thought that I would rather die here than anywhere else I have ever been."

Capt. Perceval tried to argue the Prince out of his melancholy, but failed to effect his purpose. Leopold died in Perceval's arms in the very room and before the very window where he confided to him his forebodings.

His Royal Highness the late Leopold George Duncan Albert, Duke of Albany, was the fourth and youngest son and eighth child of Her Majesty the Queen. He was born at Buckingham Palace on the 7th day of April, 1853. He was named for the Queen's uncle, the late King of the Belgians. In early childhood the rare qualities of his mind attracted attention, and his early education was specially cared for by the Prince Consort. His health, always delicate, was greatly impaired by an attack of measles in 1861, when he was sent under the care of Sir Edward Bowater, and later of Col. Cavendish, to Cannes, where he resided for over a year. From 1862 to 1876 he was under the tutorship of Doctor Duff assisted by various Eton masters and then under Mr. Duckworth. His health had not improved much, though under the special care of physicians like Dr. Legg and Dr. Vivian Poore. When the Queen was attacked in 1872 by O'Connor in the grounds of the park, Prince Leopold was with her, and during the trial was called as a witness and gave his evidence, we are told, "in a loud, clear voice." In November 1872 the Prince went to Oxford, where his studies included physical sciences, geology physiology, history under five lecturers, and political economy. Modern languages as well as classics were also studied, and special lectures like those on Poetry by Ruskin, and Music by Max Muller he attended. The science of sanitation, a very practical course under Dr. Ackland, he also studied. In 1874 he was attacked by typhoid fever from which his recovery for a time appeared doubtful, but, under Sir Wm. Jenner's care, he came through, though the effect upon his delicate constitution was great and he has never been strong since. On his attaining his majority in the same year, he was granted the usual annuity of parliament without a division. From 1874 to 1879 he travelled a great deal in Europe spending much of his time in the South on the shores of the Mediterranean. In 1880 he visited America, and, as the Princess Louise was then in Canada, he visited all the principal cities and fished and hunted in our streams and rivers. Unfortunately he met with an accident by which he became quite lame. In this year he met Princess Helen of Waldeck, at the watering place of Baden and in 1880 his engagement to her was announced and on the 27th of April, 1882, he was married. The palace of Claremont was given him for a residence. During the last few years, the Duke of Albany has, by lectures and addresses, done much in England for the cause of education. In a few days he would have attained his thirty-first year. His sudden death will cause much sorrow, not only for the sake of his mother, our beloved Queen, but also for his own, as he had won the highest esteem and regard by his thoughtful and kind interest in the welfare of the people of the Empire. He leaves one daughter, born January 16th, 1883, at Windsor Castle.

Slander.

God has fixed a great responsibility upon language. One of the greatest sins of the lips is detraction—the blasting of a good name. Men have toiled and died, and they must still toil and die to leave a good name. What must be the depravity, the unspeakable smallness and meanness of that miserable poltroon who robs a fellow being of his reputation! When at the last day that unpardonable and hell born poltroon shall be called to answer for his words, Jehovah's eyes shall transfix his wretched soul, and Jehovah shall say, "Let his coronation be the summit of torment."—Dr. Newman.

"He stood six feet two in his stockings and every inch a man," says an exchange. Hem That is 74 inches; "every inch a man," would make 74 men. This must be the same identical customer who was a "host in himself."

An impostor has been passing himself off as a clergyman at Manchester. He has proposed to solemnize marriages, and various misled couples find themselves in an awkward predicament. The police discovered the fraud, and the delinquent decamped, but he was followed up and captured at Yarmouth. The punishment will be very severe.

Ladies who attend royal drawing rooms are gravely dissatisfied because the queen has deputed the Princess of Wales to receive the guests, and merely sends Princess Beatrice to gather the gossip of the ceremony and tell her what everybody wore, how much of the comely person of Mrs. Langtry, the professional beauty, was visible to the naked eye.

A newspaper observer in the Soudan declares that every effort yet made to repress the slave trade has only "increased the hardships of the victims, and that a withdrawal of interference, even if unaccompanied by other measures, would be a humane act. He finds reason to hope, however, that recent events may give a real death-blow to the trade.

It was formerly supposed that horse marines were at least as mythical as the Greek centaurs; but all that seems changed. A telegram from Suakim informed the world the other day that "some of the marines are being mounted." Thus a horse marine is no longer a myth, but a steam reality. So one by one vanish the most cherished illusions of our early days.

Some of the claimant's friends called upon him the other day at the Portsmouth convict prison, one of whom announced that he was in possession of an official document showing that Arthur Orton had been in a lunatic asylum since 1871. The claimant declined to entertain any proposal with reference to his financial position, determining to deliberate in the matter after his release.

Prince Odescalchi, one of the clerical alderman of Rome, has called the attention of the Pope to the fact that many children, wandering in the streets of Rome, have been cruelly abandoned by their parents, who come from the provinces and leave their children to take care of themselves. Rome is infested by these little ones, who make a living by selling matches and help to swell the ranks of the vicious classes.

Recent events in the Soudan do not appear to have excited much interest among the native journalists of India. They confine themselves, as a general rule, to a discussion of the probability of the employment of an Indian contingent against the Arabs, and to protesting that the expenses of such a contingent should not be charged against India—which country, they maintain, has no interest in the campaign.

A few nights ago at Vienna an Englishman named Cumberland showed to a select party in the crown prince's apartments most of the spiritualist tricks, explaining afterwards how they were done. He guessed his spectators' thoughts, and led them to guess they were thinking about. The crown prince and princess, the Archduke Rainer and his wife, and several adjutants were led through the palace in this manner.

The press of Switzerland is at last lifting its voice in protest against the manner in which certain notorious anarchists abuse the right of asylum in the Helvetian republic. A number of socialist agitators, who have left their country—mostly Germany—for their country's good, have their abode at Zurich; and several of the Swiss newspapers call upon the Zurich police to take more effective measures against these men.

The African explorer, Maj. Serpa Pinto, fought a duel with Viscount Roberedo of Portugal. The meeting took place at Campo Grande, in the suburbs of Lisbon. Pistols were the weapons selected. The Viscount inflicted five wounds on his antagonist, who, according to the conditions of the duel, was obliged to continue till the physicians in attendance declared that one of the adversaries could not continue the contest.

Jebel Naibo, an isolated mountain in Africa, eight hundred feet high, is slowly sinking into the earth. Already there is a pool of water round its foot. The district in which has once before witnessed a similar proof of the instability of the earth's crust. Lake Fezara did not exist in the time of the Romans, but on the contrary the site is occupied by a town whose ruins have been found at the bottom of the lake.

The annual return of the volunteer corps of Great Britain for 1883 shows that the total number enrolled in that year (209,365), is the highest in the history of the force. The number of efficients were 202,428, as against 199,374 in 1882, and 219,152 in 1881, the largest number previously recorded. And the percentage of efficients to enrolled was 96,69, against 96.16, and 96,08 in the two previous years; and the percentage of men present at inspections to enrolled was also higher than ever before.

The grand general staff of the German army having now completed its history of the Franco-German war, it has been resolved to do the same thing, on as complete and comprehensive as scale as possible, for the campaigns of Frederick the Great. Marshal Von Moltke has therefore issued an appeal to the nation for a sight or loan of all hitherto unpublished documents, maps, and plans, bearing on the subject which may help the writers in the execution of their huge and patriotic task.

A bill has been introduced into the House of Commons which is designed to remove a nuisance of which visitors to the Highlands have frequently complained. Its object is to prevent visitors, who go in search of Sunday recreation to the glens and mountains of Scotland, being interfered with by keepers and game-keepers without reasonable ground being shown. The passage of the bill is doubtful, but an interesting debate is sure it is anticipated.

The Italian ministry of agriculture and commerce reports that the sulphur mines produced 42,000,000 lire, the lead mine 8,-000,000, and the zinc and iron minea 4,-000,000 lire each; that 589 mines are at work now, with a total output of 70,619,-000 lire. The year 1881 has been the most unfortunate regarding mining accidents; among 45,320 workmen employed 126 accidents happened, resulting in 184 deaths and 121 seriously wounded. The most fatal accident recorded is one in the sulphur mines Gessolungo, in Sicily, where 100 persons were killed.

London Truth tells the following,—"A week or two ago one of our best-known peeresses gave her maid a month's notice, accompanying the warning by a slap on the face. The maid said nothing at the time, but brooded over her wrongs. On the day that her month was up, after she had received her wages, and her boxes had been placed upon a cab, she went up-stairs and commenced to 'do' her mistress' hair. Having deftly fastened it to the back of a chair, she calmly proceeded to administer a series of slaps to the somewhat highly-colored cheeks which were ready to her hands. Then, with a low courtesy, she took herself off."

Bears and Wolves.

It would be difficult in all nature to find two wild animals so diametrically opposed in appearance, habits and character, as the bear and the wolf. Yet it would be difficult in all poetry to find two animals more intimately associated. The shambling, fruit-eating, retiring, straight-forward and mild-mannered bear, has nothing in common with the agile, flesh-preferring, aggressive, treacherous and ferocious wolf. Nevertheless, in poetry they are as punctually and arbitrarily bracketed together as larks and linnets, or apes and asses.

Bruin has had to suffer much in consequence, first of all, of the ignominious familiarity which its dancing and being bated have induced; and, secondly, of its unfortunate personal appearance. But when it sets itself going after any one it wishes to catch, the bear displays an agility and address which those who have been hunted by it declare to be amazing. And when it wishes to get beetle-grubs out of the ground, ants out of their nest, honey out of a bee tree, fruit from a slender bough, or birds' eggs out of a nest, it shows itself to be as ingenious and skillful as any other animal that has to live by its wits. To get, for instance, at the beetle-grubs, it scratches off the upper earth, and then sucks them up out of the ground—an application of a scientific process which no animal without a prodigious reserve af air-force could hope to accomplish.

When it wishes to empty an ant hive, it knocks the top off with its paw, and then, applying its mouth to the central gallery of the nest, inhales its breath forcibly, thereby setting up such a current of air that all the ants and their eggs come whirling up into his mouth like packets through a pneumatic tube. When robbing bees it does not get stung, and when after wild apricots or acorns, it not only balances itself with all the judgment of a rope walker, but uses its weight very cleverly so as to bring other bought within reach of its curved claws. Nor while doing this does it conceal what it is about. On the contrary, when sucking at an ant heap, or grub hole, it makes such a noise that on a still evening it can be heard a quarter of a mile off, and when up a tree, and not alarmed, it goes smashing about among the boughs as if bears were not only the rightful lords of the manor, but as if these were no such things as enemies in the world.

Ruins of the Tuileries.

The blackened and charred ruins of the palace of the Tuileries, which remained for twelve years an eyesore to every visitor of Paris, have at last entirely disappeared. The boarding remains, but when this and the wooded erections, which temporarily serve as offices for the general post-office until the new building is completed, are removed there will be nothing to break the view from the Louvre right up to the triumphal arch at the head of the Champs Elysees.

The site of the Tuileries, as is well known, was in the sixteenth century a field for the making of tiles, and outside the walls of Paris. Its connection with royaly dates only from Valois times. It served as a country-house for Louis of Savoy, Catharine de Medici, wife of Henry II., who made great improvements on the building. But even after it assumed the appearance of a palace the Tuileries was seldom visited by the kings of France. It was only after the outbreak of the revolution that Louis XVI. took up his abode there, and his stay was of short duration. Napoleon made this palace his home as first consul and as emperor, and effected great alterations. Louis XVIII., Charles X., Louis Phillippe, and Napoleon III. followed, each making changes of different kinds. It was during the reign of Napoleon III. that the Tuileries was connected with the Louvre and the magnificent square completed.

The only large ruin that now remains as a remembrancer of the "semaine sanglante" is the office of archives, on the opposite side of the Seine. Why it has been allowed to remain so long it would be difficult to say, as it appears to be less injured by the fire, so far as the outward walls and columns are concerned, than any of the buildings which suffered through the "bloody week" of 1871. The new Hotel de Ville on the site of the former one is now completed, and a very handsome building it is. All the departments of the municipal council are installed in their rooms in the new edifice.

Crockery Making.

Crockery-ware has many names—pottery, delf, crockery, china. The Chinese understood its manufacture a long time ago; but as far as we can find out, the art of making it was known still earlier—among the people who lived in Palestine before the time of Moses. The ware was of a very rough, rude sort, but it answered every purpose. It was at first made of clay, mixed with water, and baked hard and brown. The Chinese, however, learned how to make it in more beautiful and delicate style as far back as 185 years B. C. The finer kinds were first introduced into Europe about the year 1500.

The calcined flints which makes the fine white cups and saucers was discovered by a potter named Astbury. In 1720 he was travelling from his native town to London on horse back, and he found that his horse's eyes were deceased. On the way he stopped at an inn, and asked the hostler to see what he could do for his horse. The man took a piece of flint and burned it, and then powdered it fine and blew it into the horse's eyes. While watching the operation the potter noticed that the powder was beautifully white, and he at once said to himself: "That powder will mix well with my clay, and I can make fine, white dishes." He did so, and it was a success.

HOW SOME JOURNALISTS ARE PAID.

Large Salaries Given by Leading London Dailies.

I remember very well what a thrill ran through the country press when it was announced that Mr. W. H Hurlbert, who was then taken charge of the editorial columns of the New York World, was to receive for his services $12,000 a year. The figures were cited to show how far we had advanced in civilized ways, when an editor could command such a salary as that. All this occurred years ago in the "flush times" of the country, and I do not know that the example thus set has been greatly followed. "But they order these things better in England," by which I mean that newspaper work is much better paid for there than in America. When Mr. Delane undertook the editorial charge of the London Times he was paid £4,000, about 20,000 of our dollars. Mr. Buckle, the new editor of that journal, a young man of thirty, without any previous experience, commences his official term on of £5,900, or $25,000. Mr. Edward Lawson, the editor of the London Telegraph, is its owner, and so is not on a salary, but the two senior editors of that journal, Mr. Edwin Arnold, and Mr J. M. Le-Sage, receive each a salary of $17 000 in our money. The Standard which is next in circulation of the great London dailies to the Telegraph, does not pay as well as its mighty rival, for the editor, Mr. Mudford, gets only $15,000 per annum. The Daily News, the organ of English liberals and the third in circulation of the English metropolitan journals, pays to its editor the extremely comfortable yearly salary of $20,000. The editor of the Manchester Guardian, easily the most powerful and influential country newspaper (meaning outside of London) in England, pays its chief editor $15,000, and two members of the staff, who each write only four articles a week, $7,500.

Mr. Stead, the editor of the Pall Mall Gazette, gets $10,000, and the leading writer of that journal, Mr. Milner, is paid at the rate of $8,000 yearly. He is a young man, and amuses himself with literary work, which he need not do if he does not care to, as he possesses an independent income from a very large fortune. Some of the weeklies of London

PAYS VERY HANDSOMELY.

Mr. Hutton, who is at the head of the Spectator, gets $10,000. Mr. Pollock, of the Saturday Review, receives the same sum as his confrere of the Spectator, and Mr. Frederick Greenwood, who steers the St James' Gazette through the tortuous mazes of English politics, gets for doing it $9,000, while Mr. F. C. Burnand, who not only edits Punch, but writes its sharp Parliamentary criticisms, receives $15,000 a year for his double duty. Besides the regular staff of the great dailies there are always attached to each of them several outside contributors, who have certain special lines of information. For example, Mr. Charles Marvin, who knows more about Central Asia and the Turcoman tribes in the Merv oasis than any one else in England since the death of poor Donovan, writes the articles which have lately appeared in the London Times on this subject. Just now England wants to know all about that curious region, as Russia is pushing its way to India by the Merv route, and therefore Mr. Marvin's years of gathered knowledge can now be utilized to his very great pecuniary advantage. Mr. Archibald Forbes' slashing articles on the Egyptian war in "the journal of the largest Liberal circulation in the world," as the News proudly denominates itself, are admirable in the matter of criticism, although he has no personal knowledge of the region in which General Graham's troops are meeting with such an obstinate resistance. The time will come when the fourth estate will meet in America with that liberal pecuniary encouragement it has after a long struggle attained in England.

Loved Imprisonment.

Almost half a century ago, Charles Dickens, in his "American Notes" wasted a large amount of gush and sentimentality over the unhappy fate of a certain convict with whom he was allowed to converse at the Pennsylvania penitentiary, with the result of making both the prison and the prisoner famous, the latter, whose name was Charles Langheimer, having been known ever since, as "Dickens's Dutchman." But the great novelist's sympthy for the unfortunate convict, which would have been ridiculously extravagent even had the latter been all that he was painted, was, after all, entirely misplaced, for the fellow no sooner got out of the penitentiary than he made all possible haste to got in again, and kept up the practice so peristently that he has never remained outside the walls more than a few weeks at a time for the last fifty of his seventy-five years of life. A little while ago he was discharged again, by the expiration of his sentence, but came back to the prison of his own accord and asked to be taken in without going through the formality of committing a crime, and bring tried and sentenced. His request was granted and a few days ago he died, within the walls which had been his home for two thirds of his life.

A Dog's Intelligence.

James A. Atkinson, proprietor of the Sherman House, Cleveland, Ohio, numbers among his possessions a valuable dog and cow. The other evening the dog was noticed running and jumping against the laundry door as if anxious to attract attention. Kate O'Donnell, the laundry girl, went out to see what was the matter, when the animal, looking up into her face, wagged his tail and darted towards the stable. As she stood there he moved backward and forward as if anxious for her to follow. She finally went to the stable, where she found the cow choking to death. Mr. Atkinson arrived in time to remove a large carrot which was lodged sideways in the animal's throat, and but for the intelligence of the dog would have cost the cow its life. — Cleveland Leader.

A CASE MUCH TALKED OF.

The case of Mr. John Morrison, of St. Ann's, N. S., who was afflicted with a serious disposical disease of the kidneys. The best medical aid having failed, his life was despaired of. Two bottles of Burdock Blood Bitters cured him. His statement is vouched for by J. D. McLeod, J. P., who knew of his condition. The cure is considered marvellous in his town.

SANITARY INSPECTION.

If you would avoid sickness clear away the filth and rubbish about your premises, establish proper drainage and admit pure air. The skin, kidneys and bowels are the sluiceways of the human body. Regulate these channels of health with Burdock Blood Bitters which act directly to purify the blood and regulate the stomach, liver and kidneys.

MUCH IN A LITTLE.

Many proprietary medicines, if they cure at all, require such a large quantity to produce effect that it makes them very uncertain and expensive remedies. Not so with Burdock Blood Bitters. It is highly concentrated and of all diseases of blood, liver kidneys, one or two bottles will cure more than gallons of the weak mixtures usually sold. Send for facts and figures.

Municipal Government.

PROPOSED FUTURE LEGISLATION.

By direction of the Chairman of the Select Committee of the Legislative Assembly of Ontario "to consider the desirability of so amending the Municipal Act that the number of members in County Councils may be reduced. The following questions are to be circulated among Councils of Counties, Townships, Towns and Incorporated Villages, ex-Wardens and ex-Reeves and others:

1. What is the general feeling in your municipality as to a reduction in the number of County Councillors?

2. What is your own opinion?

3. Of the following proposals for the reduction of County Councillors which would you (if favorable to reduction) prefer?

(c) Dividing the County into Districts and electing representatives therefrom.

(d) Giving to each Township a Reeve with a voting power equal to the present representation as regulated by the Municipal Act—or in other words the Reeve having as many votes as the Act provides representatives from the Municipality.

(e) Having a Board of say five members, representing, not particular Districts, but the whole County. If favorable to this plan, what mode of election would you suggest?—Whether by popular vote or an election by the various Township Councils at their first meeting, in a somewhat similar manner to the election, by Electoral Division Agricultural Societies, of representatives at the Board of Agriculture and Arts.

(f) The election of County Councils as at present; but the appointment by them, at their first meetings, of small Executive Committees to transact the business of the year.

4. If not favorable to any of the above proposals, or if you do not consider any of them the best that can be given, what plan would you suggest?

5. In your opinion, should future legislation (if any) in reference to the foregoing matters, be permissive or compulsory?

BRIDGES.

1. Keeping in view the inability of Incorporated Villages, in many cases, to construct bridges over one hundred feet in length, is the present law compelling County Councils to erect and maintain such bridges, generally satisfactory?

2. If in your opinion it is satisfactory, do you think the jurisdiction should be extended to Towns?

3. If to Towns, then should it not extend to Townships?

4. Make any suggestions you think desirable as to the general jurisdiction of County Councils over Bridges.

Euphrasia Council.

The council met, pursuant to adjournment, on 4th April, 1884. Members all present. Minutes of last session of Council read and confirmed.

The Treasurer was instructed to ask the Treasurer of Artemesia to remit to him, the sum of $5, being one half of surveyor's account for surveying deviation of Town line, Artemesia and Euphrasia, as Euphrasia and the full amount ($10) to J. G. Sing, Esq., D. L. S.

The time for the collectors' to return their Rolls was extended until next meeting of Council.

The treasurer was ordered, to pay $2 for the use of each school house, used as a polling station, at last Legislative Election, and $2 for Orange Hall Kimberly, used for said purpose.

The Reeve was requested to make enquiry, concerning arrears of taxes standing against N. ½ lot 2, concession 2, and if any error appears, to get it corrected by the County Treasurer.

The clerk was ordered to notify Charles Hopkins to remove his fence from the load allowance.

A Communication from Patrick W. Casson, was read by the Reeve, but after consultation was laid aside.

The Reeve's orders were issued on the Treasurer to pay as follows, viz.:—To John Millar, $2, removing fallen timber from road; to Samuel Kerr, $19, protecting bridges over Beaver River; to Robert Dunlop, $40, part Salaries as Clerk; to J. D. Crabtree, $10, special services purchasing debentures; to Andrew Clark, $5, protecting culvert on 9th line; to Edward Fawcett, $3.50, protecting Heathcote bridge.

The Treasurer was ordered to remit to W. C. Hewish, Esq., $8.43, for chain used in protecting bridges over Beaver River, and to pay to William Kinner, $1.30, repairing culvert on Mountain road in 1883.

The following gentlemen were appointed pathmasters. A By-law will be passed at next meeting of Council confirming their appointment, viz.:—J. Rawlings, J. Howard, G. Emery, J. McAuslin, T. Dookes, J. White, R. Carefoot, W. Pringle, C. Fawcett, D. Wallace, J. Wallace, G. Bath, R. Conn, J. Millar, T. Julian, H. Lougheed, W. Dales, J. Devins, J. Johnston G. Garvatt J. Dales, A. Way, J. Fawcett, W. American Newspapers for 1884.

From the edition of Messrs. Geo. P. Rowell & Co's AMERICAN NEWSPAPER DIRECTORY, now in press, it appears that the newspapers and periodicals of all kinds at present issued in the United States and Canada reach a grand total of 13,402. This is a net gain of precicely 1,600 during the last twelve months, and exhibits an increase of 5,618 over the total number published just ten years since. The increase in 1874 over total for 1873 was 493. During the past year the dailies have increased from 1,138 to 1,254; the weeklies from 9,062 to 10,028; and the monthlies from 1,091 to 1,499. The greatest increase is in the Western States. Illinois, for instance, now shows 1,009 papers in place of last year's total of 904, while Missouri issues 604 instead of the 523 reported in 1883. Other leading Western States also exhibit a great percentage of increase. The total number of papers in New York State is 1,523, against 1,500 in 1883. Canada has shared in the general increase.

IN GOLDEN BONDS.

"Caught? Not in the least likely," answered Mr. Rayner decisively. "Why should they be? They might be if they had their equals in wits pitted against them; but they haven't. The ordinary detective has the common defect of vulgar minds, want of resource. The chief, if he is clever enough to be a successful jewel-robber, has the abilities of a general. The bolder he is, the more certain he is of success. The detective, in spite of repeated failures, believes himself infallible. If I was a thief, I should commit robberies as nearly as possible under the detective's nose. That astute being would never suspect the man who braved him to his face."

"Ah, it's very fine to talk" said one acute villager, who thought Mr. Rayner was really going too far: "but, when it came to the detective being there, you'd be as bold as the rest of us, I'm thinking."

Mr. Rayner laughed good-humouredly enough, and said perhaps he was right; and I heard the acute villager bragging of having put down Mr. Rayner, who, he said, was a bit bumptious for just a gentleman-fiddler, and wasn't so much cleverer than the rest of 'em he guessed, for all his talk.

At dinner Mr. Rayner tried again to induce his wife to go to Monaco, and encouraged me to join my persuasions to his, which I did most heartily. But to all we said she only replied steadily and coldly that she disliked travelling, did not feel well enough to undertake a journey, and preferred remaining at the Alders. She added, in the same parrot-like tone, that she thought the change would do me and Haidee good, and that it was very kind of my mother to go.

After dinner I ran up stairs to my room, and opening the door softly, found Haidee dozing by the fire. So I sat down to write my scarcely-begun letter to Laurence.

I first told him how happy his letter had made me, and then, obeying his injunction to tell him everything that happened at the Alders, I gave him a full account how Sarah had prevented our meeting on Wednesday evening, and of her stealing my letter out of the bag on Thursday, of Mr. Carruther's visit to tell me about the robbery at Derham Court, of the accident to Sarah on Friday night, of her ravings about a bad man named James Woodfall, of Mr. Rayner's return, and of his intentions to take Haidee, my mother, and me to Monaco in a few days.

The hope of seeing Laurence again soon had by this time swallowed up every other thought concerning the journey; and I was eager for Friday to come, that we might start.

Then I told him I had some very grave suspicions about the robbery, that I had told Mr. Rayner, who did not think so seriously of them as I did, but that he said I ought not repeat them to anybody until he had thoroughly sifted the matter, and I had promised not to do so.

"So now you are not to be anxious about my safety any more, my dearest Laurence. For Sarah, the only person who wished me harm, is too ill to move, and is in danger, poor woman, of losing, if not her life, at least her reason, the Doctor says. And Mr. Rayner has promised not to go away again for more than a day at a time, either on business or for pleasure. There seems a curious fatality about his absences, for both these dreadful robberies that have frightened everybody so much lately, the one at Lord Dalston's, and the one at Denham Court, have happened while he was away, with no man in the house to protect us against burglars or our fears of them. I think your prejudice against Mr. Rayner ought to break down now that through him we are to meet each other so soon; for when we are at Monaco you will come over and see us, won't you? My mother is very anxious to make your acquaintance, though she does not know of our engagement, for I dare not tell her any secrets. I think Mr. Rayner must have guessed it though, for he says little things to tease me and make me blush. And you see he does not try to prejudice me against you, as you thought he would. But he might try, and everybody in the world might try, for years and years, but they would never succeed in changing the heart of your own ever loving

"VIOLET."

I had said at dinner that day, in answer to Mr. Rayner's inquiries, that I was not going to afternoon service, but I had not mentioned that I was going to the Vicarage. I felt sure that I should blush if I did, and then Mr. Rayner would guess my visit had something to do with Laurence; and I did not want to be teased any more. So, when five o'clock came, and I knew that service must be over, I put on my outdoor things, kissed Haidee, who was now awake, and slipped softly down stairs and out by the schoolroom window. I was not afraid of leaving that unfastened, now that Mr. Rayner had come back again.

Mrs. Manners met me in the hall of the Vicarage, took me into the drawing-room, and gave me a packet of tracts, two or three of which had names slightly pencilled on them, as specially suitable to certain of the parishioners, as, "The Drunkard's Warning"—Mrs. Nabbits; "The Cost of a Ribbon"—Lizzie Mojer. These I was to deliver to Miss Maud Reade for distribution in her district this week.

"Tell her to notice that I have marked some specially," said Mrs. Manners, as she gave them to me: and I rather wondered how the persons they were directed to would take the attention.

I thought that, in spite of her hatred of subterfuge, Mrs. Manners seemed to enjoy the little mystery which hung over my engagement. She kissed me very kindly as she sent me off, and told me I was to let her know when Sarah was well enough to be read to, and she would send something to be read which might do her good. I promised that I would; but I hope it was not impious of me to think, as I could not help thinking, that she was too wicked for any of Mrs. Manner's good books to have much effect upon her.

I went through the side-gate of the Vicarage garden, where I had run against Laurence on that happy evening which seemed so long ago, although in truth only eight days had passed since then, and my heart beat fast, and I walked slowly, for it seemed to me that Laurence must be coming round the corner again to meet me; but of course he did not; and I quickened my pace as I crossed the park to the Hall.

The mist was growing very thick, although it was only a little past five; and I knew I must make haste back, or I might risk losing my way, short as the distance was between the Hall and the Alders.

I rang the bell, and asked for Miss Maud Reade; and the servant who opened the door, and who, I felt sure, was the Williamson who was afraid of the blunderbuss, showed me into the drawing room. There was no one there, for they were all at tea.

This was my first entrance into Laurence's home; and I was so much agitated between pleasure at being in the house he lived in, and shame at feeling that by some of the inhabitants at least, if they knew all, I should be looked upon as an unwelcome intruder, that I sank into a chair and buried my face in my hands. It was a very comforting thought, though, that I was sitting on a chair that Laurence must certainly have sat upon; and then I wondered which was his favorite, and tried one that I thought likely, to see if any instinct would tell me if I were right. I had not made up my mind on that point when the door opened and Miss Maud Reade came in.

She was a girl of about sixteen, with a weak but not disagreeable face; and she shook hands with me rather timidly, but not unkindly.

"Mrs. Manners asked me to bring you these few tracts for your district, Miss Reade. She has marked some for people she thinks them specially suitable for," said I, giving her the packet.

"Thank you; it is very kind of you to take so much trouble," said she.

"Oh, it is no trouble at all!" I answered.

There was a pause or rather awkward constraint; and then I said in a whisper——

"Laurence—your brother—told me to come and see you, and to ask you to put a—a letter from me to him inside yours. He said I was to tell you to remember your promise, and he would remember his; he underlined that."

Miss Reade's constraint broke up at once, and she grew as much excited and mysterious as I.

"Did he? Then he hasn't forgotten!" she said, in a hissing whisper. "I suppose you know what it is; it's about getting Mr. Reynolds to come here next winter. Oh, do keep him up to it. I'll do anything in the world for you—that won't get me into trouble with mamma or Alice—if you will!"

"I will. I'll remind him again in my next letter—or when I see him. I'll say, 'Don't forget to invite Mr. Reynolds in the winter.' Will that do?"

"Oh, yes, that will do beautifully! But it is a long time to wait," sighed the girl.

I thought she was much too young to be in love, when she was still in short frocks, and wore her hair in a pigtail; but I was obliged to help her, in return for the service I wanted her to do me.

"I have brought my letter," said I mysteriously. "Shall you be writing soon?"

"I have a letter ready now, and I will put yours inside and give it to a gentleman who is here, and who is going back to London directly after tea, and I will ask him to post it at once."

"Oh, thank you!" said I; and tremblingly, with a fear least the dreaded Alice should get hold of it, I put my letter into her hands, and soon afterwards I left the house.

The fog was already so much thicker that I wondered whether the gentleman with our letter would be able to find his way back to London that night, and even whether I could find mine back to the Alders. I must be sure to keep to the drive in crossing the park. But, before I got to that, I lost myself among the garden paths, and walked into a flower-bed; and I began to think I should have to find my way back to the door and ask ignominiously to be led to the gate, when I heard voices on my left; and I made my way recklessly in their direction across grass, flower-beds, and everything. I could not see the speakers yet, for there was a hedge or something between us; but I could distinguish that they were the voices of a young man and a young woman of the lower class. Thinking one of them at least must be a servant at the Hall, and able to direct me, I was just going to speak through the hedge, when a few words in the man's voice stopped me.

It was the voice of Tom Parkes.

"Yes, to such weather-cocks as you," answered the girl with rough coquetry. "Why, you were keeping company with that ugly Sarah at Mr. Rayner's; and, now that she is ill, you want to take up with me. Oh, a fine sweetheart you'd make!"

But she was not as obdurate as these words promised. It seemed to me, with my suspicions concerning Tom already strong, that in the talk which followed he managed with very little difficulty to find out a good deal about the ways of the household, and also that he spoke as if he had learnt from her a good deal already. Presently I heard the sound of a kiss, and he promised to come and see her again on Wednesday; and then went away; while I, seized by a sudden inspiration, found my way not to the park, but back to the house, which was less difficult.

I asked for Miss Maud Reade again; and this time she rushed out of the drawing-room and met me in the hall as soon as I was announced, and whispered——

"They are all in there. Come into the library."

"May I have my letter back, just to put in something I have forgotten?" said I.

"Oh, yes; here it it!"—and she drew it from her pocket. "Write it here. I will give you a pen. Why, how white you look! Has anything happened?"

"Oh, no, no, nothing, thank you!"

I wrote on a half sheet of paper, which I carefully folded inside my letter, these words:—

"A man who was at Denham Court, and about whom I have strong suspicions, is hanging about the Hall now. He is coming here again on Wednesday night."

I put my letter into a fresh envelope, and put the torn one into my pocket that it might not be seen about; then I begged Miss Reade earnestly to send the letter off at once, as there was something in it of the utmost importance; and she whispered again, "Remember—Mr. Reynolds in the winter!" and, having this time got Williamson to show me as far as the beginning of the drive across the park, I made my way in safety, but slowly, and with much difficulty, back to the Alders.

I slipped through the schoolroom window, which I had left unfastened; and, as soon as I was inside, I heard Mr. Rayner's study door open, and his voice and that of Tom Parkes in the passage leading from the hall. Mr. Rayner was speaking in his usual kind and friendly way to him, and I thought to myself that it would be useless for me to tell him what I had just heard, which, after all, was nothing in itself, and only became important in connection with the suspicions I had already of the man—suspicions which Mr. Rayner himself refused to share. And, when Tom Parkes had said, "Well, good night, sir," and gone in the direction of the servants' hall, and Mr. Rayner had returned to his study, I ran up-stairs and prepared for tea, at which meal I felt rather guilty, but said nothing of my expedition or its results.

That evening Mr. Rayner kept me in the drawing room accompanying his violin, and talking, until Mrs Rayner had gone up to the room she now used on the upper floor. He described to me the beauties of the Mediterranean shore, and said that I should be happier there than I had ever been in my life—which I could easily believe when I thought how near I should be to Laurence. He asked me if I was not anxious to see the pretty dresses my wother had been commissioned to get for me, and told me I should look like a little princess if I were good and did just what I was told.

"There is no fear of my not doing that, Mr. Rayner," said I smiling. "But you must not give me too handsome dresses, or I shall not feel at home in them."

"You will soon get used to them," he said with a curiously sharp smile. "There is nothing that women get used to sooner than fine clothes and beautiful jewels, and pretty idleness and—kisses."

Certainly I liked Laurence's kisses; but the tone in which Mr. Rayner said this grated upon me, and brought the hot blood to my cheeks uncomfortably. He saw the effect his words had upon me, and he jumped up and came towards me where I was standing ready to light my candle.

"You look hurt, my child, but you have no reason for it. Don't you know that all those things are the lawful right of pretty women?"

"Then it is a right a good many of them are kept out of all their lives, Mr. Rayner," said I, smiling.

"Only the silly ones," he returned in a tone I did not understand. "Well, I will explain to you on our journey to Monaco."

He looked very much excited, as he often did after an evening spent with his violin; and his blue eyes, in which one seemed to see the very soul of music, flashed and sparkled as he held my hand.

"Don't be surprised at what I have said to you this evening. You have brought me luck, and you shall share it. This journey shall take you to the arms of a lover who will give you all the things I spoke of and more—a thousand times more!"

That was true indeed, I thought to myself, (but did he mean what I meant?) as I tore myself, laughing and blushing, away and ran up-stairs. There was more delight in the mere fact that Laurence preferred me to any other woman in the world than in all the beautiful gowns and jewels that ever princesses wore. And I went to sleep that night with my hands under my pillow clasping his letter.

Haidee left my room next day for the first time, and spent the afternoon by the dining-room fire. So after dinner Mr. Rayner came in with his riding boots on, and asked with a smile if I had not a letter to send to the post. He was going to ride to Beaconsburg, and, if I gave it to him, it would go a post earlier than if I put it into the bag for the postman to fetch.

"No, I have no letter, thank you, Mr. Rayner," said I, with a blush.

"Not a line for—Nice, to tell—some one you are coming?" said he, archly.

"No," answered I, shaking my head.

"You posted that one yesterday yourself, didn't you, Miss Christie?" whispered little Haidee, putting her arms round my neck.

Mr. Rayner heard the whisper.

"Yesterday," asked he quickly.

"I—I gave a—a note to Miss Reade to put with hers," said I.

A curious change passed over Mr. Rayner. The smile remained on his face, which had, however, in one second turned ashy white. He said, "All right, my dear," in his usual voice, except that I fancied there was a sort of hard ring in it, and left the room.

"Was it naughty of me to say?" said Haidee, feeling that something was wrong.

"Oh, no, my darling!" I answered.

I too was afraid I had displeased Mr. Rayner by going to the Hall, without saying anything about it to any one, in what must seem a sly, underhand manner; and I wish Laurence had not enjoined me to send my letter in that way.

That evening, at tea-time, Mr. Rayner announced that he had found a letter waiting for him at the Beaconsburg post-office which obliged him to go to Monaco a day sooner.

So Haidee and I must be prepared to start on Thursday morning.

CHAPTER XXVI.

On Tuesday afternoon, while I was helping Haidee to dress her doll in the dining-room, there was a ring at the front-door bell, and shortly afterwards Jane came in, looking rather frightened, saying that a gentleman was in the hall asking for Sarah.

"And I've told him she is ill, Miss Christie; but he won't believe me; and he won't go away, and Mr. Rayner is out; and please will you speak to him?"

I got up, and, following her into the hall, found, not a gentleman, but a respectably-dressed man, who very civily apologised for disturbing me.

"I beg your pardon, ma'am; but are you Miss Rayner?"

"Oh, no!"

"Mrs. Rayner?"

"No. Mrs. Rayner is an invalid, and I am afraid you cannot see her. I am the governess. If you have any message for Mr. Rayner, I will give it to him; or, if you like, you can write him a note, and it shall be given him when he returns."

"Thank you, miss." Still he hesitated. "Would you like to wait for Mr. Rayner? He will be back in about an hour."

"Thank you. Could I speak to you in private for a few minutes, miss?"

"Oh, yes, certainly! Will you come in here?"—and I opened the door of the schoolroom.

He followed me in and shut it carefully. "I am the brother of Sarah Gooch, miss, who is a servant here."

I nodded assent.

"I've been abroad and worked myself into a good position, and now I want my sister to leave service. And I don't want the other servants to know I'm her brother. It may be pride; but perhaps you'll excuse it, miss. Would you mind sending for her without saying it's her brother that wants her?"

How could I break the fact of her illness to the poor man?

"Oh, please be prepared for bad news! I'm so sorry!" said I gently. "She is ill—very ill."

To my surprise, he looked more incredulous than unhappy. He said very suddenly——

"She was quite well last Friday afternoon."

"Yes—an accident happened to her on Friday night. She fell down a flight of stairs and injured hers lf severely. If you will only wait till Mr. Rayner comes, he will speak to you. Sarah is a very old servant in this family, and much respected, and she has every possible care, I assure you."

But he still seemed more curious than anxious about her, I thought.

"She has been in the family a long time then? Excuse me, miss, but I've been away so long that she is almost like a stranger to me, and I had great difficulty in finding her out. But I'm very glad to hear she is thought so well of."

"Oh, yes! Mr. Rayner has the greatest confidence in her."

I did not want to say anything disagreeable about the woman now that she was ill, especially to her brother, whose affection did not seem very warm as it was.

"Ah, that's the great thing! We've always been a family to hold our heads high, and I couldn't hear anything to please me more about her. But I expect it's little use my coming home and wanting her to keep house for me. She was a good-looking girl, and I've no doubt she's looking forward to marrying on her savings, and then we shall be just as far apart as ever. Do you know, miss—if it's not troubling you too much, and you won't take it a liberty—if she's got a sweetheart?"

I hesitated. The man's cold curiosity seemed so unlike the warm interest of a brother that I began to wonder whether I was right in giving him the information he wanted. My doubts were so vague and his questions so very harmless, however, that, when he said——

"I beg your pardon, miss—of course it is not for a lady like you to interest yourself in the likes of us——"

I broke out——

"Oh, pray don't think that! Sarah has an admirer, I know——"

I stopped. I could not say anything reassuring about Tom Parkes.

"Ah! An honest hard-working fellow, I hope, who'll make her a good husband."

He was more interested now, and was looking at me very searchingly.

"I can't speak to a man's prejudice behind his back," said I slowly; "but——"

He was very much interested at last, and was waiting impatiently for my next words, when Mr. Rayner quietly entered the room. There had been no ring at the front door. He looked inquiringly at the man, whom I was just going to introduce as Sarah's brother, when the latter anticipated me by saying quietly——

"From Scotland Yard, sir."

"Scotland Yard?" echoed Mr. Rayner inquiringly. But the name did not seem new to him, as it did to me.

"Yes, sir; I've been sent after a woman named Sarah Gooch, from information received that she was in your service. Mr. Gervas Rayner, I believe, sir?"

Why did he not own that he was her brother? I thought to myself.

"Yes, that is my name. But what on earth do you want with my servant Sarah Gooch?"

The man glanced at me. Mr. Rayner said——

"Go on. Never mind this lady; she is as much interested in the woman as I am. What do you want with my old servant Sarah?"

"Suspected of complicity in the Denham Court robbery, sir—some of the property truced to her."

I started violently. This man, then, was not Sarah's brother at all, but a detective who had been trying to extract information from me by a trick! Mr. Rayner stared full in his face for a few moments, as if unable to find words; then he exclaimed, in a low voice——

"Impossible!"

"Sorry to shake your trust in an old servant, sir; but proof is proof."

"But what proof have you?" asked Mr. Rayner earnestly.

"Last Friday afternoon, between half-past four and twenty minutes to five, your servant, Sarah Gooch, was seen to give the contents of a black bag to a man in Beaconsburg. The fact excited no suspicion. The man took the next train to London, travelling second class. But south of Colchester he was seized with a fit; he was taken out at the next station, the bag he had with him examined for his address, jewels found in it, and the police at Scotland Yard communicated with. The man escaped; but, on inquiries being made, witnesses were found to prove conclusively that the biscuit-tin which contained the jewels had been handed to him in a street in Beaconsburg, on Friday afternoon, between half-past four and twenty minutes to five, by a woman who was identified as Sarah Gooch."

I remembered seeing Sarah pass through the plantation on Friday afternoon on her way to Beaconsburg, with the black bag. But I was too horror-striken to speak, even if I had not been, now that the blow had fallen, as anxious to screen her as Mr. Rayner was to prove her innocence.

"But I cannot believe it!" said Mr. Rayner. "She is a rough, harsh woman; but I have always found her as honest as the day."

SUN LIFE ASSURANCE COMPANY OF CANADA.

The following is a brief synopsis of the statements presented at the annual meeting of this Company lately held in Montreal. From even this brief summary the splendid prosperous condition of the business will at once be seen.

The life applications received during the year were 1 411 for $2 328 990, while accident were 1 551 for $2,919,600. The risks in all 2 962 for $5 248,590. The assurances in force are:—Life, 4 007 for $6,779 563; Accident, 1,875 for $3 367,050, in all, 5 882 for $10,147,615. The applications for the year, both life and accident, and the assurances in force, both life and accident, are larger than ever before in the history of the Company. The fact that nearly 3,000 persons applied for new assurance is the best possible evidence of the high position the "Sun" occupies in public confidence.

The progress made in the life department during the last ten years is well shown by the following statement:—

The assets and income were much larger than in any previous year. It was pointed out that if the same rate of progress is kept up for the next ten years as in the past the income will then be nearly one and a half millions and the assets four millions.

The interest on mortgages due before the 31st December, and still unpaid, has been reduced to about $300 or about one one-tenth of one per cent, on the current mortgages. Even this small amount is expected to be shortly paid. This speaks volumes for the sound nature of the investments.

The report is one which cannot fail to be extremely gratifying to all friends of the company, and we commend it to their attention.

As we have already given an account of the proceedings at the annual meeting it is unnecessary for us to refer to these again. It will be remembered that they were very harmonious and satisfactory.—Toronto Globe.

Miss Marrable's Elopement.

IN TWO CHAPTERS.—CHAPTER I.

Miss Martha Marrable, a spinster lady of five-and-fifty, is the last of her race. Her brother Mr. Clement Marrable, never married, and died twenty years ago at Baden-Baden, whither he had gone to drink the waters; and her two sisters, Maria and Letitia, although they did marry, did not live to become middle-aged women. The latter, Maria, after becoming the wife of Mr. Lington Larkspur, of the firm of Strip, Larkspur, and Company, bankers, of Threadneedle Street, gave birth to a single child, a daughter, who was named Lucy; and the younger, Letitia, having been led to the altar by Mr. Septimus Allerton, of the firm of Allerton, Bird, and Benedict, brokers, of Lombard Lane, presented her husband with twin girls, of whom one only—and she was called Amy—survived her extreme infancy. It is therefore not astonishing that Miss Martha Marrable, a well-to-do woman without family ties, is exceedingly fond of the daughters of her two dead sisters. She usually has them to stay with her at least once a year,—once in the early summer at her house in Grosvenor Street; and once in the autumn at the seaside, or in Italy, whither she goes occasionally, accompanied by the great wonder of the foreigners—by courier, a man servant, two maids, eleven trunks, and a green parrot. And as she is very kind to her nieces, and denies them nothing, it is not surprising that they are equally fond of her as she is of them. But while Miss Martha Marrable is growing old; whereas Miss Lucy Larkspur and Miss Amy Allerton are both young, and intend to remain so for some years to come. It is not, therefore, to be expected that the three ladies should invariably think exactly alike on all subjects. And indeed, I am happy to say that there are not many women who do agree with Miss Marrable upon all questions; for although she is as good hearted an old spinster as ever breathed, she is, unfortunately, a man-hater.

I have looked into the dictionary to see what the verb "to hate" signifies, and I find that it means "to despise," or to dislike intensely." Let it not, however, be supposed that the word "man-hater" is a stronger one than ought to be applied to Miss Marrable; for I am really not quite certain that it is altogether strong enough. She regards men as inferior animals, and looks down upon them with lofty contempt. "Who," she once said to her niece Lucy, "has turned the world upside down, filled it with poverty and unhappiness, and deluged it with blood? It is Man, Lucy. If woman had always governed the earth, we should have had no Cæsar Borgias, no Judge Jefferise, no Bonapartes, and no Nana Sahibs." And yet Miss Martha Marrable can never see a beggarant begging in the street without giving him alms. The truth is, that although she hates and despises man, she pities him; just as she pities the poor idiot whom she sometimes sees grinning and gibbering by the wayside in Italy.

These being her sentiments Miss Marrable cannot, of course, many male acquaintances. She is on good, but not affectionate, terms with her widowed brothers in-law, Mr. Lington Larkspur and Mr. Septimus Allerton. She once a year invites her man of business, Mr. John Bones, of Cook's Court, to dine with her and them in Grosvenor Street: and she is civil to the rector of her parish, and to the medical man whom she would call in to attend her in case of illness. Yet Mr. Larkspur once told Mr. Allerton that this feminine dragon had had a violent love-affair when she was nineteen; and Mr. Allerton—whose connection with the Marrable family is of much more recent date than that of Lucy's father—actually declared that he could well believe it. If, however, Miss Marrable did have a love-affair in her youth, I am not inclined at this time of day to cast it as a reproach in her teeth. Boys will be boys; and girls, I suppose, will be girls, though they may live to rue the error of their ways, and be none the worse for their follies. One thing is certain, and that is, that at the present time, and for at least five-and-twenty years past, Miss Martha Marrable has ceased to dream of the tender passion. She still occasionally talks vaguely of going up the Nile, or of visiting the Yellowstone Region, ere she dies; but she never contemplates the possibility of getting married; and I believe that she would as soon think of allowing a man to believe that she regarded him with anything but polite aversion, as she would think of going into business as a steeple-jack, and learning to stand on one leg on the top of the cross at the summit of St. Paul's Cathedral.

And yet Miss Martha Marrable was last year the heroine of a terrible scandal; and many of her misanthropic female friends have never since been able to completely believe her professions of hatred of man. The affair gave rise to many whispers, and was even, I understand, guardedly alluded to, with just perceptible censorious deprecation, in the columns of the Woman's Suffrage Journal, as a terrible but happily rare instance of womanly weakness and frivolity; and since the true story has never been told, I feel that it is only right to tell it, and by telling it, to defend Miss Marrable from the dastardly charges that have been made against her established reputation for good sense and unflinching contempt of the rougher sex.

Towards the end of August, Miss Marrable and her two nieces left London for North Wales, and after a long and tiresome journey, reached Abermaw, in Merionethshire, and took rooms at the Cors-y-Gedol Hotel. They were accompanied, as usual, by the two maids and the green parrot; but the courier and the man-servant, being males, and their services not being imperatively required, they were left behind in London. Lucy had just celebrated her twenty-third birthday, and Amy was just about to celebrate her twenty-first; and—although I am sorry to have to record it—I am by no means astonished that they were both in love. Lucy, during the whole of the previous season, had been determinedly flirting with a designing young artist named Robert Rhodes; and Amy, younger and less experienced than her cousin, had been carrying on, even more sentimentally, with Mr. Vivian Jellicoe, who, being heir to a baronetcy, found that position so arduous and fatiguing, that he was quite unfitted for any active occupation of a laborious character. Of course Miss Marrable knew nothing of these affairs. Had she suspected them, she would perhaps have not taken her nieces with her to Abermaw; for it happened that at that very watering-place, Sir Thomas Jellicoe and his son Vivian were staying when the three ladies the two maids, and the green parrot arrived. But no foreigner on Miss Marrable's part could have prevented Mr. Robert Rhodes from following Lucy to North Wales That adventurous artist had made up his mind to spend the autumn in Miss Larkspur's neighborhood; and even if Miss Marrable had carried off her eldest niece to Timbuctoo or the Society Islands, Mr. Rhodes would have gone after the pair by the next train, steamboat, diligence, or caravan available.

Upon the morning, therefore, after Miss Marrable's arrival at Abermaw, she and her nieces were comfortably installed at the Cors-y-Gedol Hotel; while at the Red Goat, close by, Sir Thomas Jellicoe and Vivian occupied rooms on the first floor, and Mr. Rhodes had a bed room on the third.

In the course of that afternoon, Miss Martha Marrable occupied by her nieces, and followed at a respectful distance by the two maids, walked in the sunshine upon the hard sands that stretch, for I do not know how many hundred yards at low water, between the rocky hills behind the little town and the margin of Cardigan Bay. The weather was hot and sultry, and the unrippled sea looked like molten lead in the glare. Much exercise was therefore out of the question; and ere long, the three ladies sat down on the seaward side of a rush grown sandhill to read, leaving the two maids to stroll farther if they chose to do so, and to explore at their leisure the unaccustomed wonders of the seashore.

Miss Martha having arranged her sunshade to her satisfaction, opened a little volume on The Rights of the Slaves of England, while Lucy devoted herself to one of Ouida's" novels, and Amy plunged deep into Keats. In five minutes The Rights of the Slaves of England fell heavily to the sand; and in three minutes more, Miss Marrable was emitting sounds which, but that I know her to be a woman who has no weakness, I should call snores From that moment, Lucy and Amy, as if by common consent, read no more.

"Lucy," said Amy mysteriously to her cousin, "I have seen him."

"So have I," said Lucy.

"What a curious coincidence!"

"Not at all. He told me that he intended to follow us"

"What! Vivian told you?"

"O no! Bother Vivian! You are always thinking of Vivian, I mean Robert."

"He here too!" exclaimed Amy. "I meant Vivian. I saw him half an hour ago, with his father."

"Well, I advise you not to let Aunt Martha know too much," said Lucy. "If she suspects anything, she will take us back to London this afternoon."

Miss Marrable murmured uneasily in her sleep. A fly had settled on her chin.

"Hush," exclaimed the girls in unison, and then they were silent.

Not long afterwards, they caught sight of two young men who were walking arm-in-arm along the sand, a couple of hundred yards away.

"Look! There they are!" whispered Lucy. "Aunt must not see them. We must go and warn them." And, stealthily accompanied by her cousin, she crept away from Miss Marrable, and ran towards the approaching figures.

I need not describe the greetings that ensued. Such things are the commonplaces of seaside encounters between young men and young women who have likings for each other, and they have been described a thousand times. Suffice it to say that, a few minutes later, Lucy and Robert were sitting together under the shadow of a bathing machine, while Amy and Vivian were confidentially talking nonsense a dozen yards off. More than half an hour elapsed ere the girls returned to Miss Marrable; but fortunately the excellent spinster was still murmuring sleepily at the fly on her chin; and when she awoke, she had no suspicion that she had been deserted by her charges. As she walked back with them to the hotel, nevertheless, as if with a strange intuitive comprehension of danger in the air, she held forth to them upon her favorite topic—the unfathomable baseness of man; and gravely warned them against ever allowing themselves even for a single moment to entertain any feeling, save one of polite aversion to the hated sex.

Thus matters went on for a week or more, Lucy and Amy meeting their lovers every day in secret, and Miss Marrable suspecting nothing. Although she knew Sir Thomas Jellicoe and his son, she treated them whenever she encountered them, with such freezing courtesy, that they did not seek her society. As for Robert Rhodes, she did not know him; and he therefore escaped her lofty slights.

But in due time a crisis arrived; and in order that the full bearings of the situation may be properly understood, I must briefly explain the character of Miss Martha Marrable's undutiful nieces.

Lucy Larkspur has but little romance in her composition; she has strong feelings, not much sentiment; and she is one of those girls who are perfectly open with their heart. She loved Robert Rhodes, and, as she knew quite well that he also loved her, she made no secret to him of her affection for him. Amy Allerton, on the other hand, is, and always has been, sentimentally inclined. She believes, rightly or wrongly, that it is a very charming thing to Let concealment, like a worm i' the bud,

Feed on her damask cheek;

and she would as soon have thought of permitting Vivian Jellicoe to think that she loved him, as of attempting to win and woo the Sultan of Turkey. The consequence was that Miss Marrable, who fondly imagined that she knew all the thoughts of her elder niece, trusted her much more than she trusted her younger. She regarded Lucy as an open book that might be easily read, and Amy as a kind of oracular voice that, while saying and appearing to say one thing, might mean exactly the opposite. Miss Marrable was destined to discover that she was to some extent wrong in her estimate, so far, at all events, as Lucy was concerned; and her discovery of her error was, I grieve to say, accompanied by a good deal of pain and mortification.

Ten days had passed; and the two pair of lovers had made considerable progress. Amy, it is true, had not declared herself to Vivian, who, being a bashful young man, had, perhaps not pressed her sufficiently; but Lucy and Robert understood one another completely, and were secretly engaged to be married at the earliest opportunity. Vivian's bashfulness could not, however, endure for an unlimited time. One morning, he and Amy found themselves together on the rocks behind the town, and the opportunity being favourable, he screwed up his courage, told her that he had never loved any one but her; and obtained a coyly given promise that she would be his.

Natures like Amy's when they once take fire, often burn rapidly. On Monday she became engaged to Vivian Jellicoe; on Tuesday, Vivian begged her to name a day for the wedding, and she refused; and on Wednesday, Vivian, knowing the peculiar sentiments of Miss Martha Marrable, and doubtful also, perhaps, whether his father would not throw impediments in the way of his early marriage, proposed an elopement; and Amy, with some hesitation, consented.

When she returned from her secret meeting with her lover, she of course confided her plan to her cousin. "How foolish you are," said Lucy; "you know that your father would not have you do that for the world: and you will make an enemy of Aunt Martha, who is like a mother to us girls"

"But she would never agree to our marrying, if we consult her," objected Amy; "and if she knew anything of our plans, I am sure that she would manage to frustrate them. She is a dear old thing but—— Well, she is peculiar on these points."

"I have told you what I think," said Lucy, with an assumption of wisdom that was perhaps warranted by her superior age. "Don't be foolish."

But Amy was already beyond the influence of counsel. She persisted in her intention, and even claimed Lucy's sympathy and assistance, which of course, Lucy could not ultimately withhold.

Ere an elopement can be successfully carried out, in the face especially of the jealous watchfulness of a man-hating spinster lady of middle age, numerous preparations have to be made; and in the case of Vivian and Amy, the making of these preparations involved correspondence. Amy, therefore, bribed one of her aunt's maids to act as a go-between; and the maid in question, with a fidelity that is rare, and at the same time a treachery that, I fear, is common in her kind, promptly carried Vivian's first letter to her mistress.

Miss Martha Marrable without scruple tore open the envelope and angrily perused its contents. "MY OWN AMY," ran the audacious communication—"Let us settle, then, to go on Wednesday. At nine o'clock in the evening, a carriage and pair shall be ready to take us to Harlech, where you can stay for the night with the Joneses, who are old friends of ours; and on Thursday by mid-day we shall be married, and, I trust, never afterwards parted again. We can arrange the details between this and then. But write, and tell me that you agree,

Your ever devoted
VIVIAN."

A Whale with Fine Whiskers.

A whale measuring fifty feet nine inches long and twelve feet four inches through the body from back to breast, and with a tale nine feet across, got ashore recently on the south inside shore of Pungoteague creek, Accomac county, Virginia. Five fishermen attacked the monster by shooting and chopping it. They secured it with two anchors, which were fastened to the leviathan by ropes passed through holes cut in his flesh. Its captors were at work about the whale for several hours, during which time the whale remained motionless, and it was thought to be dead. When the tide came in at sundown it floated and displayed renewed vitality. A desperate struggle freed the animal from its captivity, and it moved away, carrying the cables and anchors with it. No more was seen of it until the following Monday, when it was discovered in the channel of the creek, dead. The fishermen towed it to the beacon north of Pungoteague creek, where they recommenced their operations of stripping it of the blubber. The proprietors of the fish factory on the creek offered to boil the blubber for one-half the oil, but the lucky captors refused to accept those terms. It will probably render seventy-five barrels of oil. This is the second whale to get ashore in the same vicinity within one year, and afford a source of revenue to the hardy fishermen of the neighborhood. The whale is now in charge of Capt. Crockett, who was most persistent in his capture. When its jaws are fully open an ordinary man can stand erect in its mouth. The monster was driven into the Chesapeake from the ocean by the recent easterly storms, and, keeping along the leeward side of the bay, entered the deepest water, which took it into Pungoteague creek. It is of the male kind. Behind each jaw, under the ear, it has a beautiful dark mane, much coarser than that of a horse. The whale is lying near Martin's point on his side, where crowds visit it from the country. Pungoteague creek is a distinguished locality. It was there Gov. Cameron, of Virginia, rendezvoused his oyster pirates this year, and not far from the whale is the ghost-famed Millstone point, so well known to old sailors and citizens. It is the only creek on the peninsula visited by water-spouts, there being three experienced here in thirty years. More people have been drowned in Pungoteague creek than in any other water on the eastern shore.

Cremation on the Continent.

On the continent, as in England, cremation is making progress. The French chamber of deputies has before it a bill, introduced by M. Casimir-Perier, giving French citizens the option of being inhumed or cremated as they may prefer, and it is expected that the bill will pass. The Belgian chamber of representatives has before it a petition from the town council of Brussels praying for the legalization of cremation. The International Cremation association, which has its headquarters at Milan, is at the same time carrying on an active propaganda in France and Belgium. The agent whom the society sent to Belgium is a near relative of the late papal nuncio at the court of Brussels; and he is charged to obtain permission to erect an experimental crematorium in the "gay city of Brabant," at the expense of the association. In Italy a considerable number of priests have been cremated. On the continent, where funerals usually take place within forty-eight hours of death, there exists a morbid fear of being buried alive; and this feeling may, perhaps, explain the favor into which incineration is rapidly rising on the other side of the channel.

A New Yord car-driver when he wants to clear the track shouts, "Hi, there, hi." A Chicago driver strikes his bell and shouts, "Shake 'em up there, will you?" A Boston driver says, "Deviate from the direct line those equine appendages, accelerate, accelerate, exhilaration, lively now."

THE RED SEA.

Its Points of Interest, Historical and Topographical—The Site of Mediæval Romance—Scenes Along the Coast.

By whatever name we may call the narrow strip of sea that separates Arabia from Africa,—the "Weedy sea" of the Hebrew, the "Erythræa" of the ancient, the "Gulf of Mecca" of the Mohammedan, or "Red sea" of modern parlance—there is no doubt that it has at all times commanded a special interest. Memorable, of course, in holy writ, it has also been frequently selected as the site of mediæval and even later romance, and no traveller either before or after the Suez canal who confided his impressions to type ever failed to devote some page to this famous sea. It abounds with such obvious points of interest, historical and topographical, from the Twelve Apostles to the Gulf of Suez, that even the Peninsular and Oriental passenger reclining under the awnings, languid with the excessive heat, evolves sufficient energy to ask questions of the officers or to listen to dissertations of more experienced voyagers upon the spots of note or national curiosity which the steamer is passing. Not that, as a fact, much comes actually into clear view, but still there is enough shadowed out upon either horizon to pique curiosity and arrest the imagination. Is not Arabia on the one hand and Abyssinia on the other? And have not these been from all times lands of romance and travel?

To the traveller from India, therefore, the straits of Babel-mandeb mark the commencement of the more stirring half of the voyage. Even a rock is a vast relief to eyes that have grown blase of sea water and weary of speculating on sails seen on the horizon. And immediately on entering the straits the "sights" of the Red sea commence. That island yonder is Perim, upon which Anglo-Indian wags delight to crack their jokes—a sun-smitten four miles of rock, where two wretched soldiers are popularly supposed to REPRESENT THE POWER OF ENGLAND.

Life, they say, is dull there. There is not even the diversion of throwing stones into the sea. They have all been thrown away long ago. So the private, it is said, chips the rock for the sergeant to chuck at the water. A fly once settled on Perim, and the private got a day's leave from his superior officer to go out shooting it. Such and a hundred others are the waggeries intended to convey a notion of the dreariness of Perim. Yet the French would like to have the rock very much, and for that reason Great Britain keeps it. Close to Perim is Oyster rock, so called for the abundance and excellence of the oysters which at some remote period are said to have existed there. Forty miles up the sea brings the voyager abreast of Moncha—a city that illustrates conspicuously the virtues of whitewash. The shells of houses and mosques, with cranky minarets, are all whitened, and when the sun shines upon the town it stands out from the sea with a beauty which is most immorally deceptive. Meanwhile on the other side the steamer has passed the Six Brothers, a group of volcanic rocks, one of which, in compliment to its superior stature, or perhaps a reflection upon the diminutive proportions of the rest, is called the High Brother. The coast line broken by some remarkable irregularities away toward the interior of the country is seen rigid with successive ranges of hills. On this, the African side, the course lies past Assab bay and Ras Billore, with numerous islands, steep and peaked, scattered along the coast, with reefs that make navigation dangerous, and except for chance Arabs collecting sharks' fins or turtle for trade with Yemen, most inhospitably uninhabited. Thirty miles or so north of Ras, or Cape, Bilbol islands recommence, some of them the resort of myriads of sea fowl, and many of curious shapes, volcanic. And so to the village of Edd, a hamlet whence the flock-keeping folk of the interior export their produce, and where cattle thrive. The next sign of habitation is Amphila, a place of ghostly solitude, between a storm swept desert and the sweltering sea; and then come more islands, some of them coral and with a scanty vegetation, and next Dissee, or "Valentia island," with its one group of stone huts and small herds of cattle, and thus to Massowah. The island, half a mile long by a quarter wide, holds the town, the name of which is again becoming familiar to British readers. The better buildings are chiefly of coral, and a languid trade is carried on with the Arabian coast opposite. But the anchorage in Massowah bay is good, and a mile further north is Dahalea bay,

AN EQUALLY USEFUL HARBOR.

A jungle-grown shore now carries on the coast line, abounding in reefs and inconsiderable islands. Dalac island, with some half-dozen hamlets, is, however, a spot of comparative interest, having a trade in pearls and other sea produce, and fairly supplied with cattle, and abundantly with good water. Some of the other islets are inhabited, the houses built of Madrepore coral roughly hewn into blocks, and the rocks affording just sufficient subsistence for small flocks of goats, which, with fish and shell fish, form the chief food of the people. Norawat bay, past which the steamer may now be supposed to be making her homeward-bound way, is the finest bay in the Red sea, but the islands that form it are barren and inhospitable, so that, except for its excellent anchorage, the harbor is of no value. The coast line becomes monotonous to a degree, being low and sandy, with nothing but occasional tufts of arid tamarisk scrub to break the dreariness. But it changes again soon, and the names of various elevations, "Chimney hill," "Sugar-loaf hill," "Hummock peak," and so forth, describe the various bold contours they assume. And so to Suakim, the little town built of coral on a coral island that is now so famous and so often described of late.

From Suakim northward the coast bears few traces of permanent habitation. Jezirat Abdulla, Sheik Barud, and Daroor are hamlets without prosperity or natural resources to tempt any but the poorest Arabs to reside there, while the same abundance of reefs and rocky islets, making navigation dangerous, continue. Eighty miles north of Suakim is Salaka, a wretched village in a wretched bay, and except for curious peaks and hills, the coast line possesses no interest up to Dohana bay, on the rocks beyond which more than one ship has been lost. And so, northward, to Dalac bay, and thence past a dangerous shore, studded with sunken reefs, to Helaib, with an excellent little harbor and an Arab and Nubian colony in comfortable circumstances; St. John's island, once famous for its emeralds, and still blessed with a profusion of turtle; Emerald island itself, Ras Banas, where the ruins of ancient Berenice lie almost overwhelmed in the shifting sand, and many another little cape and island to Cosseir, a town of some three thousand people and a considerable grain trade, and which, under better government, might attain to some prosperity. Northward lie some Bedouin villages—and then, after a tract of uninhabited coast, broken by numerous islands, Jubal, and the Gulf of Suez

On the Arabian coast, if the course of the steamer would permit, a view of these numerous small villages could be seen soon after leaving Mocha, on the northward voyage, and then Hodeida, a town of considerable pretensions, a coffee port, and fortified; Camaran island, with its colony of pearl-fishers and turtle-hunters; the Three Sisters, Loheia, a walled and fortified place with large trade with the desert folk; the Zebayr group, Gheesan, with its crumbled fort and jungle-grown surroundings: Zinier, where antelopes abound; the Farsan group, with their curious bluffs; Jezirat Deesan, inhabited within the century, but now a desolate ruin with a large cemetery Ras Turfa; Coomfida, with its garrison and bazaars well supplied with food; and Jeddah, the famous port of pilgrimage. Here is the tomb of Eve—so the faithful say. A few Bedouin hamlets, inhabited only occasionally, lie along the coast above Jedda, and then Zembo, the port of Medina, is sighted. Another succession, at long intervals, of small Arab settlements bring up the coast line to the pilgrim's halting place of Mo'ilah, and so on northward to Ras Mohammed and the Gulf of Suez again.

The Gulf of Akabah, which the Arab fears with such a surpassing awe that he will not sail on it, and even passing near it offers up a prayer for protection; the distant glimpse of Sinai, the headland near which tradition states the Hebrews crossed the Red sea, the wells of Moses, and many another sight of interest or speculation are present in imagination to the voyager down this famous sea, while those who have explored its shores can tell of great ruins that strew the land, and strange freaks of nature.

But to-day it derives its chief interest from the fact that her majesty's government have notified their intention of occupying the ports upon its Egyptian coast, and that our gallant troops are fighting on its shores.

Great Engineering Work.

One of the wonders of marine engineering is the ship canal through the Finland bay from St. Petersburg to Cronstradt, in Russia. The bay between the two cities is so shallow that formerly only vessels of very light draft could come to St. Petersburg, and in consequence an enormous amount of lighterage was necessary, the cost of which, some $5,000,000 annually, becoming altogether too burdensome for the St. Petersburg trade. Since the completion of the canal mentioned, the largest vessels employed in the Baltic trade can reach St. Petersburg. The canal is seventeen miles long, and is formed by two enormous breakwaters running parallel to each other 275 feet apart. Between them a channel of the uniform depth of 22 feet has been dredged. About half way between the two cities the canal is widened to a harbor of refuge about one mile square, also formed by breakwaters. The latter are almost entirely constructed of cribs filled with stone, which were generally sunk in winter time when the bay was frozen over solid. The cribs were mostly built on the ice, which was as much as three feet thick, and sunk through holes cut in the ice. This work was by no means free from danger, for frequently the water would suddenly rise through the hole made and flood the camp of the laborers, who had then to work standing knee-deep in freezing cold water. At other times a sudden snow-storm, in which it was impossible to stand erect, would force the laborers to win the coast, crawling a distance of three miles or more over the ice. To complete the canal it was necessary to sink about twelve million cubic feet of rocks and stones, while to deepen the channel 230,000,000 cubic feet of earth had to be removed. Of course such an undertaking was possible only in Russia, and at a time when her population was still largely made up of serfs, whose labor could be had for the cost of board and clothing.

Oiling the Waves.

Wm. J. Card, captain of the schooner Turban, reports some interesting particulars of his use of oil to break the force of waves, on a voyage from North Carolina to Nova Scotia, in September last. The schooner was of 163 tons registered, with a cargo of 300 tons railroad iron, which loaded her down until her gunwales were not more than two feet above water. On the third day out the weather became boisterous, and on the following morning, soon after daybreak, the vessel ran into a gale. The wind was varying about from southeast to northeast, and blew up a heavy sea, caused by the hurricane that had prevailed for some days to the southward of the vessel's position. The schooner, by reason of her deep loading, was completely at the mercy of the seas, which broke over her with terrific force.

Soon after noon Capt. Card stationed a man in the bow of the schooner—it being unsafe to venture on the jib-boom, which was in danger of being carried away by the seas—and directed him to throw over from a small can a little oil at the approach of every "comber." The oil was poured out through the spout of the can, and the Captain estimates the quantity thrown over each time at rather less than an ordinary tumblerful. As the supply on board was limited, it was thrown out only at the approach of very heavy seas.

At first petroleum burning oil was used, and while this had some effect, it was not heavy enough to thoroughly break the wave, and linseed oil—some ten gallons of which had been laid in for painting purposes—was then employed. The result was in every way satisfactory, and the use of the oil was continued for about fifteen hours, by which time the supply was exhausted. The fury of the gale had, however, subsided, and the schooner reached port in safety. Capt. Card says that without the use of the oil the vessel could not have lived out the gale—the effect of the oil having been to level the comb of the wave and prevent its breaking over the vessel.

"Will you have a small piece of the light meat or a small piece of the dark?" asked Bob's uncle as he carved the turkey at dinner. "I'll have a large piece of both," said Bob.

MARKDALE APRIL. 17, 1884.

THE SCOTT ACT.

As an indication of the progress of public sentiment in the Dominion in favor of prohibition in connection with the drink traffic the following facts may be made mention of, which are certainly very significant:

In the entire Province of Prince Edward Island the Scott Act has been adopted by large majorities. There are three counties and the city of Charlottetown. A retail liquor license has not been issued in that province for years. As an evidence that the workings of the Act have been such as to meet the reasonable approval of the people, it may be stated that an attempt was made to repeal the Act in Prince County a few months ago, and it was sustained by a larger majority than at first. There have been five votes taken in Prince Edward Island and in every instance the majority in favor of local prohibition has been large.

In Nova Scotia there are eighteen counties and in twelve of these the Act has already been adopted. The majorities in its favor were larger than the majorities usually are at other popular elections in the Mayflower Province. It looks as though the Act would soon be adopted in the entire Province. An amendment has just been made to the Act by the Dominion Parliament which will make it more efficient in Nova Scotia and will also hasten its general adoption. The popular feeling there now is evidently in favor of its adoption and its thorough enforcement.

In New Brunswick there are fourteen counties and in nine of these the Act has been adopted. In most cases the vote in its favor was two to one, and in some instances considerably more than that. In no instance has there been a majority against its adoption. There are also in the Province the cities of St. John, and Fredericton, the Provincial capital. In St. John a vote was taken which resulted in a tie, and the Act was not therefore legally adopted. Probably another vote will be taken there as soon as the time comes round when it can be again legally submitted. In Fredericton the first vote on the adoption of the Act in the Dominion was taken and it was carried. At the expiration of three years an attempt was made by its opponents to have it repealed and another vote was taken, which resulted in a verdict again in its favor. The verdict of the people of New Brunswick in favor of the adoption of the Act is of much significance in connection with the Prohibition question. They are next door neighbors to the people of Maine, where the prohibitory law has been in force for more than thirty years. If the law had been a failure in Maine as some persons are anxious for us to believe, our fellow citizens in New Brunswick would have been well aware of the fact, and surely they would have avoided the adoption of a similar law, under the circumstances. The facts, however, are that all the counties in that Province adjoining Maine were among the first to adopt the Act, and that, too, by decisive majorities.

In Ontario there has been a good deal more hesitation about moving for the adoption of the Act, probably much in consequence of the failure of the Dunkin Act, years ago. It is now becoming evident, however, that the Scott Act is a much more efficient restrictive law, and the movement is becoming general. The Act has been in force for a couple of years in Halton County, and its original promoters declare themselves satisfied with its working. It was carried a few weeks ago in Oxford County by a majority of nearly 800. In Welland County it was defeated by a considerable majority and so it was in the city of Hamilton and in the County of Wentworth. In Lambton County two votes have been taken. In the first instance the majority was in its favor, but the vote was declared void because of a legal technicality. In the second vote it was defeated, owing a good deal to the fact that many became somewhat discouraged in consequence of the previous failure.

In the Province of Manitoba votes have been taken in two Counties and majorities were recorded in its favor, There appear to be peculiar difficulties in the way of immediate progress there, and it is not probable that further steps will be soon taken in regard to the measure.

In the great North West Territory prohibition prevails. The Act of the Dominion Parliament giving a constitution to that Territory for prohibition and it has been fully as well enforced as any other law in the Territory. There is the testimony of its advantages from such eye witnesses as Lord Lorne, Dr. Grant of Queen's University, and other eminent men, who are not themselves prohibitionists. Surely great success has attended the efforts of the prohibitionists during the past few years.

FINDLAY MACRAE.

To Editor Standard:

DEAR SIR,—The subject of temperance claims a great deal of attention at the present time. Our part of the country would be better with less drunkenness; but the great question is, How to stop the evil? The system of licensing has had a fair trial, and the result is a failure. There is as much drunkenness under the license system as if we had no licenses at all. License means monopoly. If it is a good thing to sell and manufacture liquor, then what right has one man to be protected in selling and manufacturing it, while other men who might be inclined to do the same, are prohibited under severe penalties. A few men in a township can well afford to pay license to sell an article which all others in the township may not sell. If it is right to sell liquor, better remove all restrictions. In that case the dealer who would furnish the best article would get the most call, and wholesome competition would remove the unwholesome abomination which is ordinarily sold over the bar; but as long as men are protected by licenses they will be protected in passing off, as the genuine article, their own cheap mixtures. The drinking customs of our day have descended lower than those of the olden times. Men drink in such a manner as to demoralize and tempt the greater number. This is done by making the bar-room the principal room in the hotel. All the business of the house is done either in the bar-room, or else very near it, and in sight of it. At the same time those who wish to drink unseen are of course furnished every convenience to do so. Through the secret trap the youth, the minor, is supplied with liquor tempered to suit his yet unvitiated taste, and he is thus led on by degrees to drink "hard" or "soft." Now if it is a good thing to teach the youth to drink why leave it to so many houses among so many thousand people. If one out of 100 ratepayers is allowed to sell liquor, (on the payment of the license) why is each or any of the other 399 prohibited from doing the same thing when he is willing to pay the same license, and equally capable in every way as the one who obtains the license? There is no justice in giving one a monopoly of a business by which he can pocket $5000 or $10,000 a year, and deprive 399 men from any chance of doing anything in the same line. To sum up, "What is good for the goose should be good for the gander," but as intoxicating liquor is not good for either the goose or the gander, neither of them should be allowed to dabble in it. It therefore necessarily follows that, as the liquor is not for the good of men, but has been a blight and a curse to millions, the traffic in it should be abolished, and the manufacture and the sale of it prohibited.

Owen Sound.

The boom has struck Owen Sound in earnest

The elevator, upon which 140 men have been working for some time past, is now about 90 feet high and closed in, and some 30 feet yet to be added to the heighth. This building, when complete, will be an ornament to the harbor. The intention is to have it finished in June.

A further grant of $10,000 has just been made by the government for harbor improvements so that the largest inland steamships may have sufficient depth during low water.

Building operations are extensive and will continue so during the season.

The Salvation Army is doing a good work, and altogether the prospects of the capital of Grey are looming up.

Returned.—Mr. W. H. Hunter returned from the South, with his family on Tuesday. We are glad to learn that Mrs. Hunter has improved in health by her visit to the sunny South. —Orangeville Advertiser.

Owing to the steadily increasing business at the Markdale photograph gallery, Mr. Hamilton has been obliged to procure increased assistance and has secured the services of a first class artist from Toronto.

A grand clearing sale of 2000 hard and soft felt hats will commence on Saturday at J. R. Trimble's Mammoth House. I am bound to clear out this stock. Look out for great bargains. See them. They must be sold.

A Change.—Mr. D. C. Sullivan has severed his connection with the Walkerton Telescope. Mr. Jabes Stephens, late of the Chesley Enterprise has assumed control of the Telescope. We wish Mr. Stephens success in his new venture.

Died from Exposure.—An inquest was held on the body of Mrs. Gould, of Mulmur, found in the woods a few days ago. The jury returned a verdict to the effect that deceased had died from exposure, the body being frozen. —Shelburne Economist.

The many friends of Dr. Armstrong, late of Markdale, will be pleased to hear that he is doing well up on the C. P. R. He expects to be removed from Pic River, his present location, to Mackay's Harbor to take charge of the C. P. R. Hospital.

A Taffy-pull.—An invitation from Mr. E. S. Mabee was cheerfully accepted by a number of the young men of this town, who assembled at the Markdale House on Thursday evening last and drove from thence to Mr. Mabee's sugar bush, 1½ miles out. A quantity of eggs and biscuit, together with a fair share of taffy, was disposed of, and a good time generally spent. The boys wish to hereby tender their thanks to Mr. Mabee for his valued invitation.

It is rumored that Finlay MacRae, Esq., has sent in his resignation as Reeve of Glenelg. If this is the case there will be an election to fill the vacancy shortly.

We learn that Mr. Allan McDougall has in company with another man secured the contract of grading ten miles of the C. P. R. East of Prince Arthurs Landing for $400,000.

If you want to get value for your Butter, Eggs, or money, go straight to J. R. Trimble's Mammoth House, as I am bound to clear out my stock, and will do so at very low prices. I am prepared to give you better value for your money than any merchant in this county.

Narrow Escape.—Mr. W. J. McFarland stepped on the early train, Tuesday morning, to see friends off, when the cars moved out. In jumping from the then fast moving train he was thrown forcibly, causing him to turn a complete somerset. He was considerably shaken up and bruised, but escaped serious injury.

Egg Merchant.—Mr. R. B. Currie, late of Elora, intends residing in Markdale for this summer at least. He is an extensive egg dealer, and will purchase an unlimited quantity for the New York market. Mr. Currie has had considerable experience in the business, and we believe is a thoroughly reliable man. We wish him success.

Mr. D. J. Shanahan of the Markdale Carrage Works, has just received a large quantity of buggy tops, the celebrated "Hodge Top" which has carried off First Prize wherever shown at the Provincial Industrial and other large fairs, those who have an open buggy and desire to add a top to it will do well to examine Shanahan's stock.

Osprey, April 10.—A cowardly attack was made on a young man named John Graham near his father's residence on the center line, Osprey, by three men, two of whom lived in Maxwell and the other in the neighborhood of Wareham. Mr. Graham was seized treacherously by one of them until he was almost kicked to death by another. Mr. Graham is recovering.

Accident.—A son of Mr. John Douglass, con. 16, Proton, was chopping in the woods on Monday last, when the axe of a party who was chopping near him, glanced and struck him on the foot, inflicting a severe gash. One of the bones of the foot was completely severed. Under Dr. McWilliams' care the young man is doing as well as could be expected.—Dundalk Herald.

We are pleased to say that Mr. J. R. Trimble's roadster stallion, "Clear Grit," Jr., the winner of 15 first prizes at various shows, and also the winner of first prize (cash $50), and the silver medal at Toronto Industrial Exhibition last fall, beating a field of 27 roadster stallions, will make the season of 1884 between Owen Sound, Tara, Chatsworth, Markdale, Rocklyn, Meaford, Woodford and Annan Farmers and breeders will have a chance this season of using a first class horse.

AN UNPROTECTED FAMILY.

Is one that has not that valuable remedy, Hagyard's Yellow Oil in the house for accidents and emergencies. It cures colds, croup, sore throat, deafness, rheumatism, neuralgia, chilblains, burns, bruises and all painful injuries.

A Rough.—A man named Cowper bought a return ticket to Dundalk and back, at Flesherton Station on Monday of last week. On his return from Dundalk he refused to show his ticket to the conductor who put him off at Proton Station, and duly reported his action at head quarters. Shortly after the man appeared at Flesherton Station, and accused Mr. McGill, the Agent, with selling him a ticket with the wrong date on. Mr. McGill asked him to show him the ticket, which he did, when the Agent was going to the door to ask the Conductor of a freight train if Cowper had come up on his train, when he was struck a heavy blow on the nose by Cowper, which knocked the bones in the nose on one side. A scuffle then ensued, and Cowper made off. Mr. McGill had the doctor to set the bones of his nose straight, and now wants to know where Cowper is, as he intends to bring an action against him for damages. The ticket was rightly dated— Grey Review.

A WIDE AWAKE DRUGGIST.

Mr. A. Turner is always wide awake in his business, and spares no pains to secure the best of every article in his line. DISTRICT DASHES.

From our exchanges and otherwise.

Meaford sports are preparing for their 24th of May celebration.

The Dundalk Brass Band gave a very successful concert at that place a week since.

R. Wood, jeweller, of Meaford, has removed to Port Arthur.

Mr. John McFayden, of Proton, has sold his bay team to a gentleman residing near Toronto for $300.

Chas. Emery, of Meaford, is gone to Creemore, where he will run a millinery and fancy goods store.

A Dundalk boy had a dip in a yat in Ketchum's tannery recently.

Dr. Campbell, Phrenologist, is meeting with usual success in Dundalk.

The Mt. Forest Advocate was enlarged last week to a nine-colum four page. We congratulate our cotem on this evidence of success.

Chatsworth Spring Show of stallions and bulls will be held at the above village on the 22nd April.

We regret to learn that Mrs. J. C. Pringle of Dundalk died on Thursday last.

Dundalk.

From our own correspondent.

Mrs. Pringle, wife of the lessee of the McCullough House, died on Friday morning last. Great sympathy is felt for the bereaved husband, who had just taken up his residence among us. Deceased was taken to Whitby for interment.

The excitement attendant on the rumored building of a new school house, and change of site, was at its height on Monday last, when the ratepayers decided to abandon the present site, from sanitary considerations. I believe it is the intention of the trustees to erect a building at a cost of not less than $2500, exclusive of seating, site, etc.

Increasing interest is manifest in Dr. Campbell's lectures. He is an adept in character reading.

A public discussion will take place next Monday evening between Dr. Campbell and Rev. A. Shirran, M. A., on the "Truth of Phrenology." The well known ability of the Dr. is likely to obtain for him the victory, though the rev. gentleman considers himself pretty well posted on the negative side.

Priceville.

From a correspondent.

Business is very good here at present.

Zelras.—This club hailing from Durham gave an entertainment in Reily's hall on the evening of the 11th inst. It was not, I believe, a financial success.

Mr. Black, who for the past year has been in partnership with Mr. McGowan in the flour mill is leaving. Mr. McGowan will take full charge. He is doing a good business.

Ontario & Quebec Railway.

The general offices of the Ontario and Quebec Railway, including the Credit Valley and Toronto, Grey, and Bruce roads, was removed on Wednesday from their former location, corner Front and Bay streets, to the old U. E. Club building on King street. It is also understood that Mr. Van Horne, General Manager of the Canadian Pacific Railway, will have an office in the same building.

LARDINE MACHINE OIL

Is Manufactured Solely by McCall Bro's. & Co. Toronto, and is the only popular Machine Oil to-day in use by all mill men and farmers. Try Lardine.

The railways both of Canada and of the United States are very seriously feeling the effects of the business depression. The reports of the traffic receipts, compared to last year, give unmistakable evidence in regard to the character of the present business stagnation. The report of the Pennsylvania Railroad Company, just published, shows that for February alone, there was a decrease in the net earnings of $212,000, compared with February of last year. Probably many of the other American railways will show a falling off quite as great. In Canada the reports indicate in the same direction. The Grand Trunk receipts for the third week in February were $30,000 less than the corresponding week last year, and for the previous three months the decrease was $350,000 less than during the corresponding period in '83. The Canadian Pacific is also reporting a falling off of something like $4,000 a week. Politicians may argue that there is a serious business depression, or that there is no depression at all, just as it may best suit their party purposes, but facts and figures such as the above, tell their own story. Probably '84 will prove a year of very great anxiety to a large number of business corporations, and to men in nearly every branch of business.

The Break in Wheat.—The recent great decline in the price of wheat in American and European markets, has caused very serious loss to holders of that great staple, amounting as it does to over twenty cents a bushel during the past month, and the price is now lower than has been touched for many years. The cause appears to be that the area devoted to wheat in all parts of the world is increasing at a faster ratio than the population and with India, Australia and Russia all improving their transportation facilities, they are able to grow wheat and land it in the United Kingdom at a much cheaper rate than American farmers can do. In fact wheat is now selling throughout the Western States for less money than the actual cost to the farmer of raising it, and if this state of things continues the outlook for our great prairie provinces is by no means bright, at least as far as the profitable raising of wheat is concerned. The best thing farmers can do is to devote their attention to the raising of other grains, and also live stock, which are always in good demand at fair prices. Nothing but an almost universal failure of the wheat crop can again raise the prices to a paying basis, and from present appearances this is most unlikely. The wheat crop in the States is completely demoralized, and each day during the past week has witnessed a further decline.

THE FALSE PROPHET.

He who prophesies falsely of the weather, leaves off his flannels and overshoes, and catches cold, is indeed unwise. If you follow this false prophet your recourse lies in taking Hagyard's Pectoral Balsam. It is the best cough cure and the safest throat and lung remedy known to medical science.

A Miner's Eloquent Prayer.

At a recent meeting of the residents of Pocahontas Va., the scene of the terrible mine disaster, Peter Smith, whose brother was a victim, asked permission to pray, which being accorded he arose, and doffing his hat, made a touching appeal. The men outside the building also stood uncovered and, with the rain beating on their heads, listened while the rough miner prayed.

O God Almighty, we ask that you will give us some comfort in this hour of affliction. We pray you to let us have back the bodies of our poor relatives and not to refuse us the chance of burying them. O Lord God Almighty, put out the fires and help us so that we can give back the bodies to that earth from which we came. Help us, so our action to-night may be wise and that we may not be reckless or do things which the law don't allow. O Great God, let your pity come to these here poor widows and children who have no man to get them bread. Let this great and rich country give a few dollars, so that we will not see them starving; pray, God, don't let them go down under their troubles. If some poor fellow down below is yet alive, O God, kill him quick or show us how to help him. In the name of a merciful Jesus we beseech you to show pity on this town and help us bear the burden you have given us to bear. God help us and teach us to live our life so we die in peace when our time comes to die. If, as some say, the dead go to purgatory, then we pray you be merciful to our dead. Let their agony in this deadly mine help to square their account. God help and comfort all in Pocahontas, for the sweet sake of Jesus Christ. Amen.

During the invocation the crying of the women, at first almost inaudible, rose in unison, until the volume nearly drowned the speaker's voice. As he sat down tears were flowing from every eye, and great confusion prevailed, as several of the women completely lost self-control. The "keening" of the Irish women mingled with the frenzied lamentation of the colored women. The scene was distressing in the extreme to the few strangers who witnessed it.

A Chinese Notion.

The Chinese, so far as can be learned from history, are the oldest nation on the earth. They are, to us of extreme modern ideas, a strange people, and some of thrir ways and fancies are not to be explained. The most painstaking scholars and antiquarians appear to have failed, in many particulars, to discover the motives that actuate the individuals of this prehistoric race. Yet, doubtless, the ceremonies that we see them going through in mining camps on the Pacific coast are all, to them, as full of meaning as the rites of modern religion are to the believers in Christianity. The Chinese, in some respects, are not unlike the army of the orthodox in the church militant, who believe in a personal life of the present human frame in the world beyond. The Chinese custom of decapitating their enemies slain in the war is explained by the statement that they believe that the appearance of a person in the spirit world without a head is prima-facie evidence of having committed some crime, and punishment is awarded accordingly. Hence, the horrible mutilation which took place on the evacuation of Shanghai by the Ta pings, when the imperial officers gave orders for the decapitation of every rebel body; and even the coffins containing the remains of prominent rebel leaders were broken open and dishonored to insure their punishment hereafter. Hence, also, the anxiety displayed by the friends of officers who lost their heads during the rebellion to recover them and stitch them on to the bodies again, as much as £133 having been paid by the officers of the imperial army for the head of a friend.—*Eureka (Nev.) Sun Life Assurance Company of Canada.

The annual meeting of this company was held on the 13th. of March. The statements there submitted and the report of the proceedings cannot but be very gratifying to all the friends of the company. The Sun was incorporated in 1865, but only issued its first policy in May, 1871. Its progress since then, both in size and solidity, has been steady and satisfactory; on the list of the ten Canadian Life Companies it now stands third. In 1871 it received life applications for $400,000: In 1874 for $600,000; In 1878 for $1,600,000; and in 1883 for over $2,300,000. In 1871 the amount of life assurance in force was $400,000; in 1874, $1,700 000; in 1878, $3,300,000; and in 1883, nearly $7,000,000. Its annual income is now nearly $300 000, or nearly $1,000 for every working day in the year. Its resources amount to nearly $1,200,000. As was pointed out at the annual meeting, if the same rate of progress is kept up during the next ten years as has prevailed in the past the income will then amount to from one and a quarter to one and a half millions, and the assets to about four millions. This prospect is by no means a visionary one. The Company has reached the stage at which it can hardly fail to make rapid progress. There is a grand future opening out before it, and the officers can hope to see the day when it will rank as one of the largest and most powerful financial institutions in the country. A perusal of the accounts will show how strong and prosperous its condition is. It will be seen that the amount of new life business, the amount of new accident business, the assurances in force, both life and accident, the income and the assets, are all larger than in any preceding year in the Company's history.—Insurance Society, Montreal.

Humors of the London Strand.

At any time the humors of the Strand about eleven o'clock at night are well worthy of study, though the observer must need be serenely indifferent to his money, and of course his life. He must be careless of his watch, affect a supreme disregard for the regiment of touts, and be ready to embrace a horse as if he were living with the Houyhnhums. For excitement a charge of Osman's Arabs is nothing to it. The investment of a shilling may further procure him much pleasure. He may buy a printed photograph of any of the reigning beauties for a penny, find a wife for another, a choicely painted match-box, or a gay button-hole, on the same terms. But there is no end to the prospect. These attractions were enhanced last night, when news gentlemen anxious to earn an honest copper were crying out "Resignation of Mr. Gladstone" and illuminating their text with lights of all colors from "the penny box of dynamite," the latest plaything of the street, which will foster a good, healthy tone in the breasts of our street Arabs, dynamitards in embryo. In fact, it is lively in the Strand at 11 p.m. —Pall Mall Gazette.

THE "RUSTLER" OF THE LEVANT.

How the Mourmourismeni Takes, in Smyrna, the place of the Texan Cowboy.

Everyone who has lived any length of time at Smyrna knows that among the Greek population of the town there is a class of ruffians, heroes of the knife, who go by the name of "mourmourismeni." They may be compared with the desperadoes of California and Texas in everything save in courage. These persons enjoy the admiration of the society to which they belong: swagger and bluster, with the reputation of having murdered a certain number of their fellow-creatures, compose their stock in trade. They extort money by threats of assassination, and some of them have risen so high in the world as to keep brilliant saloons and cafe-chantants on the aristocratic quay. Two of these swells were pointed out to me as having scored respectively fifteen and twenty murders. When a Mourmourismenos dies, or gets killed in a drunken brawl, he is buried with more pomp than if he were a public benefactor. The immunity from punishment which these worthies enjoy is due to the fact that each of them has a certain number of protectors among the upper class of Levantine society. When he is in want of money, or gets into trouble with the police, he applies to Tchelebi Dick or Tchelebi Tom, his patrons, who are ever ready to help him with their purses or their influence. The familiarity subsisting between the Smyrna rough and members of the upper classes is a symptom of the unhealthy moral condition into which the Levantine society of that town, for many generations virtually deprived of intercourse with the civilized world, has gradually drifted. The patrons of the Mourmourismenos are generally to be found among the "young men about town," the local jeunesse doree, by whom it is considered a legitimate object of ambition to be on good terms with some well-known cutthroat. Among his own class the latter is an object of respect and veneration, so that it is no matter of surprise if he generally manages to defy the police. Nor is it to be disbelieved that in a society where the professional assassin finds such effectual encouragement and support, the Greek brigand has no difficulty in obtaining secret information and assistance in time of need.—Levant Herald.

Brutal Soldiers in Tonquin.

More disagreeable to notice than this unwholesome tippling is the conduct of the soldiers towards the townspeople. The Anamese have regained sufficient confidence to come back to their houses, or to come back and build new houses where the old ones have been swept away, but they have no love for their conquerors. It is no great wonder. The first thing one sees in one of the comparatively narrow cross streets is a huge Turco swaggering down the middle of the way, twirling a vicious-looking stick. The women scuttle indoors; the men squeeze themselves as near the walls as they can; the children salaam reverentially, and can hardly get out the usual "Bon jour, capitaine" for terror. A little further on we come upon a couple of marine fusileers, one of whom takes umbrage at the animated tone in which an old woman is conducting a bargain. With a kick of the foot he scatters her tray and little pile of cash over length and breadth of the street, and his companions laugh boisterously at the poor creature's misery. Even the officers, as they stroll along, relieve their ennui by playful cuts of the cane on the buttocks of passers-by. The Anamese is a cringing, pitiful creature at the best of times, but he has still a little self-respect, and he scowls as much as he dares under such treatment. It is not wonderful, therefore, that when he finds a solitary European he proceeds to wreak his vengeance upon him and wipes out a store of long pent-up grievances. The Tonquinese is a very different man from the timid inhabitant of Cochin China, and it will require many years and a strong military occupation before the country is brought to anything like a peaceable state.

The Suicide of Scorpions.

In the volume published last year, the title of which is the "Lion and the Sun," by Dr. Willis, for fifteen years medical officer in Persia under the Overland Telegraph company, is the following narrative: "A story was told me by the late Dr. Favergren, a Swede in Persian employ, who had been twenty-five years in Shiraz, to the effect that scorpions, when they see no chance of escape, commit suicide; and he told me that when one was surrounded by a circle of live coals, it ran round three times, and then stung itself to death. I did not credit this, supposing that the insect was probably scorched, and so died. I happened one day to catch an enormous scorpion of the black variety. In Persia there are only two kinds—black, and light green, or greenish yellow; the black variety being supposed to be much the more venomous. The full-grown scorpions generally are from two to three inches long; I have seen one five inches when extended from the tip of the claws to the sting, but he was phenomenal. The one I caught was very large, and to try the accuracy of what I supposed to be a popular superstition I prepared in my courtyard a circle of live charcoal a yard in diameter. I cooled the bricks with water so that the scorpion could not be scorched, and tilted him from the finger-glass in which he was imprisoned unhurt, into the centre of the open space; he ran rapidly round the circle three times, came back to the centre, turned up his tail (where the sting is) and deliberately by three blows stabbed or stung himself in the head; he was dead in an instant. Of this curious scene I was an eye-witness, and I have seen it repeated by a friend in exactly the same way since, on my telling the thing, and with exactly the same result. For the truth of this statement I am prepared to vouch." What the preceding curious experiment lacks by way of evidence one may well be at a loss to answer. The mental condition of the lower creation have within them several curious problems yet unsolved beyond those so nicely settled for us in modern philosophy.

A Marathon amateur who wrote to the manager of the Madison Square Theatre to know if there was an opening on the stage there for a young actor, received a reply that there were several openings in the stage there, and if he would come on he would drop him through one of them with pleasure.

POPULAR CRAZES.

Some of the Curious Ideas of Invalids—Drinking Calf's Blood as a Cure for Consumption—The Mud-Baths, Sand Baths, and Blue-Glass Cures.

"'Popular crazes,' did you ask about," was the answer of a well-known physician made to a question propounded by a Telegram reporter, yesterday. "There are many kinds of peculiar crazes, and some of the methods people take to keep free from disease, or rather try to, are simply absurd. Take, for instance, the man who goes the year round with a pair of sea-beans tied about his neck, as a preventive to diseases of a contagious nature. Some wear beans, some corn, some horse-chestnuts, and still others a plain piece of ribbon, all of which are more cases of superstition. There are many who, when suffering from a cold, will wrap a wet sock, which they have worn during the day, about their necks, and retire for the night. Others wear a dry sock, and still others a piece of cloth saturated with lamp-oil. In the country it is a standard remedy to wear a piece of salt pork about one's neck when suffering from a sore throat. This, by the way, is a good remedy. Some inhale the smoke from burning cherry wood, and others the smoke from oak chips in an open fire-place, as a cure for a cold in the head and nostrils. There are a great many persons who believe that when one gets thorough drenching with rain, or receives wet feet, that they should not hasten to their homes and put on dry clothes, but instead they should let the wet clothing dry upon them, as by so doing they believe they will never take cold.

"The 'hot water cure' which amounts to a craze in points in the east, where no breakfast is considered complete without the addition of a cup of hot water, to 'rinse and stimulate the stomach,' is the latest of a long list of odd cures. It is believed by a great many that to take a drink of this kind before each meal, or even a single drink on arising each morning, will cure the worst possible case of dyspepsia. Speaking of odd cures and fashions, a few of them may be recounted. Less than ten years ago, a Parisian physician of some note prescribed for a patient suffering from a pulmonary complaint a cup of fresh calf's blood after breakfast, another at noon, and one just before supper. The queer remedy proved efficacious. The patient improved under it rapidly, and finally became a well and hearty person. A statement of the case was read by the mercurial, excitable, and curiosity-loving Parisians, and started an interest in the blood-cure that in a very short time spread among all classes and became a veritable craze. Every person in any way troubled with weak lungs became a convert. The slaughter-houses in the suburbs of Paris were thronged every morning with crowds made up of all ranks, who actually fought to procure blood of the dying animals. There were delicate women and men, old and young, who came, some in their carriages, attended by their servants, and some who feebly crept along alone. The most delicately organized persons and the coarsest were on a common level, and it appears that the uninviting-looking fluid was served impartially by brawny-handed butchers. The great majority manifested no repugnance to drinking the fluid, and with a great many a taste for it was developed that ran into a craving. It acted much like rum on many, and even fowls were killed by some who were unable to get blood at the slaughter-houses. The demand was great, and at some places the blood was sold at high prices, each slaughter-house having a large run of customers, who would reach the 'pen' where the killing was going on as early as 5 a.m. Meanwhile a hot discussion went on in medical circles over the merits of the cure. Many celebrated physicians were dragged into argument, and were taken to see cured patients. The burden of professional opinion was against the cure, pronouncing it nonsensical and positively injurious rather than helpful. This craze reached its limit in a few weeks, to the grief of the butchers, who had reaped a golden harvest.

"The mud found at a certain spa in Germany, a few years ago, was discovered to possess remarkable medical properties. It was intensely black, pasty, thick, odoriferous mud, but thousands of persons hastened from all parts of Europe to bathe in it. To bathe in it was simply to be buried in it for an hour or two, and then to spend several hours in a tub of water to get rid of the reminiscence. The bath is described as being pleasant, and its curative effects, in cases of rheumatism, gout, and other diseases, are well attested. The mud was analyzed, and was found to possess active properties, magnetic and chemical. The mud baths have had their day, and are now visited by only a few travelling invalids, whom the remedy does not frighten. Similar to the mud bath is the sand bath, of which Joaquin Miller relates a tragic story. A party of explorers were crossing the sandy deserts, carrying six of their comrades, ill of a peculiar disease. The sand bath was proposed to them. They all assented, and were buried in the sand, their heads alone being above ground. In this position they were left, chatting with each other, their comrades having retired for the night in a tent close by, and not the least noise was heard. In the morning they were horrified to find that wolves had visited the camp, and eaten off each sick man's head level with the ground.

"The blue-glass cure is too fresh in the public mind to need more than passing mention. Of the thousands and hundreds of thousands of early believers that the health-giving and strengthening principles of the sunlight might be largely increased by passing rays through blue glass, there are thousands yet remaining.

"The sun-bath cure, the fish-oil cure for consumption; the simple diet cure for all kinds of ailments; the celery cure for nervousness, and many others were the beginning, more or less, of a craze. The best principle of each is now included in every wise physician's array of remedies. There have been cures for corpulence that found armies of followers, as was attested in Byron's time, when every man who laid claim to be considered a man of fashion was thin and pale, in marked contrast to the well-rounded, comfortable-looking, modern young man."—Providence Telegram.

"My dear," said Mr Muckleham to his wife, "those hams I bought the other day are so badly spoiled they cannot be eaten," "What a pity," his wife replied. "Guess we'd better send them out to the charity hospital."

PERSONAL PARAGRAPHS.

About the Queen—DeLesseps—Emperor William—President Grevy—Prince Bismarck—and other Great People.

Lord Lorne is going to make an attempt to introduce the whitefish of the Canadian lakes into several rivers and lochs in the west of Scotland.

Queen Victoria has developed quite a passion for letter writing. One of her latest epistolary achievements takes the form of condolence with the Khedive of Egypt on the loss of his mother.

Lord Bute will give a prize of £500 for the best setting of music to the "Alcetis" of Euripides. Lord Bute has also offered £50, through the National Eisteddfod Committee, for its translation into Welsh.

Mr. Matthew Arnold does not seem to have profited by his elocution lessons in the United States. On the occasion of his first lecture in England, after his return home, we learn from the London Truth that whenever he wished "to be particularly impressive he was perfectly inaudible."

DeLesseps is a devoted horseman, and may be seen daily galloping through the Bois de Boulogne with his eight children by his second marriage, boys and girls, mounted on ponies, in national costumes, their hair streaming on the wind, their large collars turned over their shoulders, and their caps hanging over their backs—a little tribe, with thick dark hair and complexions, round their white-haired chief.

Dr. Gibbons in the Pacific Medical and Surgical Journal cites a case of hypochondria in which a farmer imagined his nose to be a bundle of hay. He took great care not to go near a horse or cow lest his hay nose should be destroyed. Men are more likely than women, says the Doctor, to have hypochondria, though women have hysteria oftener than men. The diseases are closely allied in their origin and nature.

Prof. Clelland of Glasgow University said in a recent lecture on terminal forms of life that man was "a terminus," anatomical evidence showed he had reached the limit of development in vertebrate life. Hence it was in the last degree improbable that in the future there would be a progression in the construction of the human body that would give birth to greater intelligence than was possessed by the sages of antiquity.

Among the presents received by the Emperor William on his birthday was a superb service of Sevres porcelain bearing the inscription "From France." As the gift was anonymous, there has been a good deal of speculation as to the source from which it has emanated. Meanwhile, it is affirmed that the German Emperor has been greatly touched by it, and that he never wearied of showing this particular present by the visitors who called to offer their congratulations on his natal day.

The College of Cardinals now includes the greatest genius and first divine among English speaking Roman Catholics, Cardinal Newman, and in Cardinal Hergentother, who was appointed in the same year, it has secured the greatest German historian except Dollinger. Haynald again, Archbishop of Colocsa, and Prince Forstenburg, Archbishop of Olmutz, are also regarded as men of much mark. Haynald is considered next to Strossmayes the ablest speaker and most adroit logician in the Council.

The President of the French republic sent some little time ago to the French Ambassador of Constantinople three handsome cimeters made in exact imitation of the much-prized Damascus blades, for presentation to the Sultan's three sons. An oriental potentate receiving a present from such a quarter would probably have preferred some product of European art to a counterfeit of what he can get better at home. "If you wanted to make an Englishman a present," says a French paper, criticising M. Grevy's gift, "you would not offer him a dozen of pale ale, an article of Sheffield cutlery, or a coat made by Poole."

It has sometimes been brought against Bismarck that he does not believe in "resting on Sunday," and that he is rarely seen at church. This, Dr. Busch, his biographer, says, is partly due to the great amount of work that presses upon him. "There is so many a must in my life that the would can rarely be considered," Bismarck writes to his sister, and to the author he remarks that the day ought to be six or seven hours longer for him. Another reason for not going to church he gives in a letter to a clerical friend: "With regard to going to church, it is incorrect to say that I never enter a church. I willingly admit that I might go more frequently, but it is not so much from want of time as for consideration of my health that I do not go, especially in winter. To those who feel themselves called to be my judges in this respect I will with pleasure give further information about the subject."

Society in London is somewhat amused and very much scandalized at the daring robbery of Dr. Bill Ran Russell's wedding presents. Every one knows that the celebrated war correspondent was married some weeks ago in Paris to a charming Italian lady. Presents poured in on the popular couple on the auspicious occasion. These wedding gifts, of the value at least of $5,000, were left during the honeymoon in the safe-keeping of a friend residing in Eaton square, London. One day shortly after a porter, wearing the badges of his respectable trade upon cap and collar, rolled a cart to this lady's door and explained that he was sent by Dr. and Mrs. Russell for the boxes in her charge. Alas for unsuspecting womanhood! The lady gave up every bit of property entrusted to her by the bride and bridegroom. A day or two elapsed without message. Reason of the silence—they had not reached England. The plausible porter was a thief.

Some one has discovered that "G sh" is swearing, meaning "My Lord," and was used by Eliot in his Indian Bible. Mr. Eliot is to be commended for not using a stronger expletive while engaged on that work. If anything is calculated to make a man indulge in swear words, it is writing a book in the Indian language.

I took Zuleika out to Dr. Carver's Wild West show one afternoon. She gazed in mingled trepidation and admiration as the Doctor did some of his best rifle shooting, and then turning to me with a fine enthusiasm glowing in her face, exclaimed, innocently, "Oh, how I should like to see him shoot the hat!"

SCIENTIFIC GOSSIP.

Lady Siemens has presented a portion of the library of the late Sir William Siemens to the Physical Society, London.

Sir W. Thomson is to deliver 18 lectures on "Molecular Dynamics" at the Johns Hopkins University during the first 2) days of next October.

Pure linseed-oil, an expert observes, is a bright amber color. It runs freely, spreads when flowing from the can, tastes sweet and mild, and has the smell of a flaxseed poultice.

It is thought probable, says the Eagle, that the Government of Victoria will repeat the offer of a high premium for a combined reaper and thrashing-machine suited to Australian requirements.

According to Prof. Wanklyn the manufacture of gas from liming coal is a success, as it reduces the amount of sulphur eight pounds to three grains in the hundred cubic feet, and increases the yield of ammonia and tar by the abolition of the lime purifiers.

M. C. Decharme has performed new experiments showing that Nooth's electrical frogs may be imitated by means of a continuous stream of water falling in a cylindrical tuble vertically on a horizontal piece of black glass moistened all over.

Ptolemy's Menuthias is regarded by A. Grandidier, after an examination of maps of the Middle Ages, as identical with Madagascar, and he believes that the Island was known to the Greek and Arab geographers long before its rediscovery by the Portuguese in 1500.

Tabulated results of 250 experiments with 42 distinct explosive compounds were published in March by MM. Berthelot and Vieille, of the Academy of Sciences, Paris, bearing on the amount of pressure developed at the moment of explosion, the temperature produced, and the specific heats of the gases, espscially those of the compound ones, at various temperatures.

To obviate "kinks" in submarine telegraph cables, and consequently rendering these important means of communication less liable to break when subjected to strain, Messrs. Trott and Hamilton have adopted the expedient of making each alternate layer of sheating across each other. Thus if the inner sheating of hemp has a right-hand "lay," care is taken that the lay of the next sheating shall be left-handed.

A clock at Brussels has been going for eight months and has not required to be wound up since it was first set agoing. In fact, the sun does the winding of this timepiece. A shaft exposed to the sun causes an up-draught of air which sets a fan in motion. The fan actuates mechanism which raises the weight of the clock until it reaches the top, and then puts on a brake on the fan until the weight has gone down a little, when the fan is again liberated and proceeds to act as before.

The natives of the Chiloe Islands make use of a curious natural barometer, to which, from its having been first noticed by the Captain of an Italian corvette, the name "Barometre Araucano" has been given. This novel weather guide is the shell of a crab, one of the Anomura, probably of the genus Lithodes. It is peculiarly sensitive to atmospheric changes. It has a color nearly white in dry weather, but as soon as wet weather approaches small red spots are exhibited, varying in number and intensity with the amount of moisture in the atmosphere. In the rainy season it is completely red.

Herr Johann Bielenberg, of Chemnitz, ignites silicious earths and rocks such as argillaceous porphyrite, slate, sandstone, and clay, and even mud from rivers and the sea, and then subjects to them to treatment with sulphurous acid. These materials thus acted upon attain in combination with lime hydraulic properties resembling those of the Trass, Pozzolane, and Santorine earths. Before being burned the silicious substances are mixed with coal, and during the process of ignition are acted upon by the sulphurous acid produced from sulphur, which is, together with coal, contained in pipes placed in the draught-holes of the furnace.

Gunpowder mills owned by W. H. Wakefield & Co., Gatebeck, near Kendal, England, are now lighted by electricity, and they are the first works of the kind to employ the new method of illumination. The works are about two miles in length, each dangerous building being about 200 yards from its neighbor, and the dynamo-electric machine is placed about the centre. Bare wires conduct the current on poles and trees having insulators to Swan incandescent lamps, each building having four to eight of them. The lights are inclosed in specially designed copper reflectors, enameled white on the inside, with tight-fitting plate-glass fronts, which project the light through tight-fitting hermetically-sealed windows into the interior of the buildings.

M. Widdeman insulates metal wires in this way: He prepares a bath of plumbate of potash by dissolving 10 grammes of litharge in a litre of water, in which 200 grammes of caustic potash had been added. Having permitted the solution to rest, he decants it, and the bath is ready for use. The wire to be covered with the insulating skin or film is connected to the positive pole of the battery, and a piece of platinum is attached to the negative pole. Both the wire and the platinum are then plunged in the bath, when metallic lead in a very finely divided state is precipitated at the negative pole, and peroxide of lead on the wire, causing it to assume all the colors of the spectrum, but a brownish black tint indicates the highest degree of insulation by this process.

A paper on distant vision has been submitted to the Royal Society, Edinburgh, by Dr. Maddox. It states that he finds that accommodation for a distant object in the case of most persons is naturally connected with a slight convergence of the optic axes so that the interception of the optic axes is nearer than the object looked at. At a certain distance, different in different persons, and probably varying in the same person from time to time, the optic axes naturally converge at the distance focused for. When a nearer object is looked at the point of intersection of the optic axes is beyond the object. In ordinary vision these differences between the distance of convergence and accommodation are not observed, because the effort for single vision easily overcomes them and forces the optic axes into the position corresponding to the accommodation.

An elderly Englishman was in the habit of using quicksilver and aqua fortis in separate packages and mixing them into a sort of ointment for rheumatism. On one occasion, however, they were put into the same bottle by the druggist. They exploded in the purchaser's pocket, burning him so that he died.

According to the new British Medical Directory the whole number of doctors in Great Britain is 25,038. Of these 4,417 are in London, 11,775 on the provincial list, 1,000 in Scotland, 2,430 in Ireland, 1,717 reside abroad, and 2,493 are in the army and navy, the Indian medical service, and the mercantile marine.

Dr. Gross is quoted in the Philadelphia Medical Record as saying that if the brain is penetrated by a ball, the rule to let it alone is an exceedingly bad one; investigation has shown that the brain can be handled to a considerable extent with impunity, and there is a great future for operations within the cranial cavity.

The following notes of a speech recently delivered in Dublin are not without interest. Speaking on the much-vexed Irish land question, the speaker said: "The country is overrun by absentee landlords," and, after a magnificent peroration, delivered from the tub on which he was standing, he said: "I tell you the cup of old Ireland's misery is overflowing; aye, and it is not full yet."

A curious fete is to be held at Pompeii at the beginning of May. The first day it is supposed there is a visit of the Emperor of Rome to Pompeii; there will be circus games, chariot races, a procession, and a number of shops will be decked out as they would have appeared 1,800 years ago. On the second day there will be a marriage and a funeral, with their respective rites. The third day are promised gladiatorial games and a gladiatorial fete.

The Polish newspaper Kri (Border Land) states that there is at present in the medical faculty of the University of Kharkoff a first year's student, named Dzeetchakovski, whose age is 60 years. In 1863 he was a third-year student of the medical course at the University of Warsaw, but as he took part in the then Polish insurrection, he was exiled to Siberia, and remained there till, in accordance with the imperial coronation manifesto of last year, he, in common with other Poles, was allowed to return to Europe.

A new fashion has found favor in certain Parisian drawing rooms. As the guests arrive, in response to an invitation for a soiree dansante, they are met at the door by a young lady who gives a small bouquet to each person, and insists that the flower shall be attached to the buttonhole of the gentleman or the corsage of the lady. Each gentleman is then expected to seek out the lady who wears a nosegay similar in every respect to his own, and he thereupon, after the customary salutations, becomes her partner for the rest of the evening. This compulsory coupling, when skilfully organized, favors many intrigues, promotes match making, and affords a good opportunity for the display of spite by bringing unsympathetic persons together.

In support of a resolution passed at a popular meeting in Bradford, England, that home lessons should not be compulsory on children under 10 years, Dr. Rabagliati stated that in the last decade deaths from hydrocephalus at the school ages had increased 20 per cent. This he believed must in part be attributed to educational overpressure. He also pointed out that cancer had increased in the same period by nearly 50 per cent. While he did not think this could be attributed to the same cause, he begged the School Board to take care lest, by forced study, an additional impetus might be given to the causes which were powerfully increasing the mortality from nervous disorder.

In France there are now 4,575 miles of navigable rivers and 2,900 miles of canals. In the year 1852 there were only 4,190 miles of river navigable and 2,440 miles of canals, the increase in the length of rivers being 385 miles and in that of canals 460 miles. But this increase has been effected at an enormous expense, the total amount spent from 1852 up to the year 1878 being close upon $70,000,000, while since then, under the scheme of M. de Freycinet for the development of communication by land or water, a further sum of $55,000,000 has already been spent. Thus in round figures the cost since 1852 has been $125,000,000, and yet the quantity of goods carried by water has only increased 4,000,000 tons.

ANTE-BELLUM DAYS.

A Reminiscence of Old Times on the Mississippi River—A Thrilling Incident in the Life of the Famous James Bowie—A Duel on Deck

In ante-bellum times nowhere on the continent were more exciting scenes witnessed than in the cabins of some of the Mississippi river steamers, and of these none were more dramatic and tragical than the following incident. Gambling, ofttimes for the highest stakes, was universal, particularly on the New Orleans packets, and professional gamblers frequently made these boats their homes. Much has been already written concerning the lives and characters concerning these men, and many are the incidents related in which they bore conspicuous, if not always honorable, parts. Among the various gambling scenes that have occurred on western and southern rivers, there is one which should not be forgotten, the more so that one of the principal actors in the event is known throughout the country to have been a man of tried bravery and courage, and his name, James Bowie, is always associated with the idea of reckless fearlessness.

In a recent conversation with an old steamboat man, a Republican reporter learned of the following, which occurred on board the steamer Orleans, Capt. Davis—father of Capt. John B. Davis, late of the Diamond Jolline—master, in the fall of 1832. At that time the river steamers were beginning to be infested with organized gangs of gamblers, which in a few years embraced in its ranks as allies and confederates many of the bar-keepers and other officers of the boats of higher rank, and with their assistance and connivance, many a planter was robbed of his allies and driven to suicide or murder.

In the fall of the year the merchants and planters of the country along the lower river went east to purchase goods or to collect the proceeds of the years' crop of cotton or sugar, and their arrival at and departure from New York were carefully noted by emissaries of the gamblers. If it was known that they carried back to the west or south any large amount of money, they were watched, and an efficient gang of sharps was placed upon their tracks.

In the summer of 1835, a young gentleman of Natchez, who had just been married, made an extended wedding trip to the north, and on his way back home had stopped in New York to collect a number of bills which had been entrusted to him for collection by planters at and near Natchez, and the amount in the aggregate was quite large.

Shortly after his arrival in New York the young man was spotted and his acquaintance made by several of the gambling fraternity, but, though they tried hard to do so, they failed to inveigle him into any of their dens. When he had transacted his business there, the young man started for home with his wife, but knowing of his probable route a well-organized gang started ahead of him, leaving two of the fraternity to accompany their intended victim and keep him in sight.

Learning at Pittsburg that he would take a steamer for Louisville, where he would remain a few days and then take one of the New Orleans packets for Natchez, they joined him on the boat; and on the trip to Louisville card-playing was introduced to wile away the time. Having been allowed to win small sums, by the time they had reached Louisville the victim imagined he knew all about the game. This game, which at the time referred to was very much in vogue, was called a twenty-card poker, and was played with the tens, jacks, and queens, kings, and aces of the pack, and as but four could play at a time, the game was admirably adapted for what is known to the gaming fraternity as "three pluck one."

After a pleasant visit in Louisville the young man took passage on the steamer Orleans for Natchez. The gentleman's cabin, where all the card-playing was done, was on the main deck, directly under the ladies' cabin. Instead of the round wheel houses now seen, the Orleans' were square, flat on top, and came up to within two feet of the hurricane deck, and the distance between them was about thirty-five feet. Not long after leaving Louisville card-playing was resumed, and so effectually had the gamblers carried out their scheme that they had won nearly all their victim's money before reaching Vicksburg and had intended to complete their work before Natchez was reached, a comparatively easy task, as he was drunk and desperate. A few miles above Vicksburg a tall, straight, and dignified gentleman, having much the appearance of a preacher, got aboard the boat, and in a few minutes took a seat near the gamblers, where he could see all that was going on. Several times during the continuance of the game, and after the tall stranger had come aboard, the young wife of the gamblers' victim had besought him to leave their company, but in vain, so deep was the infatuation of the game and so strong his belief that he could yet win back the money which he had lost. Play continued into the night, and by 1 o'clock in the morning his money was all won from him, and, rendered desperate by the knowledge that he had been recreant to the trust reposed to him, the victim rose from his seat and rushed wildly to the side of the boat, intent upon self-destruction, but just as he was in the act of springing overboard he was seized by a grip of iron and held, and, his young wife appearing at the time, he was taken to his room by the stranger, who assured her that all would be right if she would only keep her husband in the room until his return.

Returning to the cabin, where the gamblers and their friends were standing around the bar drinking, the stranger drew out of his pockets a well-filled wallet, and taking out of it a $100 bank-note, asked the barkeeper to change it for him. This the barkeeper could not do, but referred him to the principal gambler, saying: "This gentleman can change it for you." "Oh, yes," he answered at once, "won't you take a drink?" Thanking him, the stranger accepted the invitation, and while the change was being made just touched his glass to his lips. The gamblers had all seen the well-filled wallet, and as the stranger casually remarked that he stopped at Natchez, they determined to try to catch and fleece him. One of them remarked that he did not care to go bed, and proposed that another game be played, to which, of course, the others agreed, but, as there were three of them who understood the game and it required four to play it, the stranger was invited to join them, which, after a little hesitation on his part, he assented to.

The game began by the stranger being allowed to win several large bets, but he kept his eyes open, and, although they did not know it, he was perfectly aware of what was going on. After playing for about an hour, and just as day was breaking, the gamblers concluded to finish by giving the stranger a hand which would induce him to bet largely, and as there were three of them, and he could not tell, they felt certain they could make him put up all he had before they would allow him to have a show.

Everything worked as they had anticipated, the man opposite the stranger dealt the cards, and the man on the right went $10 blind; the ante was $5. When the cards were dealt, the stranger put up $20, and the next man did the same, when the dealer raised him $20, putting up $40. When it came to the turn of the one who had made the blind he put up $130, thus raising it $100. The stranger quietly put up the requisite amount, and when the next man bet $100 more, the next man, the dealer, then threw up his hand and drew out. The two remaining gamblers then kept raising the bet whenever it came their turn, the stranger coolly putting up whatever sum was necessary, until the the total amount on the table was $100,000, of which the stranger had contributed one third. While the betting was going on the stranger had kept his eyes on the dealer, and had, by his watchfulness, prevented any changing of the cards. Toward the last he saw a card slipped by the dealer to the man who had made the blind, when seizing his wrist with one hand, he drew a murderous-looking knife with the other, and forced the gambler to lay his cards on the table face down. All sprang to their feet, and the stranger quietly said that when that hand was raised and it should be found to contain six cards, he would kill the owner; telling the other to show his cards, he threw down his own hand, which consisted of four kings and a ten spot.

The baffled gambler, livid with rage and disappointment, swore that the stranger should fight him, demanding, with an oath, to know who he was anyway. Quietly, and as if in the presence of ladies, the stranger answered, 'James Bowie."

At the sound of that name two of the gamblers quailed, for they knew that the man who bore that name was a terror to even the bravest, but the third, who had never heard of 'James Bowie," demanded a a duel at once. This was acceded to at once by Bowie, with a smile; pistols—derringers—were the weapons selected, the hurricane-roof the place, and the time at once Sweeping the whole of the money into his hat, Bowie went to the room where the unhappy wife sat guarding her husband's uneasy slumbers, and, rapping on the door, he handed her, when she had opened it, the hat and its contents, telling her that, if he did not come, two-thirds of the money was her husband's, and the balance his own.

Ascending to the hurricane-roof the principals were placed one upon the top of each wheel house. This brought them about twelve yards apart, and each was exposed to the other from the knee up. The pistols were handed to them, and the gambler's second gave the word, "one, two, three, fire, stop," uttered at intervals of one second each, and they were allowed to fire at any time between the utterance of the words one and stop.

As "one" rang out on the clear morning air both raised their weapons, as "three" was heard the gambler's pistol rang out, and before the sound had ceased, and while the word "fire" was being uttered, Bowie's pistol sounded, and simultaneous with this sound, the gambler fell, and giving a convulsive struggle, rolled off the wheel-house into the river.

Bowie coolly blew the smoke out of his pistol, shut down the pan (the flint-lock was in use at the time) and going down into the ladies' cabin, obtained his hat and divided the money which it contained into three portions. Two of these he gave to the young wife and the other he kept, as it was his own money. Having awakened her husband, the fond wife showed him the money and told him all she knew about the affair, not having heard of the duel. When the husband became acquainted with all the facts his gratitude to his benefactor was deep and lasting.

Not desiring to be made a hero of, Bowie, when the boat reached Rodney, determined to go ashore, and as he was leaving the boat both the husband and wife clung to him as though he was a father leaving them. It was afterward ascertained that the amount which Bowie returned to the wife was within less than $100 of the sum which the gamblers had won from her husband.

MUCH IN A LITTLE.

Many proprietary medicines, if they cure at all, require such a large quantity to produce effect that it makes them very uncertain and expensive remedies. Not so with Burdock Blood Bitters. It is highly concentrated and of all diseases of blood, liver kidneys, one or two bottles will cure more than gallons of the weak mixtures usually sold. Send for facts and figures.

Special religious services are still continued in the Methodist Church, Owen Sound with delightful interest and encouragement. Around the Station.—The railway authorities are making extensive improvements and alterations, in preperation for the opening of navigation increased business which will be done through Owen Sound this season. The esplanade south of the present passenger depot is being prepared for a coal dock, and entensive sheds are being erected. The marsh is also being graded, and a gravel train is kept at work filling it up so as to make more room for sidings and other facilities for the handling of freight. The elevator is progressing rapidly, and will be ready for the reception of grain shortly after the opening of navigation. The C. P. R. boats are expected to leave Port Colburne for here as soon as the ice will permit.—O. S. Advertiser.

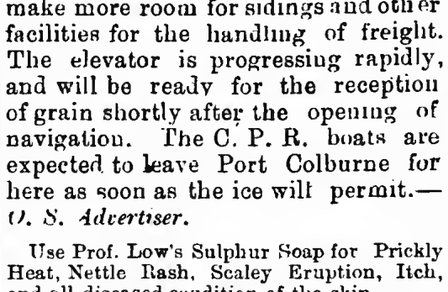
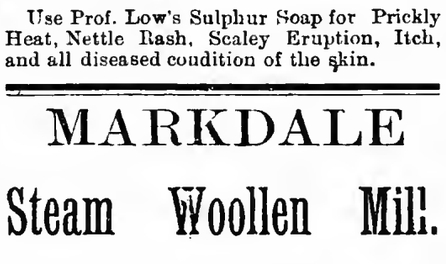
Steam Woollen Mill.



The undersigned would respectfully return thanks to their many customers and friends for the very liberal support accorded to them during the past, and would solicit a continuance of the same, as we are now ready to attend to all work intrusted to our care in CUSTOM CARDING, FULLING and WEAVING in first-class style. As we have put on new cards, and made other improvements, we will endeavor to do as good work in the future, if not better, than we have ever done in the past.



Customers wishing to have their wool carded, spun and made into blankets or flannel, on cotton warp, can have their orders attended to by leaving their wool as early as possible.

Please remember the place, Mill Street, west of the Railway Station.

Poetry.

Pity the Drunkard.

Oh! pity the drunkard, though fallen and low,
He has not been always a picture of woe;
No, once he had hopes, and fair Fortune did shine,
But those hopes have been blasted by the demon of wine.

Oh! pity the drunkard, nor sneer or despise,
Nor look on his woes with the Pharisee's eyes;
But lend him a hand in his dark hour of need,
And the God of the falling will grant thee thy meed.

Oh! pity the drunkard, nor think him a fool,
Because he has sunken in the soul-damning pool
His temptations are great, and though black is his shame,
Remember you're weak, and would fall just the same.

Oh! pity the drunkard, and his once happy home,
How glad were his children when daddy did come;
But, ah! those sweet hours forever are gone,
And the fond-hearted wife now sits shivering alone.

Oh! pity the drunkard, ye loving and fair,
Who the sceptre of government constantly bear
But give now your influence, your help, and your cheer,
And the demon of strong drink will soon disappear.

Oh! pity the drunkard, and think of his fate
And come to his rescue before 'tis too late;
Ye mothers of Israel, to virtue prove true,
The weak and the wretched are calling on you.

Oh! pity the drunkard, ye noble and great,
Who hold in your hands the reigns of the State,
And give us a law that will sweep from our shores
The curse that is slaying our neighbors in scores.

Oh! pity the drunkard, ye Christians arise
And dry up the tears from the fond mother's eyes;
No longer sit careless, but up in your might,
And gird on your armor and nobly fight.

Oh! pity the drunkard, fair, noble and true,
The hopes of our land all centre in you;
Then up to the contest, and nobly stand,
And save from destruction our much favored land.

The Humber Disaster.

THE CLAIMS OF THE SUFFERERS IN THE HANDS OF THE GRAND TRUNK.

The Humber relief committee have decided upon the amount of the claims against the Grand Trunk railway by the sufferers from the Humber disaster, and the claims has been placed in the hands of John Bell, Q. C., solicitor for the G. T. R., who is still considering it. The amount claimed totals up to $90,000. The matter will be carried to the courts if the Grand Trunk authorities refuse a settlement. As to how the measure of the claim for each individual was arrived at a legal member of the committee yesterday said:

"We were guided by Lord Campbell's English act, which has been exactly reproduced in Canada. This measure fixes the exact pecuniary value of a head of a family without allowing anything for wounded feelings, or anything but the actual money value of the deceased. Then we have to consider how much a dead man is worth to his family, deducting a sum sufficient for his own living expenses. Take, for instance, a young man of 22, earning $12 per week, or $600 per annum. According to the mortuary tables, which guided the committee, the man would have a prospective life at 35 years. We would take his income for this time, deducting expenditures mentioned. The value of his life had he a wife and family would be about $7,000."—Toronto News.

A BLESSING TO ALL MANKIND.

In these times when our Newspapers are flooded with patent medicine advertisements, it is gratifying to know what to procure that will certainly cure you. If you are billious, Blood out of order, Liver inactive or generally debilitated, there is nothing in the world that will cure you so quickly as Electric Bitters. They are a blessing to all mankind, and can be had for only fifty cents a bottle at A. Turner & Co's Drug Store. 3

How to Make and Set Lightning Rods.

The extra charge of electricity in the passing cloud wants to get to the earth, and it will effect a passage if it is possible. The air resists it. If there is just enough of even a poor conductor to enable it to overcome the air's resistance, down it will go. 1st. If the partial conductor can not carry it all, it will rend a way, splitting trees, demolishing house-timbers, numbing or destroying living bodies.—2d. It will choose the path that offers the least resistance. It will follow a long way round through copper or iron rather than take a short cut through any poorer conductor.—3d. If a sharp point is at the top of a roadway, it will come down in a small stream; but if a large ball or blunt end is presented, it will come down in a mass.—4th. It will seek the shortest possible route through the resisting air.—5th. If a rod of iron stands on one end off a roof, and an electric cloud chances to pass near the other end, and there is some moisture or metal in the building, they may be on the whole a better roadway from the cloud to the earth, then to go through the long air space to reach the rod, and that part of the barn may get the charge.—6th. If in passing through a building, the electricity has to cross an air space, near hay or straw, it maw develop heat in the air and it will be quite likely to start a fire.

HOW TO SET LIGHTNING RODS.—There is a great deal of nonsense and humbuggery about Lightning Rods. All that is needed is to furnish the electricity with a better channel than it can find in a barn or house, or other buildings. Run a round or square iron rod, threequarters to one inch through, or a copper one, five eighths inch in diameter, down in the earth where it is always moist and up on the outside of the building, to a few feet above its highest point, and the electricity will ALWAYS follow that rod. If the top of the rod terminates in one or two, or better three sharp points, kept bright by silvering or nickeling (not absolutely necessary) the electricity will come down so quickly, that it will never be perceived. A galvanized iron rod (that is one coated with tin zinc) will last longer, because it will not rust.—ORANGE JUDD, American Agriculturist for May.

The World in Disquiet.

A glance at the world shows it to be in a state of great unrest. In Egypt the wretched inhabitants of that country, supported by the English, are struggling against the rebel hordes of the fanatical El Mahdi. Russia is moving steadily down upon the northern frontier of India, having recently occupied Merv, said to be the key to England's eastern possessions. In Tonquin the French are carring on hostilities which may ultimately bring about a conflict with China, in which event the sprightly republic will have probably more than it can attend to. In Russia and Austria the excesses of the anarchists are so great that it is evident that much stronger curbs will be nessary for the democracy in monarchical institutions would continue. In Germany the socialists take up a large part of the wily Bismarck's attention, and in England the dynamitard is keeping officials in a state of constant alarm. In Cuba a small band of adventurers is illustrating insurrection, and Mexico and the rebublics of South America are in a state of chronic rebellion. Nearer home, in the United States, are heard moanings of the storm of conflict which will yet rage there against corruption, monopoly and the despotism of capital. At present Canada is the most peaceful and therefore the happiest country in the world.—News.

Woman's Weight.

We had a letter recently asking how heavy a woman should be in proportion to her length. Of course a young girl may becomingly be thinner than a matron, but we think that we have been about right in making up the following table:—

	Pounds.
Five feet in height should weigh	100
Five feet one inch should weigh	106
Five feet two inches should weigh	113
Five feet three inches should weigh	119
Five feet four inches should weigh	130
Five feet five inches should weigh	138
Five feet six inches should weigh	144
Five feet seven inches should weigh	150
Five feet eight inches should weigh	155
Five feet nine inches should weigh	163
Five feet ten inches should weigh	169
Five feet eleven inches should weigh	176
Six feet should weigh	180

Selling Eggs by Weight.

There is from twenty to thirty per cent difference in the weight of eggs, yet the costum is almost universal in the Eastern markets, of selling them by the dozen at a uniform price. Evey ducks' eggs, which are much larger, and by some regarded as richer, bring no more than the smallest hen's eggs of not half the weight. In California, eggs, fruits, and many other articles that are here sold by the dozen, the bunch, or by measure, are sold by weight. The practice is a good one, and works beneficially for all parties, especially for the producer. It operates as a premium upon the cultivation of the most productive varieties of fruits, vegetables, and farm stock. The farmer, who is pains-taking with his poultry and gets the largest weight of eggs, has a fair reward for his skill and industry. The present custom is a premium to light weights, and good layers. We need a change in the interest of fair dealing in trade, and, if necessary, it should be enforced by legislation. If the legislature is competent to fix the weight of a bushel of corn or potatoes, it can easily regulate the weight of a dozen eggs, and thus promote the justice between buyer and seller.—American Agriculturist for May.

Wise Bits.

It is not what we earn, but what we save that makes us rich.

It is not what we intend, but what we do that makes us useful.

It is not what we read, but what we remember, that makes us wise.

More money and less credit will bring more happiness and less misery.

It is not what we eat, but what we digest that makes us strong.

It is not a few faint wishes, but a life-long struggle that makes us valient.

Chatsworth Spring Fair.

There was a large turnout at the above fair and a fine display of stallions, also a good show of bulls, while implements were in abundance we have not yet received the prize list.

IN GOLDEN BONDS.

"She may have been instigated," suggested the detective. "It's wonderful what things women will do for their lovers, and she had a lover—not of the best possible character."

Mr. Rayner gave a quick glance at me, and I felt guilty, for it was indeed I who had given this piece of information.

"Do you know his name?" asked Mr. Rayner.

"I am not in a position to state it yet; but we have our suspicions," said the man cautiously.

Mr. Rayner gave no sign of incredulity; but I knew his face well enough now to be able to tell that he did not believe him.

"The main point now is, having traced the jewels to the woman Sarah Gooch, to find out how they came into her possession. I must ask you to let me see the woman and question her. Taken by surprise, she may confess everything."

"You shall see her," said Mr. Rayner gravely, "and then judge for yourself whether she is in a state to answer questions. I will ask the nurse if you can see her now. Miss Christie, would you mind going up with me and watching in her place while Mrs. Saunders comes out to speak to me?"

We went up together, scarcely speaking a word; and I sent out the nurse to him and stood watching in her place. Sarah, looking more hideous than ever with the white bandage round her head and against her leather-colored face and black hair, was turning her head from side to side and moaning and muttering feebly. The only words one could catch seemed to refer to the pain she was in. Then the door opened, the nurse re-entered, and the detective, with Mr. Rayner behind him, peeped in. A glance at the hollow face and dry lips of the sick woman might have satisfied him that her illness was no sham; but he watched her and listened to her mutterings for some minutes before he retired. I left the room as quickly as I could—the sight of the ghastly figure of the guilty woman sickened me.

"You see," Mr. Rayner was saying as I got outside, "she is quite unable at present to speak for herself. I hope, and indeed believe, that, when she can do so, she will be able to clear herself of anything worse than perhaps the innocent passing of the stolen goods from one rogue to another, without herself having the least idea of the crime she was being made to participate in. I will do all in my power to assist the course of justice. The doctor will be here in the morning, and he will tell you when she is likely to be able to give an account of herself. In the meantime you shall spend the night here. Miss Christie, will you kindly tell Mrs. Jennings to prepare the room next to mine and Mrs. Rayner's."

The name "Mrs. Jennings" for the moment puzzled me; then I remembered it was that of the cook, and I wondered why he had not said Jane. His room and Mrs. Rayner's! Did Mr. Rayner then sleep in the house since his wife's change of apartment?

The cook grumbled a good deal when I gave her the order. What was the house being turned topsy-turvy for? Why had Mr Rayner just sent Jane off to Wright's Farm to pay the corn-bill, to-day of all days, when there was a visitor and more to do? Telling her she might stop the night too, if the fog came on, as it was doing, when he might have known she wouldn't want telling twice when that hulking Peter Wright was about the farm! She knew what it was; Jane would not be back till late to-morrow afternoon, if she was then, and——

And so the cook went on, until Mr. Rayner appeared upon the scene, and she broke off in her complaints, startled.

"I am afraid I have entailed a good deal of trouble upon you, cook; by thoughtlessly giving Jane permission to spend the night at the farm if the fog grew thick; so I have just asked Mrs. Saunders to take her up some dinner till Jane comes back, in return for which you will be kind enough to watch by Sarah during her unavoidable absences."

This silenced the cook at once. It was a just punishment for her grumbling, for there was no duty she would not rather have undertaken than that of watching by the unconscious Sarah even in her quiet moments. She said to me afterwards that the nurse was very good; directly Sarah began to talk or grow excited, Mrs. Saunders always managed to hear, and came in to relieve her from the unpleasant task of listening to the sick woman's ravings.

I left Mr. Rayner talking to the cook, and went back to Haidee in the dining-room. When tea-time came, Mr. Rayner entered with the detective, whom he now addressed as "Mr Maynard," and treated as a distinguished guest. Mr. Maynard, talked rather interestingly when his host drew him out, and was elaborately courteous to Mrs. Rayner, whose cold manner rather overawed him, and to me. He went to his room early, and, when Mrs. Rayner had gone to hers, I remained in the drawing-room putting the music in order, as Mr. Rayner had told me to do.

"This day's events have upset me more than you can imagine, child," said he, passing his hand through his hair wearily. "That vixen Sarah has always seemed honest—and yet I don't know what to believe."

"And, you know, the portmanteau I found in the cellar," I whispered timidly.

Mr. Rayner started.

"Good Heaven, I had forgotten that! Or rather I had dismissed it from my mind as a fancy brought about by the excitement of Sarah's accident, and hastily connected in your mind with your view of old Tom Parkes carrying a box across the lawn. Where are the store-room keys, child?" asked he excitedly. "We must go at once to the cellar, and—— Heaven help us if what I took for your fancy should prove to be the truth!"

I tremblingly produced the keys, which I carried about with me; and, much against my will, I accompanied Mr. Rayner into the left wing. He took the keys from me; but he was so very excited that he could not find the right one to fit into the door, and I opened it for him. We crossed the store-room. There lay the black bag on one side of the trap door, where I had put it down on catching sight of the little ring in the floor. I put my finger through this and raised it again, not without a shudder at the remembrance of my last visit, and Mr. Rayner went down hastily, while I held the candle for him to see by.

"No, my child, I see nothing," said he, as he peered about.

"Look through the ladder; it is behind there," said I.

Mr. Rayner looked through it, then looked round it, stretched his arm out, and again raised his face to mine, this time however with a look of unutterable relief.

"Thank Heaven, it was your fancy, child!" said he. "There is nothing there."

"Not a deal table?" I gasped.

"No—nothing but water."

"Perhaps the water has risen higher and covered it?"

"Come down yourself and see. Or are you afraid to come down again?"

"No, I am not afraid," said I, uncertainly.

He came up and took the candle from me, while I descended. The water, I knew by the number of steps which were dry above it, was at the same level as before. I looked through the ladder and round it. Table and portmanteau had utterly disappeared. As I looked up suddenly, Mr. Rayner's face, distorted by the weird light thrown on it by the flickering candle, seemed to me to wear a mocking smile which made the handsome features hideous and alarming.

"Let me come up," said I sharply.

He held out his hand, and, when I, trembling and tottering, reached the top of the ladder, he flung his arm around me to support me. But I was so sick with the horror of finding my story—my true story—disproved, and with the fancy I had had on looking up at Mr. Rayner's face, that I slid from his arm, ran out of the store-room, along the passage and through the swing-door, and leaned against the hall table to recover myself. Mr. Rayner was at my side in a few minutes' and, almost unconsciously, I let him lead me back into the drawing-room. He brought me some brandy-and-water and made me drink it, and bathed my forehead, and told me gently not to be frightened, for I should soon be out of this dreary place and among beautiful scenes where I should forget the gloom of this sepulchral, dead-alive house, which was turning my poor little brain.

"But indeed I did see the portmanteau the first time!" said I piteously.

"Yes, dear child, I know," said Mr. Rayner.

But I saw he did not believe me; and the tears began to roll down my cheeks.

"You must not cry, you must not cry! You will spoil your pretty face if you cry," said Mr. Rayner almost angrily.

I knew he hated the sight of anything ugly or distressing—it was part of an artist's nature, he said; so I forced back my tears as fast as I could, and tried to smile.

"There is my lovely girl again!" said he; stopping in front of me—he had walked up and down the room while I wept. "We will never mention Sarah's name again when once we are away from her, little one," said he. "But until we go, or until our respected friend Mr Maynard goes, I am afraid she must still occupy a good deal of our thoughts. She will certainly not submit to any cross-examination on his part to-morrow, or for a long time to come—if she ever is," said he gravely. "And in the meantime he will try to trump up a story and to criminate as many persons as he can, just to show his superiors that he has not wasted his time here. And certainly he will leave our poor Sarah without a rag of character.

"But, do you know, Mr. Rayner, I don't think Sarah has always been as nice a woman as you suppose," said I timidly. "From what I have heard her say, I think, when she was young, she must have had some horrid friends, who made her do all sorts of wrong things; and that is why I cannot be as much surprised as you are at her doing wicked things now."

"Did you tell Mr. Maynard that?"

"No, I only answered his questions. He said he was her brother—and of course I did not want him to doubt his own sister. But, Mr. Rayner, I want to ask you something. Have you ever heard of a James Woodfall?"

He was sitting by me on the sofa, with his head turned away. He did not answer my question at once. The he said very quietly—

"Did Mr. Maynard ask you that?"

He turned slowly as he said so, until his eyes met mine.

"Oh, no! I heard Sarah say the name when she was delirious—the first night—Friday night," I whispered.

"Oh! Was he a friend of hers?"

"Oh, yes! I think she must have been in love with him when she was young, and he must have been a very bad man who made her do anything he liked, and the most curious part of it is that she—she mixes his name up with the people she knows now," said I, lowering my voice still more.

"How?" asked Mr. Rayner. "Whose name does she mix his up with?"

"Why, with—with mine, Mr. Rayner!" said I, blushing uncomfortably at the very thought. "She kept saying in her ravings that this wicked forger—for she said he was a forger—James Woodfall was in love with me and wanted to marry me, and that he wanted her to help to marry this common thief to me. Wasn't it dreadful to have to listen to that?" whispered I excitedly.

"Did she say James Woodfall was a common thief?"

"No, I gathered that from what she said. Did you ever hear of him Mr. Rayner?"

"Yes, I have heard of him, and I believe he is alive now," he said.

"Then I believe that she is in love with him still, and that he is at the bottom of this dreadful robbery!" cried I, much excited. "Oh, Mr. Rayner, couldn't you find out from Sarah where he is now, while the detective is here, and get him caught?" I said breathlessly.

Mr. Rayner shook his head thoughtfully.

"I'm afraid not, my dear child. If James Woodfall is the man I mean, he will never be taken alive," said he.

CHAPTER XXVII.

Mr. Rayner slept that night in the dressing-room leading out of the large front room which his wife now occupied. I met him coming out of it as I went down-stairs to breakfast next morning. I spent the hours until dinner-time in my own room, packing and preparing for the journey next day.

It was curious, I thought, that I had not heard again from my mother, who would naturally be overflowing with excitement about such a great event. I had written a long letter to her on Monday, and put it into the post-bag, with no misgivings as to its safety now that my enemy Sarah was ill. It was a very pleasant thing to think that I should soon be with my mother again, and that in a few days I should see Laurence; but there was a less bright view to be taken of the expedition, and from time to time, in the midst of my happy anticipation, it troubled me.

It seemed an unkind thing, in spite of her obstinate refusal to quit the Alders, to leave delicate Mrs. Rayner alone in this dreary place, the gloom and damp of which had evidently had much to do with the morbid state of mind she was in, with no companions, and no other inmates of the house, except a weird child who was not fond of her, two servants, a sick-nurse, and a delerious invalid. I had noticed faint signs of nervous agitation in her manner lately when the coming journey was alluded to, and I had caught her eyes fixed upon mine sometimes as if she had something to say to me which she could not bring herself to the point of uttering; and the strange perversity of the poor lady, who seemed now mad, now sane, puzzled me more and more.

The Doctor, for whose verdict Mr. Maynard was waiting, did not come that day until just before dinner; and then his report was as gloomy as possible. He did not think it probable that Sarah would ever recover her reason, and the only change she was likely to get from her sick-room was to the county lunatic asylum. On hearing this, the detective, who had spent the morning in making inquiries, in searching Sarah's boxes, and even her room, at Mr. Rayner's suggestion, in examining every corner of the housekeeper's room in which she generally sat, and of the store-cupboard under the stairs, which was also under her charge—but I do not think he went into the left wing, where the large store-room was—having failed to make any discovery, wished to return to town that afternoon; but Mr. Rayner pressed him to stay, saying that he would drive him over to Denham Court that afternoon, and, in the character of a friend of his, come down from town for a few days, he could examine the scene of the robbery and make inquiries without any one's suspecting who he was, and perhaps pick up some scraps of information which would save him from the reproach of having made a journey in vain.

"Do you know enough about railways to pass for an engineer, or inspector, or anything of that sort?" asked Mr. Rayner. "You know, of course, that suspicion has fallen upon a gang of navvies who are at work upon the line near there; but, although there have been detectives among them since, not one has been sharp enough to discover anything yet."

The man seemed a little shy at first of interfering in a branch of the work of watching which had been put into other hands. But he was rather put upon his mettle by the allusion to the fact that his journey had been so far a failure. And Mr. Rayner whispered to me in the hall, with his eyes twinkling, when the detective was already seated in the dog-cart at the door, that he had put that fellow up to discovering something—it did not matter what, wrong or right. He said they should be back early, as the fog was rising already, and, in order to repay Mr. Maynard for detaining him, there was to be dinner at half-past six, instead of the usual tea at half-past five. And, in the very highest spirits, Mr. Rayner patted my shoulder, told me to save myself up for the next day, and that he had a present to give me on the journey, and jumped into the dog-cart.

I went back into the dining-room, where the cook was clearing away the luncheon, Jane, as she had predicted, not having come back yet. Mrs. Rayner was sitting by the fire, with Haidee on her lap.

"Are you unhappy at the thought of losing her so soon?" said I softly, leaving my seat and kneeling by her side, as soon as the cook had left the room.

Mrs. Rayner looked at me earnestly, and then whispered—

"No, I am not unhappy about her, but about you."

"About me, Mrs. Rayner!" I exclaimed, in astonishment.

"Hush!" she whispered softly. She took her arms from her child's neck, and told her to go and play; and Haidee obediently walked to the window, where her doll was lying on the floor.

"It is as much as my wretched life is worth to warn you," whispered she, taking the hand I had laid on her lap, and clasping and unclasping her own about it nervously. "You are kind-hearted, and innocent as a child—I see that now," she continued, her eyes wandering restlessly about the room.

I began to be afraid of a fit of hysterics, or worse; and I begged her not to talk if it fatigued her, and asked her if I should fetch some eau-de-Cologne. She shook her head.

"I am not hysterical—don't be afraid of that," said she, turning her great eyes upon me, as if in reproach. "I only want to tell you this—when you arrive in London to-morrow, if your mother is not waiting at the station, insist upon going to her house before you go farther. Do not on any account enter another train without her. Call the guard—make a disturbance at the station—do anything rather."

"But how can I?" said I gently. "I cannot insist against Mr. Rayner. He would not listen. You know that, when he tells one to do a thing, there is such a strong authority about him, one must do it."

"Try, try!" said she earnestly. "I believe you have the power, if you have the courage. You have thwarted his wishes as nobody else has has ever dared to do—in sending for Doctor Lowe, in taking Haidee up stairs. Try once more. It is not Sarah's safety that is concerned this time, nor Haidee's, but your own. For Heaven's sake, try!"

She lay back in the chair, her face, neck, and hands all wet with the violence of her feeling and her unaccustomed vehemence. Yet her voice had never once risen above a whisper that could not have been heard at the other end of the room. She raised her head again, and read with unexpected penetration the look on my face.

"I am not mad, Miss Christie," she said very quietly. "Think me mad if you like—if your mother meets you at Liverpool Street Station. But, if not, remember my warning; it may have cost me my life."

She shook off my hand and lay back again, as if wishing for rest. And I remained on my knees beside her, not knowing what to think, whether she was mad or sane, whether I should follow her advice or dismiss her words as—no, I could not think them idle; that she herself had been in terrible earnest as she uttered them I could not doubt. What then? She wanted to make me distrust her husband. She had not spoken like a jealous woman; she was too cold, too indifferent for jealousy. What strange fancy was this of hers about the journey? If my mother should not be at the station waiting for us, which was very likely, as she was seldom punctual, I should still have Haidee with me. I should naturally suggest waiting for her; but, if she did not come soon, probably Mr. Rayner himself would send or go to my uncle's house in search of her. What had I to fear with Mr. Rayner, my best and kindest friend, next to Laurence, in the world? Why should a morbid fancy of his poor, sickly, fanciful wife trouble me?

And yet the impression her words had made upon me was so strong that I determined, if my mother should not arrive at the station shortly after us—that she would be there already was too much to expect of her—that I would ask Mr. Rayner to let me take a cab to my uncle's house and fetch her myself.

Mrs. Rayner scarcely spoke for the rest of the afternoon; that unusual burst of vehemence seemed to have exhausted her.

The fog which had been hanging about us for days, grew so thick as the afternoon wore on that we had to have the lamps lighted much earlier than usual, and it was quite dark when, at about half-past four, there was a ring at the front-door bell. The cook came in to say that a boy from the village wanted to speak to Miss Christie; and I went into the hall and found a little fellow of about ten whom I did not know, who told me that Mrs. Manners, who was at the school-house, had sent to ask me to come to her at once, as she wished to speak to me about the dole. This was a yearly distribution of clothing and money among the very poor people of the parish, which took place in November. It was rather strange that Mrs. Manners should want to speak to me about it, I thought at first, as I was not a district visitor. However, of course I must go; and I went back into the dining-room and told Mrs. Rayner about it.

"Don't go, Miss Christie," said she at once. "It is some trap, some trick; Mrs. Manners never sends messages but by her own boys. Don't go."

"I don't like not to go," said I hesitatingly. "It may be something of importance, and Mrs. Manners has been so kind to me. Please let me go, Mrs. Rayner."

She shrank into herself, and leaned back again as the cook reappeared at the door, saying the boy said Mrs. Manners's message was—would I make haste?"

"Of course you can go, Miss Christie," said Mrs. Rayner listlessly.

I ran up-stairs and was down again ready for my walk in a few minutes. The boy was evidently prepared to accompany me; and the fog was so thick that I was glad of it, for he was more used to the turns of the road than I; and even he had to go very slowly and to keep close to the hedge. He kept urging me to make haste however, and I followed him as fast as I could, while he turned every other minute to see that I was still behind him.

The school was about half a mile from the Alders, among the first houses of the village. When I stumbled against a milestone which was, I knew, not far from our destination, the boy said—

"Here, miss, take care! This way."

And, taking a corner of my cloak, he led me round into a path which branched off to the left.

"But you are going wrong," I said. "It is straight on, I know—not up here. This is the way to Dunning's Farm, half a mile off."

"It's all right, miss," said he. "I'm afraid of our being run over along the high-road now we're so near the village. Come on, miss; it's all right."

He was very impatient; and I followed him, not without some misgivings. We had groped our way up this lane for what seemed to me a very long time when the boy stopped and whistled.

"What are you doing that for?" said I sharply.

But the boy, who, by making but a few steps forward, was lost to my sight in the fog, whistled again. I stood for a moment trembling with terror. Then the boy exclaimed angrily—

"Why, he ain't here!"

"He! Who?" I cried in alarm; and at that moment I heard a crackling of branches, and saw dimly through the fog, a few yards in front of me, the figure of a man crashing through the hedge, and leaping down from the field into the road.

Smothering a cry, I turned, and ran I knew not whither. It was Tom Parkes or Gordon, who had decoyed me out here to punish me for my discoveries, which Sarah must have told them about.

Trophy from Tokar.

Lieut. Wilford Lloyd, of the I battery of the B brigade royal horse artillery, left Aldershot on a recent morning for Windsor castle in order to present the medhi's standard, captured by the British troops at the relief of Tokar, to the queen. Lieut. Wilford Lloyd, who is a relative of Mr. Clifford Lloyd, received permission to accompany the army in the Soudan, and on his return home, toward the expiration of his leave, was commissioned by Gen. Graham to convey the trophy to her majesty. The gallant officer, who has already seen considerable active service, left Trinkitat on March 5, travelling via Cairo and Alexandria to Venice (where he was detained in quarantine five days), and thence to London, where he arrived on Sunday. Lieut. Lloyd, wearing the blue and gold uniform of his corps, arrived at Windsor about noon, and immediately proceeded with the flag to the palace. The standard, which is about two and a half yards long and two yards wide, is composed of red and yellow silk. On one side is an Arabic inscription to the effect that it was presented by the medhi to the governor of Tokar, and on the other a text from the koran—"There is no god but God, and Mahomet is his prophet. Everyone professes the knowledge of God." The queen, accompanied by Princess Beatrice, received Lieut. Lloyd in the corridor after luncheon. The gallant officer who was introduced by Gen. Sir H. F. Ponsonby, presented the flag, on behalf of Gen. Graham, to her majesty, who was greatly interested in the trophy. Lieut. Lloyd was included in the queen's dinner-party.

AN OUTLAW AT BAY.

Inhuman Sufferings and Savage Courage of John Wooliver.

A prisoner died in the jail at Fort Smith, Ark., recently, after suffering agonies with demonstrated extraordinary human power of endurance. John Wooliver, after killing his last man in Texas three years ago, fled to it necessary to flee. Indian Territory offered him a refuge, and there he lived under the name of John Robinson until the early part of March, when he was taken by United States deputy marshal to Fort Smith, to be there tried for introducing and selling whiskey among the Indians. When found by the marshal, Wooliver presented a horrible appearance. He had been shot in the thigh in a drunken row last December. The femur was shivered and he lay on a rude bed in an old shanty near where he fell, and received such attention as a cattleman who was butchering near by could give him. He had no medical treatment, and his wounds were never dressed.

Some humane neighbors made up a purse and paid a man to take care of him; he was placed in an old outhouse, but no other attention was given him thad to feed and water him. Here he lay for over six weeks without ever being washed or having his wounds dressed. He was perfectly helpless, being unable to turn over, and his legs were so swollen that he could not move them. The rats gnawed off his toes, devoured part of his left foot, and bit him in other places. He could keep his tormenters off as far as his arms would reach, but was unable to scare them from his feet and had to suffer the agonies of being eaten alive.

He was at last removed from this place in a pitiable condition. Running abscesses had broken out on his legs and body, emitting a stench so offensive that none dared go near him, except to give him something to eat and drink. In this deplorable condition he was found by a deputy marshal, and removed to Fort Smith, where medical aid could be administered. The bedding upon which the man lay had rotted under him and bed-sores had formed which exposed his bones to view.

In this condition he endured a trip of 22 miles in a waggon over a rough road, and scarcely uttered a groan.

He was placed under medical treatment and everything possible done for him, but abscesses had formed on his lungs, blood poisoning had set in, and death terminated his sufferings.

The Variable Wind.

One blowing day last week, when the sidewalks were as slippery as glass, a woman stood in front of a door on Clifford street and strewed some ashes from a pan she held on the icy walk. As she did so, the wind blew the coal dust rather freely over her, and a man going past said:

"If you will turn your back to the wind it will blow the ashes from you instead of over you."

The woman thanked him with her eyes, but did not move. Indeed, she could not without losing her balance and the ashes both.

"Let me show you," said the man, kindly, as he removed a fur glove and grasped with a determined grip the well-filled ash-pan. "You can throw them over the wall in this way, and not be liable to put your eyes out. It's as easy as rolling off a log," and he braced his back against the wind and gave a generous flip to the ash-pan.

The woman went into the house to get the ashes out of her hair and eyes and recover her health. When the police had dusted the man off and identified him they took him home. The only remark he made was:

"You can't always tell from what quarter the wind will blow when you attempt to give advice about emptying an ash-pan."

Which it is so.

Miss Marrable's Elopement.

IN TWO CHAPTERS.—CHAPTER II.

Miss Marrable, who, when she received this love-letter, was sitting in her bedroom, was thunderstruck. At first, she thought of going to Amy and charging her with baseness and ingratitude; but after some reflection, she decided to let matters, for the time at least, take their course, and to confound the scheme of the rash couple by means of a grand stroke at the final moment. She knew, however, at once to Lucy, in whom, as I have said, she had great confidence, and left the hall.

"How foolish of her," said Lucy.

"Yes, my dear! how foolish, and how wicked!" assented Miss Marrable. "I feel it my duty to prevent the carrying out of any mad plan; and also to make Amy suffer for her folly. I shall therefore send her this letter; and allow the hair-brained pair to pursue their schemes.—And what, Lucy dear, do you think I propose to do? You will never guess. Listen! Amy and I are much the same height. I shall personate her by concealing—ahem—my face, and drive away with this vile young man; and then, when he believes that he has left me far behind, I shall overwhelm him with shame and confusion."

Lucy could not help laughing. "Aunt would really be good fun, aunt," she said. "Yes, send the letter to Amy; and by all means let matters take their course for the present."

Miss Marrable did send the letter; and Amy duly received it, unsuspectingly; but five minutes later, Lucy revealed the whole plot to her, and threw her into the deepest consternation.

Here, however, Lucy's superior coolness came in most usefully. "You need not despair," said the elder cousin. "If aunt thinks of having fun with you and Mr. Jellicoe, why not turn the tables, and have fun with her? You must find some other way of carrying on your correspondence; but at the same time answer this letter by the old medium. Your answer will of course fall into aunt's hands. You must mislead her, and then"——

"But," objected Amy, "how am I to make matters turn out properly?"

"Listen!" said Lucy. "Aunt proposes to personate you. Very well; put off the time of your elopement, say, for half an hour; and meantime Mr. Jellicoe must find some one to personate him. My idea is for aunt to elope with the billiard-marker, and so give you time to get away. Do you see?"

Amy could not at first grasp the significance of this bold proposition; but when she succeeded in doing so, she was delighted with it.

"I shall tell Mr. Rhodes," said Lucy, when she had sufficiently explained the plan; "for I know that he will gladly help you; and Mr. Jellicoe can talk it all over with him and have the benefit of his advice."

"But what will aunt say when she discovers how we—how you—have deceived her!" asked Amy.

"Ah!" said Lucy, slily, "I must talk about that too with Mr. Rhodes. But never fear!" And she went off to rejoin Miss Marrable, who was still much flurried.

Later in the day, Lucy met Robert on the beach, and told him what had happened. "And now," she said in conclusion, "I am going to make a dreadful proposition to you. We must also elope together!"

"I am sure I don't mind," said Mr. Rhodes. "After hearing your news, I was going to propose as much myself. It would take you out of the reach of your aunt's reproaches, when she finds out the trick that has been played upon her."

"You are a dear old love!" cried Lucy with enthusiasm. "I wouldn't for the world have Amy made unhappy; and I feel that I must help her, although I don't approve of elopements. Now go and talk to Mr. Jellicoe; and don't forget to have the licenses ready. Perhaps Mr. Jellicoe can arrange for both Amy and me to sleep that night with the Joneses, whoever they may be; or perhaps, after all, we had better not go there, since aunt knows of that part of the scheme."

"I daresay," said Robert, "that I can arrange for both of you to sleep at the Browns at Llanyltid. They have a large house, and, curiously enough, my sister Flora, whom you have often met in town, is staying there with them; so you will have a companion and sympathizer. And now I will go and talk to Jellicoe."

I need not follow in detail the progress of the new scheme of double elopement. Sufficient to say that the bogus correspondence destined to mislead Miss Marrable, was steadily kept up; that Amy and Vivian found other means of safely communicating with one another; that the Browns were written to; that the licenses were obtained; that three carriages-and-pairs were engaged, one to call at the hotel at nine o'clock p.m., and two at half past; that coachmen were liberally feed; and finally, that the billiard-marker at the Cos y-Gedol, a spruce young fellow of some education, was bribed, at considerable cost, to personate Vivian Jellicoe and to run away with Miss Marrable.

At length, Wednesday morning arrived; and with it came the last of the billet-doux that were fall into the spinster's hands. One of them had been composed by Vivian and Robert, and written by the former on pink paper, folded billet-doux wise. It ran as follows:

MY OWN AMY—I have satisfactorily arranged everything. The carriage will be at the door of the hotel at nine o'clock. I shall not show myself, for your aunt may be about. Be careful therefore to avoid her; and enter the carriage as quickly as possible. In order that there may be no mistake, I have told the driver to wear a white choker round his neck. I hope that you will be punctual. Everything depends upon punctuality. Till nine o'clock, good-bye,

Your most devoted
VIVIAN.

Miss Marrable, after reading this note, refolded it as usual, and took care that it reached Amy. Then, with the consciousness that she was about to perpetrate a grand and good action, she sat down in her own room, and waited for Amy's reply to be brought to her by the treacherous maid. The note which was very brief, came to Miss Marrable in less than half an hour. "DEAR VIV," wrote Amy, "I will be ready, and will look out for the white choker.—Your loving A."

In spite of the ordeal which was before her, the good old spinster was perfectly calm and unflurried. At one o'clock she made a very hearty luncheon; at half-past two she took her nieces for a walk, and talked to them with extraordinary affability about the emancipation of women; and at half past six she appeared at the table d'hote, and, just as if the occasion were an ordinary one, complained of the soup being too peppery, the fish too cold, and the mutton too underdone. Her coolness was admirable. Lucy and Amy, on the other hand could scarcely conceal their excitement and agitation. They each looked at least a hundred times during dinner at the clock upon the mantel-piece; and they each started and turned red whenever the noise of carriage-wheels without was heard. After dinner Miss Marrable went again to her room and began to make her preparations.

"How sad it will be," she thought to herself, "for poor young Jellicoe when I discover myself and overwhelm him with reproaches. Men are but poor creatures. Perhaps he will faint. Yes; I will take my salts-bottle." She wrapped herself in an ulster belonging to Amy, and having shrouded her face in a thick veil, took a seat at her window, which happened to be immediately above the front door of the hotel.

Meantime, Edward Griffiths the billiard-marker was ill at ease. He knew Miss Marrable by sight, and looked forward with terror to the prospect of an encounter with her at close quarters. Nevertheless, he had Vivian Jellicoe's five pound note in his pocket, and he was determined to see the affair bravely through. He felt, however, that his natural bravery would not be sufficient to support him; and he therefore, at about six o'clock, began swallowing a succession of potent doses of whiskey-and-water, with the object of laying in a stock of Dutch courage. Whether the whiskey was bad or the water too powerful, I cannot say; but at ten minutes to nine, when Vivian Jellicoe arrived to give final directions and counsel to his substitute, he found Edward Griffiths decidedly the worse of liquor. Fortunately the young fellow was neither quarrelsome nor noisy in his cups. His main ambition seemed to be to go to sleep in peace; and no sooner had Vivian bundled him into one corner of the carriage, which was in waiting in the stable-yard, that Mr. Griffiths incontinently slumbered. The carriage was then driven round to the front-door of the hotel. Miss Marrable, from her post of vantage, saw it, and remarking that the coachman wore a white choker, descended at once, and listened, as she went, outside Amy's room, to satisfy herself that that young lady had not forestalled her. The porter with alacrity opened the carriage-door. In the dark shadows of the interior, Miss Marrable caught sight of the figure of a man; and making sure that all was right, she entered at once. An instant later she was being whirled northward along the lonely Harlech Road.

Half an hour afterwards, two other carriages left the hotel, but in the opposite direction. In one of them were Lucy and Mr. Rhodes; and in the other, Amy and Mr. Jellicoe. It was near midnight ere they arrived at the Browns' house at Llanyltid; but the Browns were all up and waiting for them, and the two runaway couples were warmly welcomed, and hospitably taken care of.

Miss Marrable was less fortunate. As soon as the carriage in which she sat had been driven beyond the lights of the town, she threw aside her veil, and gazed with magnificent scorn towards the dim form upon the seat in front of her. The look eliciting no response of any kind, Miss Marrable ventured to cough, at first gently, and then with considerable violence; but still the figure took no notice.

"This is exceedingly strange," thought the spinster lady. "I must adopt more active measures." And with great tenderness, she prodded Mr. Griffiths with the point of her umbrella. The billiard-marker groaned in his sleep. "Mr. Jellicoe!" she exclaimed in her deepest and most threatening tones. She had counted upon this exclamation producing an instantaneous and astonishing effect upon her companion; and she was wofully disappointed when he merely groaned again.

"Gracious?" she said to herself; "he is ill. He would never go on like that, if he were not ill. The fright has been too much for him. Oh, how sorry I am! These men are such weak creatures. I must stop the carriage!" And, throwing down the sash of the window, she put out her head and cried to the driver to pull up his horses. But the driver, like the billiard marker, had been very liberally fed; and he was determined that nothing would stop him until he reached Harlech; he therefore cracked his whip, to drown Miss Marrable's voice, and drove down the next hill at a pace which threatened to shake the carriage to pieces.

"Stop, stop! For goodness' sake stop?" shouted Miss Marrable; but finding that her words were not listened to, she drew in her head, and strove to revive the wretched man in front of her. She held her salts-bottle to his nose; she chafed his hands; she fanned his brow; and she allowed his feverish head to rest upon her shoulder; but she could not awaken him.

"If he should die!" she thought "I intended to frighten him; but not so much as this. Oh! this is terrible!" And once more she tried to prvail upon the driver to stop; but in vain. The sight of distant lights, however, gave her at length some satisfaction. The carriage entered a long avenue, the gate of which lay ready opened for it; and about an hour and a quarter after leaving Abermaw, it drew up before the Joneses' house near Harlech.

With a sigh of relief, Miss Marrable threw open the door and sprang out, to find herself in the presence of half-a-dozen people who were congregated upon the steps.

"Quick!" she cried; "don't ask questions! He is ill; he is dying. Take him out!"

The Joneses, who had not been prepared for the apparition of a middle-aged spinster, and who were expecting Mr. Jellicoe and Miss Allerton, were somewhat astonished.

"Who is inside!" asked Mr. Tom Jones, the son and heir of the family.

"Oh! Mr. Jellicoe! Be quick! For mercy's sake, be quick!"

"You don't mean it!" cried Tom, rushing to the carriage to succour his friend. But an instant later he burst into a violent fit of laughter. "Why, its not Jellicoe at all!" he said. "It's Griffiths, the billiard-marker from the Cos y-Gedol; and he is hopelessly drunk. Nice companion, indeed!"

Miss Marrable is, as I have already said, a woman without weaknesses. On hearing this announcement, however, she fainted away. When, thanks to the kind attention of the female members of the Joneses' family, she revived, she indignantly charged those estimable people with having deliberately plotted her discomforture; and she insisted upon at once returning to Abermaw; but the carriage (and Griffiths) had gone; so Mr. Jones, senior, who grasped the situation, volunteered to drive Miss Marrable back to the Cos y Gedol Hotel; and by twelve o'clock, or shortly afterwards, she was again in her own room. It was then that she learned of the desertion of Lucy and Amy. I need not describe how she received the news, and how she declared that her abandoned nieces should never again behold her face; nor that although she is a woman without weaknesses, she passed the greater part of the remainder of the night in violent hysterics. She telegraphed next day to Mr. Larkspur and Mr. Allerton; and repairing to the Red Cow, furiously denounced Sir Thomas Jellicoe as the basest and most heartless of men!

Three weeks afterwards, however, the edge of her anger had worn off. Lucy and Amy were married. It was foolish, but, perhaps, it was not wholly inexcusable; and thus reasoning, Miss Marrable, in the goodness of her heart, determined to gradually receive them back into her favour. But she has never wholly forgiven Lucy for suggesting the substitution of the billiard-marker for Vivian Jellicoe.

"My dear," she says, when she retells the story, of her drive to Harlech, "the wretched man was perfectly saturated with whiskey, and I really don't know what he might not have done if I hadn't kept my eye steadily on him. But beneath my gaze he cowered, my dear, positively cowered! I never saw a savage brute so completely tamed."

And to this day Miss Marrable believes that but for her Eye, the billiard-marker might—horrid thought!—have run away with her too.

THE MERRY CAPITAL OF THE CZAR.

A Series of Brilliant Balls in St. Petersburg—Wealth Beginning to Overshadow Aristocracy.

Everybody is dancing and singing in St. Petersburg, from the Czar and the Czarina to the dvornik and the chambermaid. Recently the autocrat gave a brilliant ball in the Palace, opening the ball season here. About 3,000 guests in glittering uniforms and dresses filled the immense rooms of the gloomy palace, ornamented with costly tropical plants. At 10 p.m. the Emperor and the Empress entered the dancing hall of Nicholas, followed by the members of the imperial family. In the first dance the Czar led the Czarina; in the second he led Lady Thornton, the wife of the English Ambassador, the Czarina dancing with Gen. Schewenitiz, the German Ambassador; in the third the august host led Mme. Apper, the wife of the French Ambassador, and the hostess had Shakir Pasha, the Turkish Ambassador, as her partner. The Czar wore the uniform of the cavalry guards, and the Czarina a white satin dress richly ornamented with fresh roses and lilies. On her head she had a superb diamond diadem. At midnight supper was served. Military bands played in every room. Massive silverware shone brightly on the tables covered with fresh hyacinths and tulips. The Czarina had the German Ambassador on her right, and the Turkish Ambassador on her left side. The Czar, as a hospitable host, went from one table to another, exchanging words with all his guests.

Following the example of the Czar, every Minister and Ambassador and all the rich and titled St. Petersburgers hurried to give balls. The German, French and Turkish Ambassadors each gave a ball that stirred the aristocratic public and the fashionable dressmakers.

Among the novelties of the season electric bouquets and table ice are much in favor. The bouquets of the ladies and the necktie pins of the gentlemen are connected with a minute electric battery, secreted by the ladies in their dress, and by gentlemen in the side pockets. The electric current can be closed or interrupted at any time at the will of the bearer of the battery. These bouquets and pins with their electric flashes surprise and amuse the unscientific public. Ice is made to serve both an ornamental and a useful purpose at balls. A huge piece of ice, artistically carved, is placed on a silver tray and lighted from within. In the excavations in the ice they pour either wine or cream, or both, of which the dancers partake.

Millionaire Krutikoff, a tea merchant, on the occasion of his marriage with Miss Sinebruhoff, gave a ball, to which were invited all the leading merchants of both capitals. In the hall of the Nobles' Assembly there were gathered fully 1,500 guests. Perhaps never before were so many diamonds seen in that hall. Every matron and maiden sparkled like a constellation in miniature. Mrs. Avchinnikoff alone wore diamonds worth a quarter of a million dollars. At this ball the young men appeared in the red, white, and blue tail coats of the French pattern, worn under the Directory. This innovation, however, displeased the Czar, for, as he remarked, "We are not yet under the empire, and not under a directory." So the Russian dudes must pack up their red, white, and blue coats, and keep them till a directory shall be proclaimed in Russia.

It is becoming evident that the golden bourgeois is more and more talking the lead of the titled aristocrat even in the Czar's country. Nowadays many a prince, count, and baron longs for the society of financial kings, for they only give excellent dinners, treat to the best wines, and present to their daughters for dowry bushels of diamonds. The old times has gone by when the Russian merchants entreated some uniformed General to honor them with his presence at their balls and dinners. Nowadays the wearers of glittering uniforms and ancient, aristocratic shields flock around the rich and hospitable merchants like tramps longing for a free lunch.

Too Strict.

In Germany, the police regulations are very strict, and any violation of them is promptly punished. The people have a holy terror of the law. Two gentlemen happened to meet in Berlin, and the following conversation took place:

"Have you heard the dreadful news about Miller?"

"No, what is it?"

"He was in a boat in the river. He fell overboard, and was drowned. The water was too deep."

"Didn't he know how to swim?"

"Swim! Don't you know that all persons are forbidden by the police to swim in the river?"

M. Chevreul, the eminent scientist, who is nearly 98 years of age, was delivering a lecture on chemistry the other day at the Paris Museum of Natural History. Referring to a certain phenomenon in chemical change, he said: "This fact was first mentioned to me in 1804 by a Leipsic student named Schamberger, or Schomberger, I am not quite sure which. It is curious, but I am beginning to lose my memory for names."

The death is announced of M. Mossiri, a member of the Italian Parliament, who was the friend of Cavour and biographer of Victor-Emanuel. During the period of the formation of Italian unity he was in correspondence with all sorts and conditions of men, from Napoleon III. to Mazzini, and he has left behind him a collection of papers containing much secret and unwritten history. On account of the compromising characters of these documents, the Government seal has been placed on them, and they may never see the light.

Don Carlos is staying at the Hotel Grande Brettagna, Naples, under the name of Count de Lacar, attended only by his secretary and two servants. He was advised by the physicians to try Naples in order to get rid of an obstinate bronchitis. His ordinary residence is the Palazzo Loredano of Venice. His wife, the Duchess of Madrid, Margharita of Bourbon, and daughter of the ex-Duke of Parma, resides at her own castle near Viarezzio in Tuscany. She spends millions in charity. Their eldest son is at school in England.

The American marksman, Ira Paine, whose wonderful shooting at the gallery of Gastienne Renetti, in the Avenue d'Antin, has recently attracted many Parisians of note, and who drew crowds to his performances at the Folies Bergeres, is now exhibiting his skill at the Canterbury Theatre of Varieties in London. The London Standard says of him: "His frame is admirably suited to the accomplishment of such feats of nerve and steadiness of aim as he nightly undertakes. He has shoulders of great width and is as firm as a rock, this qualification, added to his certainty of eye, rendering him as accurate as a piece of machinery. Nothing less, indeed, is requisite for such tasks as hitting a nut placed on the head of a young lady."

Western doctors say that some of their medical colleges are so greatly in want of students that the so-called preliminary examinations are a mere farce. It seems that last autumn a young man, after paying his advance fees to a medical institution, desired to attend another college, and requested that his money be returned. This being refused, the youth determined to display great ignorance at the preliminary examinations, and, out of the twenty-five questions put to him, answered but three correctly. Certain of his rejection, he called upon the dean next day for his money. He was informed, however, with great affability, that his examination had been entirely satisfactory. The college cashed the claim only after a lawsuit was threatened.

They are learning how to advertise in Paris. A curious scene was witnessed the other day in a fashionable quarter. A fashionably dressed young man walked into a well known cafe; then, having managed to attract some attention, he sauntered up and down the garden, finally seating himself at a small table. To him came a person who, from his conversation, proved to be a tailor and who accused him in warm words of being ungrateful, stating he had dressed him on credit for five years. The young fellow fired up and declared himself insulted. A crowd gathered and eager ears listened to the high words. Finally, to convince his quondam tailor that another house was cheaper and better, the late client pulled out the bill for the garments he wore. The name, price, address, &c., were read aloud, and the open mouthed crowd drank it in. The enterprising tailor who got up this little drama found his profit.

The Russian authorities ruling over the newspaper press continue to distinguish themselves by effecting the most ridiculous results. When the funeral of the late Count Vladimir Adlerberg took place recently, the Emperor and Empress and nearly all the Imperial Grand Dukes and Duchesses were the most conspicuous among the chief mourners, and the emperor even rode for a short distance behind the remains in the procession, which is an honor reserved by the Russian Czars almost entirely for deceased members of their own imperial families. For three days the Official Messenger did not publish a single word about this great public funeral, and all the other journals gave their different accounts without uttering a syllable as to the presence of the imperial family. They were deterred by the standing order forbidding all mention of movements of imperial personages until officially chronicled in the Government Gazette. Yet the fact of the imperail presence at the funeral was telegraphed the same night to Moscow, and unreservedly published the next day in M. Katkoff's favored journal.

A Crystal Throne.

A work of art has recently been on exhibition in the show-room of a firm of manufacturers in Birmingham, which may be described as a magnificent example of high art work in glass, and is probably the finest work of its kind that has ever been attempted, and has had bestowed upon it infinite pains, with the most happy results. It is a crystal throne, intended for transmission to India, and is in the form of a capacious arm-chair, with pillars springing from the back and arms carrying a dome-shaped canopy, at the apex of which is a large star radiating in all directions. The total height is nine feet six inches. Brilliant crimson velvet has been employed for the cushions, and wood and iron are used to a certain extent to afford the requisite strength to the structure; but both these materials are covered with bright plating and enclosed in glass, so that their presence is imperceptible. The glass employed is white, of the purest quality, and every part of the service has been cut, even to the spiral molding of the rear pillars, giving to the work a dazzling lustre. The front legs are solid crystal, boldly modeled, and terminate above the arm in pine-shaped finials, each of which is cut into 324 mathematically accurate facets, causing it to look like a huge diamond. The canopy is Mooresque in design and forms half an octagon. Crocketed ribs divide the dome into panels, which are richly cut upon their upper surface. Round the margin runs a cornice having scallop shaped ornaments projecting upward and a drooping edge beneath, designed to look like pendant gems. It is said to be impossible to describe with accuracy many of the subordinate decorative features of this work. No fewer than 176 kinds have been fitted together with such remarkable ingenuity as to make them appear as though they were but one. The throne is accompanied by a footstool, also in crystal, and altogether, the work possesses such a lustrousness and beauty, associated with imposing dimensions, as to make it worthy of the most magnificent of Oriental displays.

Power of an Avalanche.

The Denver (Col.) News says: One of the grandest snow-slides that ever occurred in Colorado took place a few days ago, just back of the Upper Twin Lakes. Judge Harlan, an eye witness, says it was the most sublime sight he ever witnessed. Just back of Twin Lakes are Pomeroy, Gordon and Francis gulches, on each side of which the mountains rise thousands of feet. The sides of these giants of the Rockies had been covered during the heavy and protracted storms with an enormous depth of snow, until the weight had become such that it could be sustained no longer. The Judge says that, as it happened, he was standing where he could see the avalanche perfectly. All at once his ears were greeted with a low, rumbling sound that seemed like the roar of a distant storm, and almost simultaneously an immense volume of snow began to move down the mountain side in one of the gulches toward the road. The agitation seemed to break loose the snow from its moorings in the other two gulches, and almost before one had time to think hundreds of acres of snow were coming down the mountain with a roar like thunder, and filling the air with spray as they tore through the trees and carried everything before them. As they descended their velocity increased, until the rapidity with which the great field of snow and debris came down was something terrific. The distance, he says must have been a mile from where the avalanche started to the valley where it stopped. So deep was the snow that a grove of quaking asp, whose trees were from 20 to 40 feet high, was completely buried from sight. Logs a foot and a half in thickness, that lay in the way of the slide, were snapped in two like straws; trees that were too tall to be covered up were torn up from their rooted places in the mountain sides and carried like leaves with the avalanche. The velocity of air produced by the avalanche blew down trees that were clear outside of the track of the slide. Fortunately no one was in the way and no lives were lost.

NEW ELECTION IN GLENELG

A special meeting of Glenelg council was held on Tuesday last, when the resignation of F. MacRae, Esq., was accepted and a writ issued for a new election to fill the vacancy. The nomination will be held on Monday, the 5th of May, at the town hall, and polling on 12th. Mr. Thos. Davis will doubtless be a candidate for the office. It is also reported that J. A. McMillan, Deputy-Reeve, will resign in order to be a candidate for the vacant chair. C. W. Rutledge is also spoken of as a probable candidate. We hope, however, that Mr. Davis will have the election by acclamation, and thus save the township the expense of an election.

Correspondence.

NOTICE.—We wish it distinctly understood that we do not hold ourselves responsible for the opinions expressed by our correspondents.

To the Editor of the Standard.

DEAR SIR,—To prohibit the manufacture, importation and sale of spirituous liquors, would bring peace, contentment and prosperity to thousands of homes. To obtain so desirable and end should outweigh all considerations as to the benefit that accrues to the few who enjoy the emoluments connected with the liquor business. Much more should the benefit to the many obviate any loss to the revenue, arising from duties on spirits. These two points, however, the interests of the dealer, and the revenue derived from the business demand attention.

(1) The traffic has been so thoroughly rooted in our country as to become part of its social and political life. Those in the trade will therefore meet with such an amount of sympathy, (if their business is interfered with) as has never been extended to the victims of intemperance. Prohibition would throw the manufacturer out of employment. Very much of his property, such as breweries, distilleries, kilns and apparatus, would become valueless. Thus to reduce him to poverty all at once would be a hardship and, under the circumstances, a wrong, because he entered the business on the understanding that the public faith was pledged to his protection. He had in his favor acts of parliament, police regulations, by-laws, and other restrictions, as well as the customs and usages of society from time immemorial. To destroy at one blow his employment, income, and value of property, would seem unfair and unjustifiable. But his interests are of less consequence than those of multitudes to whom his business is a great injury. Here arises a difficulty: the greater number should be benefitted, but not at the expense of the interests of a few private persons. How is the difficulty to be fairly met? One method at least presents itself, viz., on the one hand to prohibit the manufacture and sale of liquors; and, on the other hand, to compensate the manufacturer and dealer for the actual loss sustained through such prohibition. England paid £20,000,000 to liberate the slaves within her dominions; Canada should be willing to pay $20,000,000, or at least an adequate sum to liberate those who are the slaves of the intoxicating cup.

(2) The revenue derived from liquors is a loss, not a gain to the country. The effects of the traffic in causing crimes and disorders cost more money than all the revenue it yields. The correctness of this opinion may be questioned on the ground that there are not sufficient data from which to prove it; no very considerable part of the country has yet tried prohibition, and therefore its effect in lessening crime is not fully established. But even granting that the revenue should fall short, the deficiency would cheerfully be provided for otherwise. It is significant that the Finance Minister stated in his place in parliament the other day that any loss of revenue from the liquor traffic could easily be met without imposing any additional tax on the people.

The fact is that the liquor dealers have had matters their own way for a long time; it is but fair that others should now have their turn. Better purchase the trade out of existence—kill it with kindness—than let it ruin, kill and destroy the multitudes who patronize it.

To Editor Standard:

DEAR SIR,—New Westminster is situated on the Fraser River, on rising ground, has a fine appearance when viewed from the river coming in on the steamer. The steamers (mail) ply between here and Victoria twice a week in winter, and three times a week in summer, making connections with the Northern Pacific and also Central Pacific via. San Francisco. The population is about 4000, consisting of almost every class of people. The whites however predominating. It is estimated that there are at present in the city 2000 Chinese, Indians(Siwash) are also quite numerous, also Half-breeds. This city differs from the Eastern cities greatly in one respect, substantiality. The buildings are mostly of a very poor class (frame), very few of those fine solid brick or stone structures you have out east, although there seems to be a favorable outlook for an improvement in the future, buildings this summer will be mostly brick. Brick laid down here costs $16 a thousand. The principal industries are the fisheries and lumbering. The fisheries giving employment to a great many men. Canning salmon is quite an extensive business here, and here I will mention a fact: You can buy our salmon (canned)East cheaper than we can here when it is manufactured. The reason I am not prepared to produce. The greater part of our lumber is fir and cedar. I have not seen a pine board in this coast. Fir and coal are used as fuel. The chief amusements of the people are balls, parties, roller skating, theatrical performances, gymnasium, driving for pleasure, being a remote future consideration, as the state of the roads will not admit of it at present. Port Moody, the supposed terminus of the Canada Pacific is now the topic of the day. Speculation in land the one great theme; and indeed it is wonderful how the value of land has advanced, as an example, lots in good locality, could and were bought when I came here, Nov., 1883, for $500 and $600 (town lots I mean) can now be sold for $2000, and owners not at all anxious to sell. A piece of land, one mile from Port Moody, consisting of 70 acres, was sold for $30,000. The weather here, March and April, is simply grand. I think I am safe when I say the thermometer has not been down to the freezing point since 1st March.

I receive the STANDARD very regularly, and am pleased to observe a steady improvement in your columns of news.

Wishing you every success,

I remain yours,

GUS.

MARKDALE

Steam Woollen Mill.

The undersigned would respectfully return thanks to their many customers and friends for the very liberal support accorded to them during the past, and would solicit a continuance of the same, as we are now ready to attend to all work intrusted to our care in CUSTOM CARDING, FULLING and WEAVING in first-class style. As we have put on new cards, and made other improvements, we will endeavor to do as good work in the future, if not better, than we have ever done in the past.

Customers wishing to have their wool carded, spun and made into blankets or flannel, on cotton warp, can have their orders attended to by leaving their wool as early as possible.

Please remember the place, Mill Street, west of the Railway Station.

Priceville.

From a correspondent.

People are busy ploughing,
And some have sown seed.
An early harvest is expected.

The Priceville flour mill is about to change hands.

Charivari (important) This village along with some of the country lads, turned out in a body a couple of nights in the past week, in the act of Chariyaring Mr. Angus McLean, of this village. The cowbells did ring; banners floated in the air, and all say it was the best piece of music that has been in Priceville for a long time.

Meaford Road.

From our own correspondent.

Mr. Jacob Holly, jr., while chopping in the woods, gave himself a bad cut in the foot with his axe.

Mrs. J. Rowe and family left here on Tuesday. They are spending a few days visiting their friends prior to their starting for the North-West. Mrs. Rowe leaves many warm friends in this neighborhood who wish her a safe and prosperous journey, and every success in her new home.

Very little seeding has been done here as yet.

The fall wheat, which looked well when the snow went off, is not looking very promising at present owing to the continued cold and frosty weather.

Priceville.

From our own correspondent.

The egg buyers are on the route once more. Mt. Forst, Walkerton, and Markdale represented. The merchants here are giving 15 cts. per dozen.

The Priceville monthly fair was a success in many respects. Some very fine horses were exhibited, also a number of cattle were offered for sale and exchanged hands. For beef purposes our farmers must change their breed of cattle.

Good Friday, in this enterprising village, was observed in a very orderly manner, business being mostly suspended. In the evening a concert was held in Riley's Hall, by a portion of the cricket club of Durham. Your correspondent was not present. but am told the affair was very creditable for said place.

The farmers generally are commencing to plough.

[The above came just too late for last week's issue.—Ed.]

Dundalk.

From our own correspondent.

Building operations have commenced, and notwithstanding the monetary stringency, promise to be brisk during the remainder of the season.

The Quarterly Board of the Methodist Church are considering the propriety of securing the services of a second minister next conferential year.

Mr. E. M. Williams is recovering only very slowly.

The new school house, and change of site, continue to hold a share of public attention.

Mr. Chas. Palmer succeeded in winning fifth prize in one of Truth's competitions, a valuable gold watch catalogued at $90.

Dr. Campbell has closed his lectures here. The debate on Monday evening excited considerable interest before it took place, but there is a general feeling of disappointment since. Neither of the debaters showed much tact or debating talent. The subject under discussion was, "Is Phrenology a Science?" Dr. Campbell, affirmative; Rev. A. Shirran, M. A., negative. The referees were Messrs. J. J. Middleton, McWilliam and Hall. The discussion was very unsatisfactory, the Dr. being too diffuse, and his opponent merely read an essay prepared years ago, in reply. Under the circumstances the referees could not decide otherwise than they did, viz.: "That the negative was not sustained, and that the arguments adduced in support of the affirmative were not strong enough to convince the audience of its truth."

Flesherton.

From our own correspondent.

Our popular citizen and township clerk, Mr. W. J. Bellamy, feeling, I suppose, that two are better than one, took unto himself, on Wednesday, April 9th, a helpmate in the person of Miss Mary Osborn, eldest daughter of Mr. James Osborn, of Osprey. The marriage ceremony was performed by the Rev. C. Shaw, at the residence of the bride's father. The happy couple left by the evening train the same day for a holiday tour. They were accompanied to the station by a good number of friends.

The attachment to each other between the proprietor of the Flesherton hotel and George Saul, grew so strong a few days ago that the peculiar manner in which they threw their arms round each other and the way they placed their hands upon each other's cheeks, would have led one to believe, after a long reparation, they had met at Doney Brook fair.

We understand Mr. W. Crosley, engineer at Mr. Damude's tannery, (for fun) makes a practice of blowing the steam whistle loud and long at passing wedding parties. (For fun) he may do this once too often. He did so on the passing of Mr Bellamy's wedding party, and we understand it was with very great difficulty some of the horses were managed at all. What might have proved a serious accident, was narrowly escaped. A word to the wise is sufficient, and we caution friend Crosley to give up such childish amusements.

Lieutenant Thoroughgood and one of her soldier companions of the Salvation Army of Owen Sound, held three meetings in the Methodist church here last Thursday and Friday. The church was crowded to the doors. Miss Thoroughgood is a young lady of about 17, a sweet singer, and when speaking has a clear melodious voice. Her exortations and earnest appeals to come to Jesus and be saved were felt upon the audience.

Euphrasia.

A batch of interesting items from our own correspondent.

As the Standard representative was standing on the post-office verandah at Rocklyn a few days ago, his soliloque was suddenly broken by the rapid arrival of three teams heavily laden with living human freight, varying in size from those who begin to think of sparking to the smallest urchin. They proved to be the pupils of section No. 13, 7th line, and their destination was the school house of section 14, 9th line, where they were to test their spelling abilities with the pupils of the latter school. As the rigs rolled off "to the west", through the mud and slush, amid the hearty cheers of the kids and the bystanders, one could not help thinking of days never to be recalled. Beaverdale was reached in due time Quite a number of the paternal parents had gathered to see the fun, and the seventh-liners complain that during the proceedings some of these displayed their feelings a little too prodigiously. Each side held out bravely, the word "cessation" finally bringing a cessation of hostilities. Master Harry Kelly of the 7th line, held the fort the longest. It is understood that the battle is to be fought over again at the 7th line school ere long, where the pupils of the latter say they can defeat the 9th liners readily without any hissing from paterlamihes.

Most of the material for the cheese factory, on the 4th line, near Fairmount, is on the ground, and building operations are to be commenced soon.

A new Orange Lodge has been organized, with good prospects, at Temple Hill Corner, 9th line. It is No. 394. No. 124, at Martin's corner, on the 4th line, has been resuscitated.

Mrs. Robert Mathers, of the 9th line, was seriously injured by a fall a short time ago, but is recovering.

Miss Brundage, teacher in the Beaverdale school, was detained at her home in Collingwood, from the Easter holidays until Monday last, through illness.

Mr. and Mrs. Hopkins, who were before the magistrates on Good Friday have "agreed to disagree," and Charlie says he never felt so happy in the course of all his life.

It is said a highly interesting wedding will take place in the neighborhood of the 9th line, "when one of the contracting parties returns," in July or August.

The mill on the 9th line is still idle. People have almost quit talking about Talbot. Claims against him can be purchased cheap. Dundalk readers please note.

Kimberley has a new store, and expects to soon have a licensed hotel, notwithstanding the opposition of interested parties.

Mr. C. Burrell and Mr. George Anderson, both of the 7th line, intend building brick residences during the coming summer.

The shed at the Presbyterian church was commenced last summer, and it is expected will be completed in a year or two.

It is rumored that ex-Reeve, Myles, intends going to British Columbia soon.

That Deputy-Reeve, Fawcett, intends going to the semi-centennial;

And that ex-Deputy-Reeve, Erskine, is to be married shortly.

Spring Assizes.

The Spring Assizes for this County opened here on Tuesday last, Mr. Justice Wilson presiding, and Mr. Alfred Frost acting as Crown Counsel. There are eight civil and four criminal cases. The following are the Grand Jury:—

The following cases were disposed of:—

Christie vs. Douglass.—An undefended action. Verdict for $1246.50. J. Creasor, Q. C. for plaintiff.

WEDNESDAY.

Guy vs. Bell.—Action for seduction. Verdict for $500 damages. Jno. Creasor, Q. C., for plaintiff; Frost & Frost, and Mr. Lash of Toronto, for defendant.

Queen vs. Antoin Jammin.—Larceny. Prisoner pleaded guilty.

Milne vs. Lamon et al.—Breach of contract. Verdict by consent. Damages $820. Widdifield of Uxbridge, for plaintiff; Jas. Masson for defendant.

Queen vs. Geo. Johnson, alias Andrew Switzer.—Larceny of a horse and cutter from James Gardner. Prisoner pleaded guilty.

Crowfoot Co. of Meaford vs. Ketchum.—This was a case of libel—the defendant, who is publisher of the Hanover Post, having made certain statements in his paper reflecting on the Crowfoot Indian Bitters Company of Meaford. Verdict for plaintiff by consent, $1 and costs. W. D. Pollard for plaintiff; Wilson & Evans for defendant.

THURSDAY.

Candler vs. Patterson & Watson, of the Meaford Mirror.—Action of libel and malicious prosecution. The jury retired at 12.30, and had not returned with a verdict at time of going to press. Pollard and Lash for plff.; Wilson and J. Creasor for deft.

The court is sitting as we go to press, and the balance of the report will appear next week.—O. S. Times.

LARDINE MACHINE OIL

We understand that an officer of the Deputation of Marine and Fisheries will arrive at Meaford in a few days with 3,000,000 of white fish fry from the hatchery at Sandwich, which will be desposited in the bay at Meaford, and Thornbury. Mr. Wilmot will follow in a few weeks with 1,000,000 lake trout from the Newcastle establishment, which will be desposited at Owen Sound, Colpoys and other places on the Georgian Bay. Wilmot also intended bringing with him 10,000 speckled trout, to be desposited in the Beaver River, and on the application of the Mayor who in Ottawa, 10,000 will also be brought for the Sydenham River.—Owen Sound Times.

AGRICULTURAL.

Small Fruits.

A correspondent of the New English Farmer, writes thus sensibly and practically:—

The farmer should set apart a small piece of land especially for growing small fruits for family use, because it will be a luxury he can well afford. He has the land, and it will be used for a good purpose if he sets out a strawberry bed and devotes a plot to raspberries, and one to blackberries, and also sets out some gooseberries; of course, the currant will find a place on every farm without my urging its claims. Grape vines are neglected by far too many farmers. There are now so great a number of varieties, that it would seem that one could find some that would thrive in his own locality, and therefore, the farmer is neglecting a duty that he owes his family, if he fails to set a few vines, and take good care of them. His wife and children will thank him for it. Who does not like good grapes? Is it not a pleasure to grow them for home consumption? If you should happen to grow a few more than are wanted for your family's use, they can readily be disposed of in the neighborhood or the village. Apples are to be found on most farms, to a greater or less extent, but what per cent of farmers grow a full supply of small fruits extending through the whole season, as they ought to? It is said that they are so productive that they can be grown profitably on land worth $1000 per acre; be this as it may, however, I am well satisfied that they can be profitably grown for family use.

The strawberry is the fruit to come in the spring, and it is also the most tempting to the taste, according to the writer's opinion, and the strawberry bed ought to be found in all gardens, however small they may be. It does not require a large bed to supply a family with an occasional dish of berries. One year ago last spring I set just six plants to see what they would do, and the last season they furnished us with six pints of fine strawberries; and plants often do much better than this. Of course it is needless to grow strawberries without giving them care. The ground should be well prepared, and clean culture is absolutely necessary; and if they are supplied with a great deal of water, the yield will be largely increased. For family use select the finest flavored berries that produce well; but for market the principal point is to select a large, showy variety, the quality not being so important, as consumers will look more to the appearance of the berry, than they will to the quality. If a large bed is planted they should be set in rows, far enough apart to admit of horse cultivation. In the autumn, just as late as may be, the plants should be given a light winter protection of hay; and in spring uncover the plants, leaving the hay on the ground as a mulch, and to keep the berries clean. I prefer to set a new bed every spring as it is less work to do this than it is to keep the old bed free from weeds.

Cutting Potatoes for Seed.

Mr. J. Barden, of Wells, Vt., gives an interesting account of some experiments he made last Summer in planting cut and uncut potatoes. Three rows, each long enough for 125 hills, were planted to Burbank seedlings, one row with whole seed, one with one piece to the hill, and another with two pieces in a hill. At digging time the single-piece row yielded six bushels, the two-piece row, eight bushels; while the row planted with uncut potatoes, produced ten bushels.

These were very marked results, yet, in order to have an experiment of this kind teach all we would like to know about planting cut or uncut potatoes, we ought to know whether the hills were of uniform distance apart in each case, and also whether the pieces were cut to single eyes, or whether they were large potatoes cut in two. The whole seed, we believe, was from large, selected potatoes. Now, as prices ruled last season at planting and harvesting time, it might still be a question which seed was the most economical to plant? Again, seed cut to single eyes should be planted with a great many more hills to the acre, than would be judicious if using large whole seed. If Mr. Barden dropped his single eyes two or three feet apart in the row, we should suspect that he used too little seed to obtain a full crop.

The question of whole or cut seed is one that is surrounded with too many difficulties to be answered at once, and for all time.

It has been our aim when discussing the question, rather to study the laws which control the growth of the potato, than to attempt to lay down infallible rules, as guides for action. If one understands the nature of the plant he is cultivating, he will be better able to adapt the conditions to each other that may exist at the time. All potatoes are so cheap this spring that those who wish to experiment with large, whole seed, can do so with little extra cost. Our preference is for single eyes, if all other conditions are within control, and we would prefer the pieces should be cut from large, smooth seed; but if the price was high, we would not object to those which were just below market size. But in either case we would want the rich soil, and in the very finest state of tilth, so that every piece would start and make an early and strong growth. The potato is like the constitution of some men, able to endure a good deal of abuse, but there is no argument in favor of abusing either.

Value of Maples.

Of the several genera of American shade and ornamental trees, including the oaks, elms, maple, and birches, the maples stand first for general value, and are now more planted than any others. One of the most extensive nurserymen lately stated that he sold more trees of the sugar maple than of all other shade trees together. The ease of propagation, and the clear, rich and healthy foliage, gives the maples a prominent advantage. Some brief notes on the leading species, now that planting time is approaching, may not be out of place.

The sugar maple, called also rock maple, stands at the head for general popularity. The young trees form handsome shade trees, and as they grow older, if a slight attention is given to the form of the head, they assume a fine shape, with a dense, thick mass of foliage. For timber plantations, they possess the value of supplying excellent fuel, and the wood is valuable for various manufacturing purposes, if not exposed to alterations of moisture. Unlike some other species of seeds ripen in autumn, at which time they may be sown, or kept till spring in slightly damp (not wet) sand. The young trees will make a growth of a foot or two the first year, and for timber plantations do best on rich upland, but they will not bear a wet subsoil.

The black maple, regarded by some botanists as only a variety of the preceding, but with some characteristics of a distinct species, resembles the sugar maple in the time of ripening its seeds and in affording sugar from the sap. It differs in its larger leaves, with drooping lobes and a slight pubescence beneath, while the general appearance of the foliage is less stiff and more graceful, with a warmer and richer color. The leaves have often measured nine inches in breadth.

The silver maple is remarkable for its rapid growth when young, and is much planted in village streets. The branches are spreading, and often drooping, and require some shortening to give a good form; the leaves are silvery white beneath. Like the sugar maple it grows to a large tree, two or three feet in diameter, and sixty or seventy feet high. It is less valuable for timber plantations; the wood, although fine-grained, is not durable. The seeds ripen early in the season, and may be at once planted, and will make a good growth the same year.

As with the other maples they should be planted in drills about an inch deep, and covered with fine soil pressed down upon them. The young plants usually require a light shading from the hot sun.

The red or soft maple resembles the preceding in the general appearane of the foliage which is silvery beneath, but the tree is less spreading in growth, and the flowers, which come out in spring before the leaves, are rich crimson in color. It is less rapid in growth than the silver maple. The leaves are sharply cut, and frequently change to a brilliant in color in autumn before dropping. In its native localities it becomes a large tree. The seeds ripen early in the season.

The ash-leafed maple box-elder of the West, is made into a seperate genus by some botanists. In rich soil its growth is very rapid; when young it is a beautiful tree; and it is specially recommended for timber plantations at the West. Its wood is like that of the silver and red maples. Its seeds ripen in autumn, and are to be treated like those of the sugar maple.

Among the introduced species are the Norway maple and sycamore maple—the former making a handsome, round-headed tree with broad, smooth, bright green leaves, which appear early in spring and hang later in autumn that those of the sugar maple. The sycamore maple is a rather coarse-growing tree with stiff branches, and the young trees being slightly tender are sometimes injured by winter. The leaves are whitish and slightly brown beneath. Both of these species ripen their seeds in autumn.

There are some smaller native species of the maple, among which is the striped maple or moose-wood which sometimes grows twenty or thirty feet high, but is more frequently only ten or fifteen feet, and with its striped bark and dense foliage forms a handsome ornamental tree; and the mountain maple which is a tall shrub, with flowers in dense racemes, and is planted only for ornament.

Of the principal native species which we have mentioned, the silver maple is found growing on the banks of rivers from Maine to Georgia, but is more particularly abundant along the western rivers. The red maple is found mostly in swamps and wet places, from Canada to the Gulf of Mexico. The sugar maple is most abundant north of latitude 40 degrees, and east of the Mississippi, and on mountains further south.

The Welsh Druid on Cremation.

Dr. Price, the Welch Druid, having at last successfully conducted the cremation of his dead infant, now announces his intention of erecting a crematorium at Llantrissant. Persons who desire to be cremated or whose executors wish the remains to be so disposed of will be accorded the requisite facilities. The doctor states that all his family will be cremated there. He points out the financial advantages of cremation over other modes of disposing of the dead, and states that all the materials used in the cremation of his son were half a ton of coals, a gallon of paraffin oil, and 6-penny worth of wood, the total cost being only 8 shillings and two pence. Every vestige of the infant's body was burnt, and the breeze carried away the ashes. The fire was so fierce that it melted the iron of the grate on which the body was deposited. Dr. Price argues that the ritual of the Church of England points to a period when cremation was the conventional method. What other signification, he asks, can the phrase "ashes to ashes" convey? From India, Spain, Italy, France, London, and all parts of England letters of approval and sympathy have been received by Dr. Price. An ex-clergyman and a minister are among his correspondents, to whom Dr. Price desires to express his profound gratitude for the courtesy extended to him. He states that he took his child's body on Friday to the place of cremation in a cart, accompanied only by a man-servant. Dr. Price protests against the inurnment of ashes of cremated persons as contrary to Druidic precedent and as calculated to rekindle grief among the survivors of the dead. He thinks cremation should be absolute in its disposal of the dead.—London Telegraph

Always Cheerful.

People of even temperament are the most companionable. There are some folk who are out of sorts at every hand's turn for no legitimate reason—because the sun has gone under a cloud, because they slept badly or ate too heartily; but the companionable person makes the best of every situation. She is not fidgety or fussy, and her prejudices are not, as with some, her chief characteristics. When she arrives, she brings another atmosphere with her, and common things seen with her eyes, become wonderful. She is a person of ideas, and bestows them with prodigality; she is not so often a wit as the occasion of wit in others, which is a far more popular being than the mere wit can hope to be; and, although she may only have travelled "a good deal on Cape Cod," yet she has seen and understood more than many who have ransacked Christendom.

"What do circus folks do in winter?" asked a contemporary. The clown devotes the season to gleaning a fresh crop of jokes from the almanacs printed prior to the American Revolution, and occasionally writes for the London comic weeklies; and the "strong man," who splinters rocks with his fist, secures employment in a cheap boarding house at hammering tough beef. No doubt the others find employment adapted to their respective talents.

ST. HELENA AS IT IS.

The Home of Napoleon a Harbor for Whalers—French Soldiers Guarding Napoleon's Tomb—The Emperor's Eyes.

If the allied nations of Europe had not in the year 1815 selected the island of St Helena for the prison of Napoleon, it would today be probably little better known than its sister island, Ascension. Yet St. Helena has played a by no means unimportant part in the history of maritime commerce, and though its business is now rapidly declining, it is still of great value to our southern whalers. Lying in the South Atlantic about 2,500 miles to the northwest of the Cape of Good Hope. St. Helena is the harbor most convenient to the whaling grounds There stores and provisions of all kinds can be readily obtained, and in the safe anchorage at James Town repairs to vessels are easily though somewhat expensively made. Everything, even to coal, that may be required for the supply of shipping has to be brought from England, and the price shipowners have to pay is proportionally high. But whalers, who are often away from home for a year or eighteen months, will run short of supplies, and it is no uncommon thing to see the flag of the United States flying at the sterns of five or six brigs or barks at James Town harbor. St. Helena is of volcanic formation, and is in outline an irregular oval about nines miles long, and five miles wide at its greatest width. The first European nation to make a settlement there was Holland, but the East India Company acquired it by purchase, and nearly fifty years ago it was transferred to the exclusive control of the English Government. The inhabitants number about 5,000, more than half of whom are negros. The latter are aborigines, but the descendants of people brought from the African coast. When England was busily engaged in breaking up the slave trade of the West Coast, St Helena was the depot to which the captured slavers were taken. There are still living there many negroes who thus escaped the horrors of the "middle passage." As is the case in most English colonies there is very little prejudice against the black man simply on account of his color, and one of the island's most respected and able merchants was brought there a lad in the hold of a slave ship. St. Helena is controlled by a Governor appointed by the Crown and assisted by a Council of inhabitants. Its value as a supply station diminished so much with the completion of the Suez Canal that the home regiment was disbanded and its place supplied by a wing of one of the West India regiments.

When first seen from the ocean the island looks like a collection of lofty, barren, and inaccessible crags, the most striking of which, Diana's Peak, attains an elevation of 5,000 feet. The harbor is almost shut out from view till a narrow opening between two hills nearly a thousand feet high give entrance to a wide roadstead. It is admirably sheltered from storms, and the only danger arises from a peculiar and powerful tidal wave that at intervals of several years springs up without warning and often tears ships from their anchorages. This tidal wave is somewhat similar to the "bore" occasionally observed at the mouth of the Severn in the Irish Channel. The St. Helena wave is, however, of greater dimensions, its height having been noted as over ten feet. Far out to sea it has been observed gathering force and height as it advances with startling rapidity and irresistible power.

James Town is a wide, straggling village, of white houses, with low, projecting roofs and ample verandas, that strongly recall Indian bungalows. Nearly all the storehouses and important public buildings are built of iron and slate, as within the last thirty years the island has been subjected to the plague of white ants. These insatiable little monsters, who are three or four times as large as the ordinary black ant, are able to speedily destroy any kind of woodwork. They can honeycomb a big log, till it may be crushed by the pressure of a hand. And yet they do their word from the inside, leaving a thin veneer on the surface, so that their presence is often entirely unsuspected. Large buildings have been brought to ruin by these minute pests, and it is no uncommon thing to see a chair or a sofa suddenly collapse, and to find that the ants have eaten everything but the varnish. They demolish any kind of wook but teak, and through this they bore, with the precision and smoothness of an augur, paths to less hard material. The ravages of these pests, supposed to have been originally brought from one of the East Indian Islands, have cost hundreds of thousands of dollars, and though large rewards have been offered for the discovery of means to exterminate them, no remedy has been found.

The first place the average visitor asks for is Longwood, built for Napoleon, and in which he spent nearly five years, and finally died. The road to Longwood which lies several miles from James Town, passes through some very pretty valleys, where all the available ground is used for farming purposes, and within sight of The Briars, a very pretty country house, in which Napolean was lodged while Longwood was preparing for him. The latter place is handier to the town, and Napoleon greatly objected to the transfer; but Longwood is nearer the centre of the island, and it was considered advisable to make attempt at rescue or escape as difficult as possible by keeping him far from the coast. The house is sunk in a valley, and is a long, low structure, very much resembling a two-story American summer hotel. Scarcely anything remains in the shape of relics; but the tomb near the house, and lying under weeping willows, is guarded by a French sergeant and two soldiers. The ground was purchased by the French. Under the sarcophagus, which is about three feet high and protected by an iron railing, the body of the great Emperor rested twenty-five years, and until it was taken to its final magnificent tomb in the Invalides. A very near relative of the writer, who was present when the coffin was taken up and opened before the Prince de Joinville, said that the embalming had been done so well, that though the skin had turned parchment hued the outline of the features remained perfect. It was under a tricolor of satin made by some women on the island that the body was borne to the ship, and each of these ladies was presented by the Prince with a gold bracelet, in the name of the French nation. The same person who witnessed the exhumation became acquainted with Napoleon during the six years of his captivity, and declared that he could never meet the ex-Emperor's eyes for more than a second. His glance remained till the last so piercing that it seemed to reach into the very soul of the person on whom it was bent.

The inhabitants of St. Helena are called "Yamstocks," because of their fondness for yams—a monstrous variety of the sweet potato. Farming land is so scarce that fresh meat and vegetables, butter and milk command high prices. Such commoditias are, in a great measure, brought from Cape Town. The steamers on their homeward trip to England make the passage to James Town in about six days. They do not call on the southward voyage, but make a detour to avoid the trade winds, which blow almost constantly from the Cape. Sailing vessels stopping at St. Helena have first to go far beyond it, and come down with the "trades." It is sometimes very difficult to do this, and an instance is on record, when the East India Company owned the island, and only two supply ships were sent out yearly, that the signal master on Ladder Hill reported one of the ships in sight less than thirty days after the date fixed for her departure from England. The vessel did not make the harbor, and the signal man was believed to have made a mistake. Nearly six weeks later the vessel arrived, and an examination of her log showed the correctness of the signal man's report. The intervening time had been spent trying to beat up to catch the trades.

St. Helena has no wild animals indigenous to the land, but boasts two kinds of birds not found elsewhere. These are a gray abdavat, with pink breast and bill, rather smaller than a sparrow, and the St. Helena canary, which is of a dark green color, sometimes shading to lighter green and with yellow on the breast. They are splendid songsters The females are dun brown. Java sparrows, the first of which probably escaped from some ship, are also plentiful, and there are a few wild parrots and African birds. Negro boys drive a brisk trade in selling birds to passengers. The waters of the coast abound with fish of all kinds. One known as the albacore is very fine eating and is considered equal to turbot. Attempts have been made to plant oysters, but unsuccessfully, probably because of the heat of the water. Although St. Helena lies well south of the tropics, the heat there is often intense, and winter is unknown. Consumptive and asthmatic patients are frequently ordered there by English physicians. The island of Ascension, which is about three day's sail to the northward, is much smaller than St. Helena, and is exclusively an English naval station. The ground is entirely Government property, and no one is allowed to settle or trade there except by special permit from the Admiralty. Ascension cannot be a very pleasant place for those who like society. The last time the writer heard from there only three ladies graced it, and not one of these would speak to either of the others.

CAUSE OF CHRIST'S DEATH.

Occasioned by Rupture of The Heart Caused by Mental Agony.

"The most remarkable event in the history of the world was the death of Jesus Christ," said Rev. Dr. Thomas A. Hoyt, pastor of the Chambers Presbyterian Church, of Philadelphia, recently, in beginning a special sermon to the medical students. "Its hidden meanings," he continued, "are transcendant and it was, without parallel, the most sublime tragedy ever enacted." The speaker had chosen his text from St. John xxxiv. 19. John, he said, stood only a few feet from the Saviour, and subsequently related what he saw. The subject discussed by the speaker was, "What was the physical cause of Christ's death?" Several eminent physicians had devoted years to the study of the question and a book on the subject had been published by Dr. Stroud, of Edinburgh, about thirty-five years ago, in which he ascribed Christ's death to rupture of the heart. During a convention of physicians in Scotland several years ago the deductions arrived at in this book were presented for their consideration, and they were confirmed. There are, the minister said, many cases on record where death has resulted from violent passions of joy or grief. Pliny tells us of a Lacedamonian who fell dead from joy at hearing that his son had won a prize at the Olympian games. The speaker read several opinions on the subject of heart rupture, and continued: "There is no pretense that the spear thrust into the Saviour's side caused death. In fact, he was dead before the wound was received. Christ was crucified at 9 o'clock in the morning, and expired at 3 o'clock in the afternoon, or two hours before the centurian dealt the blow with his spear. The crucified generally lived from two to three days, and sometimes as long as five days on the cross. There is no evidence that disease might have caused His death, and no reason to believe that he was not of perfectly sound health. Some have thought that He might have died from exhaustion, but we are told that He was miraculously sustained during His trials. It was not weakness. Some declare that He voluntarily gave up life, but He did not take His life; He simply submitted to the conditions under which He died. The answer to the question, "What was the physical cause of Christ's death?" is, 'Rupture of the heart caused by mental agony.' Literally, He died of a broken heart." The speaker read extracts from many letters from eminent physicians giving their opinions on Dr. Stroud's book, and on his deduction as to the death of the Saviour. They all endorsed his conclusion that Christ had died of a ruptured heart.

"John says," continued the speaker "that when the spear was thrust into the Saviour's side 'forthwith came there out blood and water.'" Dr. Hoyt then proceeded to explain this from a medical point of view. He said that when the spear head punctured the pericardium the blood and serum from the ruptured heart escaped. He said that all this was simply a fulfillment of a scriptural prediction, as was the parting of His raiment and the casting of lots among the soldiers for His vesture.

"But what was this mental anguish that broke our Saviour's heart?" asked the speaker. "It was not fear of death, for He looked toward that with longing. 'If I be lifted up,' He said, 'I will draw all men to Me.' He anticipated death as the consummation of His labors. 'Reproach hath broken My heart.' He said, and then died. He died for us. The weight of human guilt broke His heart.'"

AN UNFORTUNATE CHILD.

A Touching Incident from a London School-Teacher's Journal.

To-night I saw one of my lads sitting [illegible] doors ep, doubled up over his slate, and [illegible] screwed his head this way and that [illegible] vain endeavors to avail himself of the light of the street-lamp. When I took his slate out of his hands, I found that the poor little man had worked out his sums in a sprawling fashion. The light was so very uncertain and his little fingers were so cold that anything like neatness was out of the question, but he stuck gallantly to his post—or, rather, to his doorstep—and grinned all over his face while I patted him. I asked him what he was doing out on the street on such a nasty evening, and he replied: "We ain't got no candle, sir. Father and mother have got to sit in the dark, and I came out under the lamp to get my home lesson done." As I walked into a better neighborhood, and saw the bright lights in pleasant rooms, and heard the laughter of children and the tinkle of pianos, I thought rather kindly of the poor little man sitting with cold fingers groping through his sums by the yellow light of the gas. It is a curious kind of topsy-turvy business altogether. That little boy is as bright as bright can be. When I first knew him he was in dire distress because he could not read his little book right away. I explained to him that there were certain formalities and drudgeries to be gone through before one could tell what was inside books, and we had great fun while he was learning his alphabet. He christened the letters by names of his own. The small d he called "belly in front," and the small b "belly behind." And he was charmed when he had become able to tell the difference between d, p, b, and q with absolute certainty. He begged the loan of books to take home; he never played, and even when he was walking to and from school he puzzled himself over various "Readers" until he had mastered all we had in stock. The lad was fit for anything, but his parents managed to make only about 9 shillings a week at the best of times, so there is not much chance for him in the future. I have had to do with lazy boys who needed to be scolded into learning; but this poor little soul—the son of a coster-monger and a collar-maker—would go without his dinner to get an hour with a new book. Yet I rather fancy he will end as a laborer, or something of that sort. The struggle for food will crush ambition out of him, and very likely by the time he is 20 years of age he will not care for reading even the Sunday newspapers.

The Caravan of the Dead.

We had to cross the Persian desert in its entire length to get to our next station. The silence of the night becomes, in this wilderness, dowly oppressive, and as far as the eye of the traveller can reach he will find no spot to repose it upon. Only here and there may be seen piled up columns of sand, driven about by the wind, and gliding from place to place like so many dark spectres. I did not wonder that these shifting shadows were taken by timid and credulous souls for evil spirits pursued by furies. My companion seemed to belong to the superstitious class, for, wrapping his cloak tightly around him, he kept close to the densest part of the caravan, and would not for the world, so much as glance at the wilderness stretching to the east.

It was about midnight when he heard the sound of bells, and upon my inquiry as to the meaning of this, I was told that a large caravan which had left an hour earlier than we did, was in front of us. We accelerated our march in order to overtake it, but had hardly come within a hundred paces from it when an intolerable stench, as if of dead bodies, filled the air. The Persians were aware of the cause of this poisonous stench and hurried silently on; but it went on increasing the further we advanced. I could not restrain my curiosity any longer, but turning to my nearest neighbor, I asked him what this meant, but he curtly replied, betraying, however, great anxiety—"Hurry up, hurry up, this is the caravan of the dead." This information was sufficient to make me urge my wearied beast forward to greater speed, and after a while I reached, together with my companions, the caravan. It consisted of about forty animals, horses and mules, under the leadership of three Arabs. The backs of the animals were laden with coffins, and we made every effort to avoid the dread procession: In passing near one of the horsemen who had charge of the caravan, I caught sight of a face which was frightful to look at; the eyes and nose were concealed by some wraps, and the rest of his lividly pale face looked hastly by the light of the moon. Undaunted by the sickening atmosphere, I rode up to his side and inquired about the particulars of his errand. The Arab informed me that he had been now ten days on the way, and that twenty more would pass in taking the dead bodies to Kerbela, the place where, out of devotion for Hussein, the pious wish to sleep their eternal sleep. The custom prevails all over Persia; and every person who can afford it, even if he live in distant Khorassan, makes arrangements to have his remains carried to Kerbela, in order that they may be interred in the soil wherein the beloved Iman Hussein is reposing. It takes some two months before the dead body can reach its place of destination. One mule is frequently laden with four coffins, and whilst their conveyance during the winter is comparatively harmless, it is of deadly effect to beast and man alike, in the heat of July in Persia.

At some distance from the caravan of the dead I glanced back at the strange funeral procession. The animals with their sad burden of coffins hung their heads, seemingly trying to bury their nostrils in their breast, whilst the horsemen, keeping a good distance from them, were urging them on to greater speed. It was a spectacle which seen anywhere could not fail to produce a profound impression of terror, but seen in the very centre of the desert, at the dead hour of night, in the ghastly illumination of the moon, it could not fail to strike the most intrepid soul with awe and terror.—Arminius Vambery,

It was at the Cataract House in Sioux Falls. A son of the Emerald Isle was ushered into the dining-room at the dinner hour and the polite steward took hold of the back of the chair to push it into place. The guest looked around suspiciously for a minute, and then said loud enough to be heard all over the room: "By the howly Moses, if yez jerk out that chair from under me I'll knock the whole top of yer head off o' yez."

CHINESE IN THEIR GLORY.

How the Advent of a New Year is Celebrated in China—Some Grotesque Ceremonies—Annual Settlement of Debts.

One who has had ample opportunity for observing the New Year holiday as it is kept in China, and who has the ability to put his observations into words, says that there during this period all public business is suspended, the mandarins' offices are closed, and the seals of office are committed to the custody of his worship's first wife, who keeps them from her lord's hands till the holidays have passed. During the whole of this period, lasting a whole month, no business but that of the most urgent character can be transacted. The stamping of documents and dispatches at this season would be an unheard of impropriety, and the contingency arising from urgent state business is anticipated by stamping a few blank sheets, that matters of pressing importance may not suffer from delay. The hearing of cases and the execution of criminals, too, would be a profanation of this sacred month too awful to contemplate. Wholesale jail deliveries are therefore disposed of before the holidays begin, while the surviving criminals feel sure of at least one short month's respite, and contrive to take some morsels of happiness out of this festal season. During the last few days of the old year Canton streets present a scene of extraordinary rush and excitement. Every thoroughfare swarms with dense crowds of sight-seers, as if the whole city had thrown its population into the streets. The New Year's stores have to be provided, new clothes bought, or old ones got out of pawn and purchases made for days to come. Strings of blind beggars and detachments of vagrant lepers tramp to and fro finding an easy pathway and occasionally a charitable passenger as they pass along the thronged streets. The shops and stores are full of struggling customers, bent on striking good bargains, while salesmen are anxious to clear off their stock by selling everything at reduced prices. Everywhere is heard the jingle of money, which circulates with amazing rapidity during the busiest of all busy days. Business men are running hither and thither, hunting up debtors and collecting debts, or else trying themselves to shape the clutches of some importunate creditor—all in a state of feverish excitement. At least the New Year morn should find upon recorded ledgers or find old debts not yet wiped away. Every Chinaman is naturally impecunious, but he abhors the idea of carrying his debts into the new year. So scrupulous is he to pay off his old creditors before the last hour of the last day that he will even borrow money from usurers at rates of interest to meet the demands of the creditor clamoring at his door. Little is the sleep that would come to his eyes that night if his debts were unpaid, even if custom allow him to sleep on New Year's eve, for the creditor never fails to badger his victim till the last cent is shelled out.

Business is now over—the old year is gone; a deafening roar of crackers, a banging of cannon and bombs and a general feu de joie announces that midnight has passed and the worship and ceremonies of the New Year have begun. For the first and only time during the year the city and ward gates are left open throughout the night. The atmosphere is heavy with sulphurous fumes of spent fire-crackers and burning incense. Every house is brightly lighted with scores of candles, lamps, and colored lanterns that hang at every door. Custom requires that every adult member of the family shall sit up the whole night and take part in those various observances and services, the neglect of a single portion of which would inevitably bring untold sorrows and calamities upon the slumberer's head throughout the coming year. In the small hours of the morning take place several interesting ceremonies One of the first New Year's duties is to sacrifice to heaven and earth. A table is laid in the hall, upon which are spread a large bowl of rice, five bowls of vegetables, an equal number of cups of wine and ten, plates of oranges and preserved fruits, with chopsticks complete, and some paper money laid upon the dishes. A salvo of fire crackers calls forth the elder of the family, with incense sticks in his hands, who prostrates himself in front of the table, knocking his head three times upon the floor, giving thanks to heaven and earth for the blessings of the past, and beseeching their protection through another year. The burning of the paper money, which passes to heaven in smoke and in ashes to the earth, and the explosion of another string of fire-crackers conclude this ceremony. Another service of worship of deceased ancestors, which is performed before an upright piece of wood fixed to a stand, the upright piece being in reality two pieces lapping together, inclosing scrolls with the names of four or more characters, regarded with peculiar sanctity as the shrine where hovers the spirit of their departed ancestors. Here, also, rice, vegetables, fruits, tea and wine are offered in sacrifice before them. Lamps, candles, and incense are lighted around the altar, and every member of the family, in order of birth and rank, solemnly prostrates himself three times before the ancestral shrine of his illustrious forefathers. Homage is also paid in a similar way to the household gods, and when the gods and ancestors have been propitiated with meats and drinks, there arises another deafening din of fire-crackers, the object of which is to clear the household of all evil spirits which have congregated there during the past twelve months, and to secure the benign influences of the gods upon the household during the coming year. The living elders and representatives of the family next come in for their share of homage. Grandparents, father and mother, uncles and aunts, take their seats in order, while the junior members of the family kneel in lowly reverence before them and express their dutiful congratulations.

Perhaps the most imposing ceremony of all is that which takes place at the emperor's temple in every provincial city, and is an almost exact representation of what is taking place in Peking before the dragon throne in the presence of their august sovereign. Many foreigners obtain admission to the temple in Canton on New Year's morning, and the writer has witnessed these ceremonies on two or three occasions. In the main building is found a model of the dragon throne, approached by nine steps, on the top of which stands a table bearing an inscription in raised gilt letters, "May the emperor live ten thousand years, ten thousand thousand thousand years." The temple waiting-rooms, court-yards, and corridors are hung with chandeliers brilliantly lighted up for the occasion. The principal civil and military mandarins of the province, attended by their suites, begin to arrive soon after 1 o'clock in the morning, the juniors arriving first to receive their immediate superiors, and so on, in order of rank. They ride in sedans to the gates, where they dismount, walking solemnly along with bent heads to the waiting-room. No official would dare to insult his imperial master's throne and dignity by riding through these gates. At 4 o'clock the tartar general and the viceroy, who are of equal rank, arrive almost simultaneously, when all present don their official caps of fur, with their different colored buttons or peacock feathers, their chains or necklaces of office, and their gorgeous state robes of costly ermine and fur, the breasts of which are glittering with embroidery of gold. They then repair in the darkness to the open court-yard, immediately opposite the emperor's tablet, which, by the way, always faces south, and take up their positions in order of rank, the civil officers on the right and the military on the left. When all are ready a bell sounds, and though the still night air is heard the shrill voice of the precentor whining forth the words "Kow tow, kow tow," upon which the whole assembly, numbering upward of one hundred, sink upon their knees and proceed to knock their heads three times upon the paved floor. After an intervale of a few moments this is repeated twice, each time kowtowing thrice. At the conclusion of the third prostration the worship is over. They rise from their knees and in regular order march back to the waiting-room, where they disrobe and where pipes are smoked and tea drunk, accompanied with the usual amount of expectoration. They then proceed to other temples, where they pay their respects to the tablet of Confucius, to the god of literature, and to the god of war.

The vigils have been faithfully kept, and with the first rays of dawn the Chinaman, high and low, proceeds to call on his relatives and friends. He is decked out in official uniform, button and feather, if he is fortunate enough to possess these coveted regalia; in any case he brings out his very best, cleanest, and longest gown, the baggiest of pants, and a thick case of red visiting cards folded in orthodox fashion, on which are printed in unimpeachable integrity the characters which represent his name and "lofty surname." It is not unusual for the foreigner to see his back-yard coolie, or stable-boy, just emerged from twelve months of grease, filth, and unwashedness, standing on the doorstep with beaming face, his whole person got up regardless of expense in a long rustling gown of yellow or purple silk, satin breeches, cap and shoes, all hired for the occasion, in which he presents himself to his master, wishing him the compliments of the season, and at the same time handing him his card. He then dives into his pocket and brings forth several packets of cash wrapped up in red paper, which he leaves for the "worthy young gentleman and the thousand coins (daughters) of the family, the value of the contents of these red packages being about 10 cents, representing but an infinitesimal portion of the sums of money which the oblique-eyed one has squeezed out of his master's pocket during the year. He then goes the round of all of his friends, to whom he exhibits his swagger clothing, making his obeisances at the regulated angle of New Year genuflection and observing the proprieties suited to the occasion with all the dignity and ease of a well-bred gentleman. In the afternoon he perhaps visits the crowded play-house, concert hall, or gambling dens, and comes home relieved of his superfluous cash. At home he gorges quantities of indigestible greasy food and imbibes pot after pot of samshu wine. In two or three days he takes his gay clothes back to the pawnshop and relapses once more into original sin another twelve months of seediness, grease and dirt. An official or rich man pays his New Year's calls richly attired in furs, and rides in his sedan chair, followed by servants carrying boxes of hams, cakes, grapes, oranges, lichees, and sweetmeats, which he presents with eloquent declarations of filial affections to the seniors of his family, or with toadying obsiquiousness of assurances of devotion to his superiors in office. He is regaled in turn with cakes, fruits, wine, and tea wherever he goes. Everybody comes in for his share of congratulation and good wishes except one lonely being, for whom New Year has few charms. It is the undertaker, to whom no pleasant greeting of "I wish you prosperity" ever comes.

Hand-Shaking.

The different modes of shaking hands will delineate human character better than any other single act can do, and many peculiarities of different persons may be noted in the performance of this social custom. Who would expect to get a handsome donation—or any donation at all—from a man who will give two finger to be shaken, and keeps the others bent as upon an "itching palm?" The hand coldly held out to be shaken and drawn away again as soon as decently may be, indicates a cold, selfish character, while the hand which seeks yours cordially, and unwillingly relinquishes its warm clasp, gives token of a warm disposition, and of a heart full of sympathy for humanity.

How much that is in the heart can be made to express itself through the agency of the fingers! Who, having once experienced it, has ever forgotten the feeling conveyed by the eloquent pressure of the hand from a dying friend when the tongue has ceased to speak? A right hearty grasp of the hand indicates warmth and ardor, while a soft, lax touch, without a grasp, indicates the opposite characteristics. In the grasp of persons with large-hearted, generous minds, there is a "whole-soul" expression most refreshing and acceptable to kindred spirits; but when a man presents you with a few cold, clammy, lifeless fingers, feeling very much like a dead fish, and expect you to do all the shaking, it will naturally make you think of the hospital and other cheerful things.

Contrary to this style, there is a habit among a rude class of giving your hand a crushing grasp, which is often most painful. In these cases there may be great kindness and a "strong" affection, but it is as crude as it is hearty. If the grasp is warm, ardent, and vigorous, so is the disposition. If it is cool, formal, and without emotion, so is the character. If it is magnetic and animating, the disposition is the same. As we shake hands so we feel, so we are.

JAY GOULD AT WORK.

How the Wall Street Magnate Puts in His Time—His Daily Routine.

Since Gould's return to New York from his recent trip to the West Indies there has been an unusual pressure at his office, but few, however, are favored with an interview. No man has more enemies on Wall street than Jay Gould, and there is no telling what shape their enmity may assume. Scores, and even hundreds, of ruined speculators ascribe their misfortune to him, and many of these are only awaiting a suitable opportunity of revenge. Gould seems to be conscious of this, and therefore keeps concealed as much as possible. He is, indeed, the hidden power of Wall street. He rarely leaves his office, and no one can obtain admittance until a series of statements have been made. A card is placed in the visitor's hand, on which is printed as follows: "State name," "State residence," "State business" These being printed one above the other, with broad blanks to be filled out, have a rather forbidding appearance, and many who wish to see Gould are deterred at the very outset. When the card is sent in, the chances are much against an interview. There are not more than a score of persons whom Gould wants to see. Among these are Russell Sage, H. N. Smith, Washington Connor, Col. Hain, John T. Terry, and Gen. Eckhart. When Gould was the moneyed man of the Tribune he allowed its reporters admittance, but at present he excludes all of this class.

Gould reaches his office with a perfected scheme of operation. He is not obliged to look at the morning papers for stock reports, as these have been read from the "ticker" as they take place, and if he should be at his house they are sent up by telegraph. Before he goes to bed Gould has a complete idea of all that has been done in Wall street, and he awakens in the morning with a clear and decisive system for the day's work. It is this anticipation of the future which gives him such advantage over other operators. As soon as he is seated at his desk, Mirosini brings in the telegrams and also all newspapers articles that have a financial importance. This is all Gould wants to know. He cares nothing for politics or other public matters, except as they may bear upon his interests. It will take from one to two hours to reply to dispatches and to telegraph orders, and as Gould controls nearly five thousand miles of railroad track this is no small task. While sitting in his office he may be conferring with men in St. Louis, Chicago, and San Francisco almost at the same time. Then the stock-exchange "ticker" begins its reports, and a half-dozen brokers are kept under telegraphic orders. By this time business calls are made. Each man whose card is approved has a brief space given him. In this manner Gould does a tremendous amount of business in a short time. He seems always self-possessed, and generally holds the vantage ground, but even when cornered he concedes in a handsome manner what might be demanded under a legal process. No man can be in Gould's presence five minutes without feeling his power. His eyes have a penetration which seem to reach the hidden depth of thought. Those eyes, indeed, are a curiosity—so black, so piercing, and so sullen. They at once proclaim the selfish power of a relentless autocrat, whose motto has invariably been "rule or ruin."

A Crisis at Pekin.

The latest advices from Shanghai report a serious political crisis at Pekin. The Empress has publicly degraded Prince Kung and four members of the Privy Council. They were stripped of all their honors because of the dilatory manner in which they have dealt with Tonquin affairs.

Prince Kung, who had been degraded, is one of the most eminent, and has been one in his time of the most powerful of Chinese statesmen. He was an uncle of the reigning Emperor Ki-tsiang, and brother of the Emperor Hieng fung, who died in August, 1861. For many years he had held important positions in the Empire, and after the death of his brother he became Regent, and held that office during the minority of Ki-tsiang, during the whole of whose reign he was the practical ruler of China. In January, 1875, his nephew, Tsia-tien, a boy only three years of age, became Emperor under the title of Kwang-su, and Prince Kung was continued as Regent, but since then he has been compelled to subordinate his views and policy to those of the two Empresses—the one the Dowager Empress and the other the Empress Mother, and both of them widows of the Emperor Hieng-fung. The Empress Dowager died in April, 1881. Prince Kung first obtained a reputation in Europe and America at the time of the diplomatic quarrel which followed the war between China and Great Britain and France. Appointed absolute Plenipotentiary to negotiate a treaty, he astonished the representatives of the allies by a display of diplomatic skill they had hardly expected to meet with in China. The treaty which he concluded was as advantageous to his country as to England and France, and was observed with scrupulous fidelity until lately. To the influence of Prince Kung was due the appointment of Mr. Burlingame as Envoy Extraordinary to Foreign powers, and it is said that he gave the mission a hearty support, and did all in his power to make it successful. He has done much to extend the resources of China and to liberalize her policy, and place her on a footing with the civilized nations of Europe and America.

A Subscriber's Soliloquy.

To pay or not to pay—that is the question—whether 'tis better for me to refuse to take a local paper, and deprive my family of reading all the news, or pay up promptly what the printer asks, and by such a payment cheer him? No pay, no paper—then no more shall I be posted on the news and local haps throughout the town, and divers topics—'tis a consummation that I long have feared. To pay—to stop? To stop! perchance to lose—aye, there's the rub! for in that stop no interest do I take in any of the affairs that move the town, and such a shuffling of all that's good may make me pause. There's the respect which every editor maintains for those who come down with the cash, and ne'er delay to settle up "that little bill." For who would bear the pointed squibs and pungent paragraph, which far too oft reflect upon the man who fails to settle his subscription bill? I'll haste me now to the editor, and, with my purse plethoric in my hand, will settle up in full, one year from date, by paying to him from my ready cash the sum which is his due.—Hawkeye.

CLEAR GRIT JR.

Strongly as I Spoke in his favor in my Catalogue issued at the commencement of last season, he has since then proved himself even a grander horse than I then pronounced him. Last September I exhibited him at the Great Industrial Fair held in Toronto, and though there were twenty-seven of the best horses in Canada showing against him, he so far out classed all his competitors that the Judges awarded him the FIRST PRIZE, and also A SILVER MEDAL, and I claim he is the most handsomest Stallion in Canada.

REMARKS.

Dr. Smith, President of Toronto Veterinary College, says: "One thorough-bred horse, at all events, has left his mark in this country, in the way of trotting animals. viz.: Lapidist, Clear Grit, by Lapidist, is considered a great trotting sire." Dr. Smith also says, "I think considerable harm is being done by the use of inferior Stallions. The only effectual method of treating this difficulty would be for a man to go through the country and castrate every stallion that was not up to the standard."

Mr. T. C. Patteson, Postmaster, Toronto, and Managing Director of the Ontario Jockey Club says, in speaking of thorough-bred stallions in Canada:—"I would wish to point out that Clear Grit and his sons, of which I have seen much mention made during the course of the Commissioner's enquiries, must, in my opinion, be allowed to trace a great deal of their superior excellence to the thorough-bred blood in their veins.

The following is also very high authority:

"Clear Grit, Jr., the property of Mr. J. R. Trimble, of Markdale, Ont., is a most worthy representative of Old Clear Grit. Last September when exhibited at the Toronto Industrial Exhibition, he was perhaps the most admired horse on the grounds, and the Judges' decision in awarding him the first prize and silver medal was a judicial endorsement of public appreciation. He is a rich mahogany bay in color, with black points, and stands plump 16 hands. He is a horse of fine form and great substance, has rare good shoulders, a short middle piece, well ribbed up, and hind quarters indicative of great propelling power. He is by Old Clear Grit, the sire of the renowned pacer, Fuller, 2:18¾, the trotter Amber, 2:25¼, Little Billy, 2:29, and a host of other speedy horses. His dam, a Royal George Mare, owned by Mr. Carr, near Hamilton, was in her day one of the most noted roadsters in the County of Wentworth. Clear Grit, Jr., is very much like the old horse in appearance. He has the fine head and graceful arched neck of the thorough bred, and the farmers of the County of Grey are lucky to have at their disposal the services of such a grand young stallion."—From Canadian Sportsman, April 18th, 1884.

PRIZES.

CLEAR GRIT, JR.,

Was sired by Old Clear Grit, he by Imported Lapidist, (thoroughbred), son of Touchstone, dam by Imp. Cock of the Rock, grand dam by Imported Blackstock. CLEAR GRIT, JR.'s dam is a Royal George Mare, one of the most noted Roadsters ever owned in Wentworth County.

Prominent among his half brothers and sisters are the following:—Amber, which was sold in 1879 by Mr. Pilkey, of Brantford, Ont., to Mr. Pendergast of Syracuse for $3,000, which is considered a very small sum for so promising a horse. At Rochester he got a record of 2:25¼. Little Billy, who has trotted a mile in 2:36, and has a record of 2:30½, and has shown a quarter at the rate of 2:12; St. Patrick, with a record of 2:36, has trotted a mile in Cleaveland, Ohio, in 2:22; Clothes Pin, with a record of 2:23½, afterwards sold for $12,000; Lady Essie, in her fourth year form, in the winter of 1878, winning six, trotting in 2:36 and has shown trials in 2:25 She was sold to Geo. Forbes of Cleveland, Ohio, for $1,000, her owner afterwards refusing $3,000 for her; Clothes Line with a record of 2:31 was sold to a gentleman in the United States; Lady Cleaveland, recorded 2:26, trial 2:22; Orphan Boy, no record, very fast; Beautiful Jim, no record, very fast; Pluck, no record, paced a mile in 2:24 with three weeks handling. Fuller, a half brother of Clear Grit, has paced a full mile in 2:13¼, and is, without doubt, the fastest pacer living to-day. "The Wisner Horse," with very little handling, has shown a gait of 2:40, was purchased and taken to England. Mr. P. J. Pilkie, the former owner of Amber, has now in his possession six Clear Grit colts, all of which can trot under three minutes. Mr. Davis, of Brantford, has now on his stock farm 30 Clear Grit colts, all of good promise, also a host of other Trotters and Pacers that have made fast records, both on the Canadian and American turf. It is an acknowledged fact that Old Clear Grit stands to day the representative Stallion of the Dominion of Canada, and more money has been paid for horses got by him than were ever paid for the get of any other stallion owned in this country.

CLEAR GRIT, JR., is a worthy representative of his noble sire. He is in color a rich dark bay, with black legs, mane and tail, stands 16 hands high, is 6 years old, grandly proportioned, and possessing great bone and substance. In fact, in the estimation of the best judges he is just the Stallion to produce the best class of stock, viz.: Stylish Drivers, Saddle Horses, and Fast Trotters,—the three classes of horses that command higher prices than any others. With such indisputable evidence before them, the farmers of the County of Grey will be enemies to their own interests if they do not breed to Clear Grit, Jr., and thus command a great deal more money for their young horse stock.

A DESTRUCTIVE CYCLONE.

Great Damage Done to Property in Ohio.

DWELLINGS AND BARNS TORN DOWN AND SWEPT AWAY.

DAYTON, O., April 28.—A cyclone yesterday afternoon destroyed or damaged thirty houses at Alexanderville and Carrollton. Half a mile of track on the Toledo and Cincinnati railway was torn up and blown away. Forests were levelled. At Alexanderville several persons were injured. The Soldiers' Orphans Home at Xenia was damaged. All the outhouses were wrecked, and a number of children were hurt.

It is estimated twenty residences in this county are in ruins. Sail mills, barns and other buildings were destroyed. Telegraph lines are down in all directions, and roads are impassible. Two farm hands are missing. Near Woodburn a brick school-house was demolished, and other property destroyed. In the neighborhood of Miamisburg the damage was heavy. At Belbrook fifteen farm houses were damaged. It is feared that when full details are received, the loss of life will be appalling. The damage done to farms is great. At one point the trains were unable to move, on account of the wind. In all directions south and east of here the scene of destruction defies description. At Jamestown only a few buildings are standing. Six persons were killed and twenty injured. The cyclone was about an eighth of a mile wide.

XENIA, O., April 28.—Daylight revealed a worse state of affairs at Jamestown than was expected. The tornado left nothing undestroyed in its course. Houses not entirely torn to pieces were twisted and wrested from their foundations. Nearly one-third of the town is in ruins, and the damages are estimated at $140,000 One hundred and thirty-six persons in the village lose small amounts, most instances being the entire home and contents. The force of the wind was terrific. Furniture and bedding were carried into tree-tops. Many people were lifted from the ground and some were carried a considerable distance.—Toronto News.

Damage to the extent of a quarter of a million pounds sterling was done by a fire on Saturday in the mammoth general merchandise establishment of Wm. Whitely, in London, England. This establishment is celebrated as being almost unique in its capability and resources, supplying parties who are in need of any article, however difficult to obtain, on the shortest possible notice, from a house ready furnished, even with meals placed on the table to sit down to, to a wife. It was Whitely who had the care and supply of the sable potentate Cetewayo during his sojourn in London, and who provided him with all the necessaries and luxuries he required for his insatiable appetite, including innumerable bottles of champagne—of course at the cost of the British Government.

CHAPTER XXVII.—CONTINUED.

I heard the boy say "Thank ye," and then the footsteps of the man coming nearer to me. My only hope was that I might perhaps escape him in the blinding fog by crouching under the hedge till he had passed; but, to my horror, he was coming as slowly and as cautiously as I. I had found my way to the hedge and knelt down close under it, my face almost among the briars and thorns. He passed me; I could see the vague form as it went by. But in my joy at the sight I drew a sharp breath; he turned back groped for me, found, and raised me to my feet, all without a word. I closed my eyes and shuddered. For the first moment I felt too exhausted by the excitement of those awful minutes to struggle much. I could only feebly try to push him off, crying brokenly—

"Don't—don't hurt me!"

"Hurt you, my own darling! Look up at me. Heaven help me, I have nearly frightened you to death!"

I looked up with a cry, and flung my arms round his neck. It was Laurence, his face so haggard and so dirty as to be scarcely recognisable; but he told me, as he kissed me again and again, that I must not mind that, for he had travelled night and day without a moment's rest since he got my letter on the morning of the previous day.

"And, thank Heaven, I am in time, in time!" he cried, as he pressed me again in his arms.

"In time for what Laurence? I should have been near you in two days," said I wonderingly. "We were to start to-morrow morning."

"To-morrow morning! Just a few hours more, and I should have lost you!" cried the poor fellow, in such agony of horror and relief at the same time that only to see him in that state brought the tears to my eyes.

"Lost me, Laurence? Oh, do tell me what you mean!" I cried piteously.

"Oh, Violet, you are still so innocent as to think that that man would have brought you to me?"

"Why not?" asked I in a whisper.

"Because he loves you himself," said he between his teeth—"if the feeling even you inspire in such a man can be called love. Your innocence would not have protected you much longer. Oh, I was a fool, a blind fool, ever to leave you, for father—mother—anybody in the world! But I did not know quite all until your own sweet naive letter opened my stupid eyes."

"Oh, Laurence, Laurence, what dreadful things are you saying?" I cried, shaking with fear even in his arms.

"Never mind, my own darling; you are safe now," said he very gently. "I didn't mean to frighten you. I ought to have warned you long ago; but I could not bear—"

"But, Laurence, my mother is going with us. Didn't I tell you that? I had a letter from her——"

"Which she never wrote. On my way back to London, I telegraphed to your mother to meet me at Charing Cross Station, and there she told me she had never seen Mr. Rayner and never heard a word of the journey to Monaco."

This blow was too much for me; I fainted in his arms. When I recovered, I found that he had carried me some distance; and, as soon as I began to sigh, he put me down and gave me some brandy and water out of his flask.

"I'm always wanting that now I think," said I, trying weakly to smile as I remembered that two or three times lately Mr. Rayner had given it to me when I seemed to be on the point of fainting. "You are the first person who has made me go off quite, though," I said.

And poor Laurence took it as a reproach, and insisted on our stopping again in the fog for me to forgive him. We were making our way slowly, in the increasing darkness, down the lane to the high road.

"But what am I to do, Laurence?" I asked trembling. "Shall I tell Mr. Rayner—oh, I can't think he is so wicked!—shall I tell him you have come back, and don't want me to leave England?"

"Not for the world, my darling," said he quickly. "Nobody in Goldham—not even at the Hall—knows I have come back. That is why I had to send for you on a pretext, and frighten you out of your life. The boy I sent for you did not know me. I got here in a fly from the station only a few minutes before I met him, and sent him off with the promise of a shilling if he brought you back with him.

"Ah that is why he was so anxious not to lose sight of me for a moment! But what is all this mystery about, Laurence? Why don't you go to the Hall and see your father?"

"Ah, that is a secret! You won't mind waiting till to-morrow to know that, will you, darling?"

"Oh, yes, I shall! I want to know now," said I coaxingly. "Won't you trust me with your secret?"

He did not want to do so; but I was curious, and hurt at his refusal; and, when he saw the tears come into my eyes, he gave way.

He had been so much struck with the postscript to my letter, telling him of a suspicious looking man whom I connected with with the Denham Court robbery hanging about the Hall, and promising to visit it again on Wednesday, that he had obtained, be telegraphing to the chief of the metropolitan police, a force of constables to lie in wait upon the Hall that night. He had appointed a trustworthy person to meet them at Beaconsburgh station and conduct them to a rendezvous he had obtained in the park, where they were probably waiting now. He was going to station them himself, under cover of the fog, in places round the Hall, among the shrubs, where they would be well concealed, and yet be near the approaches of the house, especially on that side where the strong room was. The fog might work for them or against them; it might throw the thieves—if indeed they came, which was a matter of chance—into the constables' hands or it might help them to escape. That must be left to fortune.

"And you know you said in your letter that Sarah was always raving about a bad man named James Woodfall, who seemed to have a great influence upon her and to be mixed up in everything evil she talked about. Well, I have brought down among the constables a man who knew James Woodfall, and swears he could identify him. This Woodfall used to be a clever forger, and got caught only once, when he was quite a lad; but he has been lost sight of for years. There is only an off-chance of his having anything at all to do with this; but I mentioned his name to the chief constable, and he thought it worth trying. So now, my darling, you know everything, and you must keep my secrets, every one, like grim death. As for your journey, don't be alarmed. I shall be in the same train with you; and your mother will really meet you at Liverpool Street Station, for I have told her to do so."

Laurence insisted on seeing me home. We had crept along the high road until we were close to the cottage nearest to the Alders, when we heard the sounds of hoofs and wheels, and men's voices helloing through the fog. Laurence opened the gate of the cottage garden and led me inside till they should have passed.

It was the dog-cart, with Mr. Rayner on foot leading the horse, and Maynard still in it.

"Lucky you are going to stay the night!" Mr. Rayner was saying. "I wouldn't undertake to find my way to my own gate tonight."

CHAPTER XXVIII.

We followed the dog cart at a safe distance, which was not very far off in the fog, until it stopped at the stable gate. Then we slipped past quite unseen on the other side of the road, while Mr. Rayner was busy opening the gate; and at the front gate Laurence left me, and I groped my way down the drive as fast as I could, and got in some minutes before Mr. Rayner and his companion. And, as I could rely upon the silence of Mr. Rayner and the cook, I said nothing to anybody else about my excursion.

We were about an hour over dinner, and, when Mr. Rayner had been to the cellar—not the dreadful store room cellar—himself to get out a bottle of port, he asked Mr. Maynard if he was fond of music.

"Well, I'm not much of a dab at it myself, though I used to tootle a little upon the cornet when I was a boy," replied the detective, whose language had grown a little easier and was less carefully chosen as he knew us better. "But I don't mind a tune now and then."

"Ah, you are not an enthusiast, I see!" said Mr. Rayner. "Now I can never be happy long without music. Did you ever try the violin?"

"Well, no; that is rather a scratchy sort of instrument, to my mind. Give me the concertina" replied Mr. Maynard genially.

"Then I won't ask you to listen to my music," said Mr. Rayner. "I'm only a fiddler. However, I think I must console myself for this disgusting weather by a—a tune to night; but I'll be merciful and shut the doors. My wife and Miss Christie will entertain you, and—let me see, it is half past seven—at nine o'clock I'll come and inflict myself upon you again, and we can have a game at backgammon. Do you care for backgammon?"

Mr. Maynard having declared that he did, Mr. Rayner asked me if I could go into the drawing room and hunt out La Traviata and Moore's "Irish Melodies." I went obediently, and was on my knees turning over the great piles of music that stood there, when he came in and softly shut the door. Before I knew he was near I felt something passed round my neck and heard the snap of a clasp behind. I put up my hand and sprang to my feet, startled. Mr. Rayner, bright and smiling, drew my hand through his arm and led me to the looking glass. Flashing and sparkling round my throat was a necklace of red jewels that dazzled me by their beauty.

"Don't I keep my promises? I said I would bring you some garnets, Do they please you?"

But they did not at all, after what Laurence had said; the magnificent present filled me with terror. I put up both hands, tore them off, and flung them down with trembling fingers, and then stood, panting with fright at my own daring, wondering what he would do to me.

He did nothing. After looking at me for what seemed to me a long time, while I stood trembling, at first proud and then ashamed of myself, without the least sign of displeasure he picked up the necklace, slipped it into his pocket, and said quite gently—

"That is a very pretty spirit, but is rather ungrateful, isn't it? Never mind; you shall make amends for it by-and-by. Now will you go and help Mrs. Rayner to entertain our lynx-eyed friend? You shall come back and fetch me at nine o'clock. Run along now, my dear."

He gave me a gentle little tap of dismissal and, rather crestfallen, I turned to the dining room. But neither my entertaining powers nor Mrs. Rayner's were called into play; for Mr. Maynard was already rather drowsy and, after sleepily muttering "Bravo—very good!" as the last sounds of Schubert's "Adieu" died away on Mr. Rayner's violin, he had to make an effort to listen to a selection from Rigoletto, and during some airs from Martha which followed I heard the regular breathing of a sleeping person from the arm-chair where he was sitting. But I was paying little attention to him. The door being shut, I had gone closer and closer to it, as if drawn, by an irresistible fascination, as Mr. Rayner seemed to play the "Adieu" as he had never played it before. Every note seemed to fibrate in my own heart, and nothing but fear of his displeasure if I disturbed him before nine o'clock kept me from returning to the drawing room, where I could have heard each plaintive passionate note unmuffled by the two doors between. When the last note of the "Adieu" had died away, and Mr. Maynard's coarse voice has broken the spell by his "Bravo—very good!" I listened for the next melody eagerly, and was struck with a chill sense of disappointment as an air from Rigoletto followed.

It was not that I did not care for that opera, though it is scarcely one of my favorites, but a certain hardness of touch, which struck me at once as being unlike the rich full tones Mr. Rayner generally drew from his loved violin, grated upon my ear and puzzled me. Of course Mr. Maynard did not notice any difference, and muttered approval from time to time indiscriminately. But my glances stole from him to Mrs. Rayner; and I could see that she also was struck by the curious change of style in her husband's playing. It was as brilliant as ever; the execution of one of the difficult passages in the arrangement of Martha was clever, more perfect than usual; but the soul was not there, and no brilliancy of shake or cadenza would repay one for the loss. It did not sound like the playing of the same man, and my interest in the music gradually died away; and, after watching Mrs. Rayner curiously for some minutes and noting the intentness with which, sitting upright in her chair, she was listening to the violin and at the same time keeping her eyes fixed upon the slumbering Maynard, I gave myself up to my own agitated thoughts.

What was going on at the Hall now? Had the constables been able in the fog to find their way safely to the park, and would the thieves come after all? Would they catch Tom Parkes? Would Gordon prove to be mixed up in it? Above all, would they catch the dreaded James Woodfall, whose influence seemed so strong and the memory of his name so fresh, though he had not been seen for years? It was an awful thing to think that I, by my letter to Laurence, had set on men to hunt other men down. I began to hope, even though I felt it was wrong to do so, that Tom Parkes would make his escape; he had never done me any harm, and I had rather liked him for his good-natured face. As for the unknown James Woodfall, the case was different. From Sarah's words and the eagerness with which the police had snatched at the least chance of catching him, it was plain that he was a very desperate criminal indeed, for whom one could have no sympathy. I hoped with all my heart they would catch him; and I was rather anxious to see what such a very wicked man looked like. Poor Tom Parkes was probably only a tool in the hands of this monster, who had made even the terrible Sarah a submissive instrument of evil.

And then I fell to thinking very sadly of what Laurence had told me that day about the deception practised upon me concerning the journey to Monaco, and I remembered Mrs. Rayner's warning. Could it be true that Mr. Rayner, who had always been so kind, so sweet-tempered, so patient, who had always treated me almost as if I were a child, and who had borne my rudeness in the drawing room just now with such magnanimous good humor, could really be such a hypocrite? There must be some explanation of it all which which would satisfy even Laurence, I thought to myself—almost, at least: for that letter from my mother, which she had never written—could that be explained away? My tears fell fast as this terrible proof rose up in my mind. How could he explain that away? But one's trust in a friend as kind as Mr. Rayner had proved to me does not die out quickly; and was drying my eyes and hoping that a few words from him would make it all right, when suddenly the silence round the house was broken by a howl from Nap, Mr. Rayner's retriever, who was chained to his kennel out side.

Mrs. Rayner started. Still Maynard slumbered. I looked at the clock; it was seven minutes to nine. Another and another howl from the dog, followed by loud and furious barking. We two women sat staring at each other, without a word. I would have spoken; but Mrs. Rayner glanced at the sleeping detective and put her finger to her lips. Still the sounds of the violin came to us from the drawing-room without interruption.

When nine o'clock struck, I jumped up, much relieved, opened and shut the door softly, crossed the hall, and turned the handle of the drawing room door. It was locked. I tapped; but there was no answer. He was playing a brilliant concerto, and I supposed he had not heard me. I knocked again and said softly—

"Mr. Rayner it is nine o'clock. You told me to come at nine."

Still there was no answer, which I thought strange, for his hearing was generally very sharp indeed. It was of no use for me to stand there knocking if he would not hear me, or did not yet wish to be disturbed; so, after one more unsuccessful attempt to attract his attention, I took a lamp from the hall table and went into the schoolroom. It was now ten minutes past nine. Nap was barking more furiously than ever. I knew by the mist there was all through the house how dense the fog must be outside; but I was so much struck by the noise the dog was making that I unfastened the shutters and opened the window about an inch to listen.

The fog was blinding. I could not see a yard in front of me. I heard nothing but Nap's barking for a minute; then I saw the dim glow of a lantern and heard a muffled whisper through the fog—

"Who's that?"

"It is I—Violet Caristie. Is that you Laurence?"

"Hush! All right!" he whispered back. "Let me in."

He got in softly through the window, and, rather to my alarm, a middle-aged man in plain clothes, also with a lantern, followed him. Laurence himself looked more alarming than any thief. His face was ghastly white with fatigue, and dirtier than ever through long watching in the fog. He listened for a minute to the violin, then said quickly, but still in a low tone.

"Who is that playing?"

"Mr. Rayner," I answered.

He turned sharply to the other man, who nodded as if to say it was just what he had expected.

"How long has he been playing?" asked Laurence.

"Ever since half-past seven."

He turned to the other man again.

"A trick," said the latter simply.

"Who is with him?" asked Laurence again.

"Nobody," said I surprised and rather frightened by those questions. "Mrs. Rayner and Mr. Maynard are in the dining-room."

"Maynard?"

"Yes. He is asleep."

The middle aged man gave a snort of disgust.

"Hasn't Mr. Rayner been in the dining room at all, dear, this evening?" asked Laurence gently.

"Not since dinner. I left him playing in the drawing room at five and twenty minutes to eight, and he told me to call him at nine. He has been playing ever since."

"But it is past nine."

"Yes. When I went to the drawing room door just now I found it locked, and I knocked; but he did not answer."

"Will you go and knock again, and say you wish to speak to him particularly, dear?" said Laurence gravely.

I hesitated, trembling from head to foot.

"Why?" I asked, in a low voice.

"Because we want to speak to him particularly," said the other man gruffly.

But I looked at his hard face and panted out—

"You are a policeman, I know! What do you want with Mr. Rayner?"

"Never you mind, my dear; we won't hurt you. Just go and say you want to speak to him."

"No, I won't!" I cried—not loudly, for my voice seemed to grow suddenly weak. "Whatever you think he has done, or whatever he has done, I will never help to harm Mr. Rayner!"

The man shrugged his shoulders, walked to the window, and whistled softly. Laurence put me into a chair, whispering "That's a brave girl"—but with such an anxious, stern face. And the other man came back into the room, followed by a policeman with his staff ready in his hand.

"We must break open the door," said the elder man.

I started from my seat. I wanted to rush to the drawing room door and warn Mr. Rayner; but Laurence prevented me, whispering gravely—

"My darling, you must leave it to us now."

Every word, every movement had been so quiet that the music still went on while they opened the schoolroom door and crossed the hall. I stood watching them breathlessly.

The three men, Laurence, the most stalwart, foremost, placed themselves against the drawing-room door, and by one mighty push burst it open. I ran forward to the doorway just in time to see Gordon, Mr. Carruther's servant, fling down the violin and rush to the opposite window, the shutters of which were unfastened. But I heard the crash of glass, and at the same instant two policemen dashed through the shattered French window, seized and handcuffed him. Then he stood between them, white and immovable, without a struggle.

"It's no go. We know you're one of the gang," said the middle-aged man. "Game's up. We've got your leader."

"What leader?" asked Gordon calmly.

"James Woodfall."

"It's a lie!" snapped out the immoveable Gordon. "Jim Woodfall wouldn't let himself be nabbed by such as you."

"Why not? We've got you."

The man did not answer.

"All his fault for getting soft on a girl! Wish I had her here!" Gordon muttered presently.

He caught sight of me at the doorway and shot at me a sort of steely look that made me shudder. But I did not connect myself with his words. I was too bewildered to think or to understand clearly what was going on until I saw him, handcuffed as he was, quietly draw a tiny revolver from his pocket and, without raising it, point it at Laurence. With a scream I rushed forward into the room and flung myself in front of Laurence, and I heard a report and felt something touch my arm—I did not know what at first—and Laurence sprang forward with almost a yell. But he was encumbered with my form, and, before he could put me down, Gordon had wrenched himself away from his captors, and, snarling, "I meant to have done for her!" had dashed through the open window out into the fog and darkness.

I knew by this time that I was shot in the arm, for the blood was trickling through my sleeve; but the wound did not pain me much yet—I was too much excited for that, and too much occupied with Laurence's pitiful distress. He did not attempt to join in the hopeless chase of the escaped Gordon, but put me on a sofa, tore off the body of my frock, and bandaged my arm himself.

"Tell me what it all means, Laurence?" said I. "I am not badly hurt—I am not indeed—and I want to understand it all. Did you catch the thieves? Who were they? Have they really caught James Woodfall? And I hope—oh, I hope poor Tom Parkes has escaped!" I whispered; for the middle-aged man had not joined in the pursuit, but stood on the watch, half in and half out of the window.

[TO BE CONTINUED].

A TRAGIC EVENT.

A Father's Despair and Self-Inflicted Death. His Son's Final Resolve. Too Late to Save His Parent.

The graphic occurrence that is described below is one of the most remarkable episodes in the domestic history of America. It is absolute truth which can readily be verified.

The inhabitants of the pleasant town of Cortland, N.Y., were shocked one morning by the announcement that Mr. Clinton Rindge, one of their most prominent citizens, had committed suicide. The news spread rapidly and roused the entire neighborhood where Mr. Rindge was so well and favorably known. At first it seemed impossible that any one so quiet and domestic could do so rash a deed, and the inquiry was heard on every side as to the cause. The facts as developed on investigation proved as follows:

Mr. Rindge was domestic in his tastes and took the greatest enjoyment in the society of his children and pride in their development. And indeed he had good reason to be proud, for they gave promise of long lives of success and usefulness. But an evil day came. His youngest son, William, began to show signs of an early decay. He felt unusually tired each day, and would sometimes sleep the entire afternoon if permitted to do so. His head pained him, not acutely but with a dull, heavy feeling. There was a sinking sensation at the pit of the stomach. He lost all relish for food and much of his interest for things about him. He tried manfully to overcome these feelings but they seemed stronger than his will. He began to lose flesh rapidly. The father became alarmed and consulted physicians as to the cause of his son's illness, but they were unable to explain. Finally sores broke out on his arms and he was taken to Buffalo where a painful operation was performed resulting in the loss of much blood but affording little relief. The young man returned home and a council of physicians was called. After an exhaustive examination they declared there was no hope of final recovery and that he must die within a very days. To describe the agony which this announcement caused the father would be impossible. His mind failed to grasp its full meaning at first; then finally seemed to comprehend it, but the load was too great. In an agony of frenzy he seized a knife and took his own life, preferring death rather than to survive his idolized son. At that time William Rindge was too weak to know what was transpiring. His face had turned black, his breath ceased entirely at times, and his friends waited for his death believing that the result Bright's disease of the kidneys, from which he was suffering, could not be removed. In this supreme moment William's sister came forward and declared she would make a final attempt to save her brother. The doctors interposed, assuring her it was useless and that she would only hasten the end by the means she proposed to employ. But she was firm, and putting all back, approached her brother's side and administered a remedy which she fortunately had on hand. Within an hour he seemed more easy, and before the day was over he showed signs of decided improvement. These favorable signs continued, and to-day William Rindge is well, having been virtually raised from the dead through the marvelous power of Warner's Safe Cure, as can be readily vertified by any citizen of Cortland.

Any one who reflects upon the facts above described must have a feeling of sadness. The father, dead by his own hand, supposing his son's recovery to be impossible; the son restored to health to mourn the loss of his father and the agonized relatives with a memory of sadness to forever darken their lives. Had Clinton Rindge known that his son could recover he would to-day be alive and happy, but the facts which turned his brain and caused him to commit suicide were such as any one would accept as true.

However sad this case may be, the truth remains that thousands of people are at this moment in as great actual peril as William Rindge and in as great danger of causing misery if not death to their friends. Liver and kidney diseases are become the most common and most dangerous of any or all modern complaints. They are the most deceptive in their beginnings and horrible in their final stages. They are far more deceptive than Consumption, and can rarely be be detected even by skillful physicians unless a microscopic analysis be resorted to, and few doctors understand how to do this. Their slightest approach, or possibility of approach should strike terror to the one who is threatened as well as to all his or her friends. These diseases have no distinct symptoms, but come in the form of lassitude, loss of appetite, aching muscles and joints, dull head-ache, pain in the back, stomach and chest, sour stomach, recurring signs of cold, irregular pulsations of the heart, and frequent dizziness. If neglected, these symptoms are certain to run into chronic kidney and liver or Bright's disease, from which there is sure to be a great amount of agony and only one means of escape, which is by the use of Warner's Safe Cure. The importance of taking this great remedy upon the slightest appearance of any of the above symptoms cannot be too strongly impressed upon the minds of all readers who desire to escape death and pain and prolong life with all its pleasures and blessings.

Why She Broke Up the Game.

On the train running down from Nashville to Memphis a couple of travellers called for the card table and began a game of euchre. Near them sat an old woman who had been industriously reading for an hour or two. At the sight of the cards she dropped her book and spectacles and pricked up her ears, and only three points had been made when she rose up and walked over to them.

"I pass!" said one of the players as he looked up.

"Young man!" she replied in a very solemn voice, "do you know the infernal wickedness of them pasteboards?"

"Yes'm, and I take that king with the ace," he answered.

"Want to take a hand in?" asked the other.

"I shall take a hand in if you don't put them keerds up. Poker killed my son Jim afore he was 25 years old. Old sledge brought my boy Sam to prison when he was only 18. Euchre was what separated me and the old man. I can't bear the sight of keerds, and I won't have no playing in this kyar if I have to fight for it."

"What's trumps?" queried one of the players of his companion.

"Clubs!" replied the old woman, as she brought him a cuff with one hand and seized the "deck" with the other. "Boys, hand me over them devil's darning needles."

One refused to comply until she had collared him, but when she had the pack in hand she walked to the door and gave it a fling clear of the track. Then, returning to the pair, she handed one of them a well-worn Testament and said:

"Now read a chapter and pass it over to your friend, and if you haven't been brung up to know Moses from Judas Iscariot, don't be afraid to turn around and ask me! If both of you don't admit in half an hour from this that you feel a hundred per cent. better, I'll treat you to some elderberry wine and fried cakes."

Her Goetze, the tenor, had to travel from Cologne to Frankfort and appear the same evening in "Lohengrin." He arrived at the wings just in time to "go on." After vanquishing the villian who aspersed the Elsa of the occasion, he embraced her. As he did not know her, he whispered, while holding her fondly in his arms, "Allow me to have the honor of introducing myself to you. My name is Goetze of Cologne."

The Weather Prophet looks for spring this month. The wise man looks for a blood purifier that will not injure his system; he can find what he wants in Dr. Carson's Stomach Bitters, the greatest of all blood purifiers. In large bottles at 50 cents.

Human skin and that of young rabbits have been successfully applied in small pieces to large healing surfaces in wounds. Dr. Wilson, however, in the Medical News, claims to have obtained very much better results from the use of the internal membrane of hen's eggs. The egg should be fresh and warm.

From the bud to the blossom, then the perfect fruit. These are the several stages of several of the most important ingredients composing the painless and sure corn cure—Putnam's Painless Corn Extractor. The juices of plants greatly concentrated and purified, gums and balsams in harmonious union, all combined, give the grand results. Putnam's Extractor makes no sore spot, does not lay a man up for a week, but goes on quietly doing its work until a perfect cure results. Beware of acid substitutes.

FOR THE FARMER.

Rhubarb Culture.

Rhubarb, like currant bushes, will grow almost anywhere and under any treatment, and consequently receives more ill usage than any other "green thing growing." But for this reason it should not be supposed that when growing under neglect and abuse it will do its best and produce as abundant crops and of equally good quality as when good treatment is given.

After it is once planted rhubarb requires little cultivation, but it must have at all times deep, rich soil, the richer the better. In field culture the roots are planted about four feet apart each way, and cultivated like any hoed crop. In the family garden they should be planted two to three feet apart, in a single row, at least four feet distant from other plants.

It may be raised from seed, but as there is little reliance in the seedings being of the same variety as the parent plants, division of the roots is the method of propagation usually adopted. Any piece of root with a bud or crown will grow if planted about two inches deep in mellow soil firmly pressed around it. Roots may be planted in autumn or early spring. Plantations are usually renewed every four or five years, yet when a liberal dressing of manure is given every fall the roots will produce a crop for an almost indefinite period. Heavy manuring, clean cultivation, and liberal space are the essential requisites for raising large, succulent rhubarb. The varieties best known are:—

Linnæus, grown extensively for market as well as home use. It is early, very productive, and of a brisk, spicy flavor. Its principal fault is that it seeds so freely that unless all flower stalks are cut off as soon as they appear the crop deteriorates rapidly.

Victoria is later, has larger leaves and stalks, and requires very rich, rather heavy ground for its best developement.

Paragon. This is a new variety, originated in England, and now introduced here. The stalks are bright red, heavy, and produced in quick succession and great abundance. It is earlier, of more delicate flavor, and decidedly less acid than any other variety we are acquainted with. But its most remarkable and most valuable qualification is that it does not produce flower stalks, to which fact its great productiveness is mainly attributable, all the strength of the plant being used for the development of the leaves.

Weight of Milk.

A great many little things are constantly occurring before our eyes that most of us fail to notice. Every one who eats apples knows that they contain seeds, but not everyone who eats apples can tell whether the seeds in the apples as they lie in their little seed cells, or "nulls," lie with their small end or large end towards the stem of the apple. I have heard the question asked repeatedly in large congregations of apple eaters, without bringing out half a dozen correct answers, the large majority appearing among the number who did not pretend to know, while of those who thought they knew, more usually voted wrong than right. Most persons, probably, know as much about milk as they do about apples, and perhaps one ought not to be surprised that in a mixed gathering there might be a difference of opinion concerning so simple a thing as milk. Yet we are hardly prepared to find, upon a recent occasion, where a number of farmers were discussing the milk question, that scarcely one could tell for a certainty which of the two liquids, milk or water, was the heaviest, while of those who thought they knew, the larger number were in the wrong. Because milk contains water which is lighter than either water or cream, many think that the milk itself must be lighter than water. Probably very few farmers ever took the trouble to weigh a gallon of either water or milk to ascertain their weights or difference. The difference is comparatively slight, though varying according as the milk is rich or poor in the several milk solids. Take a vessel that will hold exactly 100 pounds of pure water, and fill it with pure milk of average quality, and the latter will be found to be about 103 pounds. In other words milk is 3 per cent. heavier than water.

Mr. O. S. Bliss, who is good authority on dairy matters, gives, in a recent letter to the Rural New Yorker, the specific gravity of pure milk, as found by many tests, to be, 1.03. The standard gallon of pure milk, taken at a temperature of 60°, is now generally understood to weigh 8.6 pounds, or 2.15 pounds per quart. By this rule ten quarts of pure milk at a temperature of 60° would weigh just 21½ pounds, which are easy figures to remember, and from which it is easy to reckon the number of quarts given by a cow after finding the number of pounds by weighing. A good many owners of large dairies have come to reckon two pounds of milk as a quart, which is wrong and very misleading.

Barbed Wire Fencing.

A correspondent of the Rural New Yorker gives the following experience:—"From my own long experience with barbed-wire fencing and still longer experience with other fences, I can find no weighty objections to the former. I have heard some complaints and some expressed fears of possible danger to stock; but these objections have been few in comparison with the commendations given wire fencing. Its advantages as to durability, low cost and capability of resisting wind storms, are certainly evident. Economically considered, there is no fence that will compare with it. We do not in this vicinity, as a general rule, build fences of wire alone, preferring to use two six-inch pine boards at the bottom, with three wires above.

The principal objection urged against barbed-wire fencing, is that stock is liable to serious injury from running violently against the barbs. So far as my observation has extended, this objection arises only from an apprehension of danger, and is not based on actual facts. Of course, one can conceive of such a thing, and shudder at the thought of a favorite animal being maimed; and at once the objection theoretically becomes a potent one; but I think very few persons have suffered loss in this manner. I have not heard of such an instance in this part of the country, and there are hundreds of miles of barbed-wire fence within a very few miles of this place, I notice that stock generally acquaint themselves with the nature of the fence, and after that leave it severely alone. The difficulty is largely obviated by the board and wire fence, for horses running towards the fence, see the board and turn away.

Another correspondent in the same paper writes thus:—As to wire fences, I have about 400 yards of the barbed and more of the buckthorn, and like the latter much better, except for special purposes, such as a pig fence or a top wire on a board fence. when I should prefer the close set barb. I use chestnut posts three inches square, sharpened and driven down from 16 to 20 feet apart, and at every ninth and tenth post an eight-inch chestnut or oak straining post is planted three feet, and well rammed. The end straining posts only are braced. I find the best way to brace is to plant a stout post eight feet from the end post; put a brace from near the top of one to the bottom of the other, at the surface of the ground; then nail a thick eight-inch board from the top of one post to the top of the other. Put up in this way the straining-post will not "give." Without the board, it is apt to push the second post over when cold weather arrives. I have not found wire fences dangerous to stock so far. I first used three strands of wire, but now use four one foot apart, and the first one foot from the ground. This makes a good fence, and is about the right height. Cattle will put their heads through to reach grass outside the fence, but do not get hurt in doing so. I have never had an animal attempt to break through except an old boar, and in this case the fence was too low and he jumped it, and in doing so pulled the wire from the post.

"Any good shooting on your farm?" asked a hunter of a farmer. "Splendid," said the agriculturist; "there's the tax-gatherer in the parlor, and my mother-in-law in the kitchen. Climb over the fence, young man, load both barrels, and shoot the lot."

Distinguish exactly what one is, when he stands alone, and acts for himself, and when he is led by others. We know many who act always honestly, often with delicacy, when left to themselves; and like knaves when influenced by some overbearing characters, whom they slavishly submitted to follow.

An Ayrshire farmer who had been out in the late boisterous weather and got himself very wet went into a public-house in a country village and ordered a glass of whiskey. After taking off the contents neat without an effort he said, "Man, that whusky's uncommon mild; it's a wee like mysel'; I think it's been oot in the rain!"

A minister, when visiting a farm-house observed one of the inmates begin to a large cog of porridge without having first asked a blessing on the food. Desirous of teaching the lad his duty in this respect, he said to him, "Without asking a blessing, are you not afraid the porridge will choke you?" "No," said the youth instantly; "there's nae fear o' that; they're no sae thick."

A gentleman who considered himself a crack shot with a rifle "at a mark" took a deer-forest last autumn. The first day's stalking, says a Northern contemporary, seemed to him "a day bewitched," for he missed every chance and several of them were good ones. He asked the headkeeper if he could account for his missing so often. Like a true Scot, the keeper replied by asking another question. "Are your rifle and cartridges gude?" "Yes, quite good—Westley Richards, you know." "Then youre no gude yoursel'."

Andrew Douglas, author of "The History of Ferryden," used to keep an evening school during the winter for the benefit of the fisher lads who were engaged with their fathers during the summer. One of his pupils had got as far advanced as cloth measure, in reduction, when going up one day to the master with his slate, the master (who had an impediment in his speech), after looking it over, told him his answer was wrong. "Fat's the matter wi' the coon't, maister?" says the scholar. "W'wy, d'don't you s-see that you h-h-have got h-h-half a yard t-t-too m-m-much in your answer?" ROMAN FOX HUNTING.

Sport that Is no Child's Play—Dangerous Ground and Reckless Riders.

The Romans as a rule do not "go in" for manly sports much. There is something in the soft southern air which predisposes them to inaction. They are quite content with the mild exercise of a drive on the Pincio, varied, perhaps, from time to time, by a day's shooting over the Alban hills. But one sport, and that one of all others the most exciting, does flourish here—fox hunting. The hunt meets two or three times weekly throughout the season, and there is generally a good muster. On some mornings as many as forty or fifty riders may be seen on the trail of poor reynard, and not unfrequently there are twice as many people go out "on wheels," especially if the meet happens to be at Cecilia Metella, by the Via Appia, or at the Tre Fontane—the two most popular rendezvous in the Campagna. It is the fashion among many smart sportsmen who never saw a meet to sneer at Roman fox hunting and Roman foxes. But they would find, if they condescended to try it, that the sport is perhaps often more exhilarating than would suit their fancy. The foxes are bona fide, "natural" foxes. They are not, as an Englishman insinuated the other day, "shaken out of a bag," or "numbered," or "put down" a couple of hours before they are "sighted."

The hounds are kept at a farm outside the Porta Salaria, about three miles from Rome. It is chiefly supported by the subscriptions of the Roman nobles, though a dozen foreigners are members of the hunt and contribute their quota. Duca Grazioli, the M. F. H., is a great favorite. To look at his delicate face and figure in a drawing room you would never credit him with the dash and endurance he really has in him. But put him in the saddle and he is a changed being. He is a splendid rider—takes the stiffest rails and walls as though they were kitchen-fenders. His only rivals are Reynolds, the huntsman (who hails from Leicestershire), Count Zucchini, a hard but rather unlucky rider, and a gentleman in the Italian foreign office named Simonetta, who usually bestrides a superb chestnut steeplechase mare, which has played him several ugly tricks lately, and, indeed, nearly broke his neck the other day. Count Zucchini, by the by, also had a narrow escape a short time ago. While hunting a particularly knowing fox at Conto Celli one morning his horse stumbled into a hole, and he came a regular "neck and cropper." He was picked up with a broken shoulder-blade and a damaged collar-bone, which obliged him to go into hospital for over a fortnight.

Among the other patrons of the noble sport Prince Odescalchi (Mario's great friend) is one of the most constant. He is the only man in Rome who wears an ulster, and he wears it ostentatiously, even going the length of riding to meet in it. Very often Prince Rossano Borghese and his brothers also join the "pink 'uns." Duca Magrignano and Prince Dora have been less assiduous of late, and we have too often missed Princess Doria, the dashing daughter of his grace of Newcastle. But though one fair huntress has thought fit to desert us the field has rarely been quite deprived of feminine attractions. Only very important engagements or illness would induce Countess Bobinsky, for instance, to forego her periodic run with the Roman hounds. Countess Celeri, a go-ahead Roman lady, has been out pretty often during the last two or three winters. She has five English hunters in her stable—regular "flyers" some of them—and will ride at anything when her blood is up.

The low, rolling plain between Rome and the mountain is rather ticklish ground for a novice or a stranger to hunt over. The soil is treacherous, pitfalls are plentiful, and the ruins strewn about in the grass constitute awkward stumbling blocks—especially if you allight on them after taking a flyer over a four-foot rail or a good hedge. Near the city the land is comparatively level, however. The danger begins about Roma Vecchia, where the relics of the dead past lie so thick together that you have to pick your way as if you were riding through the cemetery. And, indeed, the Campagna is a cemetery, the greatest, grandest, and most crowded in the world. Besides natural obstacles, you have to reckon with artificial obstacles in the shape of rough stone walls (very like those in the English lake country), fragments of tombs, and forgotten chips of fallen temples.

There was some exciting, though rather disappointing sport out toward the Roman race-course the other morning. We mustered about thirty strong, among the number being, of course, Duca Grazioli, Prince Odescalchi (in pink, like many of the men, but unlike the rest, disguised in the inevitable ulster), M. Simonette, etc., and last, but not least, one lady—Countess Celeri. The fox was sighted shortly after 11, and away we swept, over the brow of a rather high hillock and down again into a deep dip, the hounds owning the scent faithfully for some time. After a sharp run of twenty minutes, however, they were seen to be at fault, and after all reynard succeeded in getting away with his brush, to the intense disgust of Reynolds, the huntsman, and the hunt generally.

Lavish Hospitality.

Entertaining, even when it is simply done, if carried to excess, will make great inroads on a limited property, and in Virginia hospitality was literally unbounded. Even to this day, to ask a Virginian to come and stay from Monday till Friday, or from Wednesday till Saturday, mentioning, that is to say, a limit for his visit, would be considered a most barbarous outrage. There is something almost ludicrous, if it were not so pathetic, in the picture of poor Mr. Jefferson's declining years at Monticello. His property, which had amounted to something over £40,000 when he left office, was literally eaten up by the swarms of visitors of all kinds, whom his ideas of hospitality forbade him to close his doors to, and when he died, the sale of his property failed to cover his debts.

There was a musical entertainment in Denver a short time ago, and a local publication thus describes it: "Sweet strains of music floated out upon the gentle breeze of the quiet night with that enchanting melody which lifts the soul of man from the narrow limits of human enjoyments to pleasant anticipations of those seraphic pleasures in which the angels are wont to engage."

Time once passed never returns; the moment which is lost is lost for ever.

Different Appreciations of the Day of Rest.

The great Reformers, the early fathers of the church, and, I venture in all humbleness to think, the Founder of our religion, entertained very different views as to the utility of the day of rest to those which have molded the laws regulating Sunday observance among us. The modern Sunday is distinctly the outcome of the great Puritan movement. The opinions of the Puritan divines on this point are formulated in the Westminster confessions. None can impeach the loftiness of conception and purity of motive that actuated those divines. But their conception was too lofty; it could not be realized. It was above and beyond the compass of human nature. It was an ideal attainable only by ideal men and women. The Puritan Sunday never has been, is not, and never can be, observed among us. If it was unsuitable to the wants of human nature more than 200 years ago, it is much more inconsistent with the needs of men in this present age. Great multitudes of people were not divorced from nature at that time, nor were the minds of men and women so active and so intolerant of mere idleness as they are now. The struggle for existence, and the consequent necessity for true recreation which is only to be obtained by change of occupation were not so pronounced then as now; the surroundings and occupations of the people are far more depressing now than in the days of the Puritan divines. The day of rest must be made to suit the times, or it ceases to be a day of rest. Human nature is many-aided, and unless some latitude of observance is allowed, Sunday as a day of rest cannot satisfy its various needs. No institution of divine origin can fail in its objects or clash with the requirements of man. If it does so the fault lies not in the command, but in the interpretation thereof. It is in the mistaken construction put by our Sabbatarians upon the command to keep holy the Sabbath day that the danger to Sunday as a day of rest lies. Sabbatarians accuse the advocates of Sunday opening of being unmindful of the value of Sunday. The accusation is not true. It is on account of my appreciation of the value of the day of rest that I approve of Sunday opening. The feeling of reverence for Sunday as a divine institution should be preserved; anything tending to weaken it should be removed. If Sunday ceases to be a day of true rest to the weary, of real recreation to the exhausted mind and body, the sense of reverence will surely weaken and die out, and one of the safeguards of our English Sunday will have passed away. The religious objection to Sunday opening has been tacitly suffered to drop out of the controversy in Parliament, and I have touched but lightly upon it, partly on that account and partly because it is a subject naturally difficult for a layman to deal with. But it must not be forgotten that the religious objection is the real backbone of the opposition throughout the country. It would not be hard to show how mistaken is that opposition. I only wish that the spiritual leaders of the people of all denominations would speak out their minds freely on the subject. Surely not many of them can hold in their inmost souls that such reasonable recreation as is involved in Sunday opening is contrary to Scripture or hostile to a proper and religious observance of Sunday. But they fear to offend the weaker brethren. The weaker brethren theory is, like all other good things, apt to become inconvenient and dangerous when carried to extremes. Respect for prejudice or mistaken principles should not be allowed to weigh down the truth. Even if conscientiously believing that it is a sinful thing to spend an hour in a museum on Sunday afternoons, many ministers of religion and numbers of those committed to their charge must allow that it is a matter concerning which a man may justly claim to be guided by his own conscience and to exercise his right of private judgment. The fact that a certain number of English men and women visited art galleries on the Sunday cannot be as obnoxious to the feelings of their fellow-countrymen as to the existence and toleration among us of forms of worship which are held by many to be false and damnable. And yet the most violent antagonists of Sunday opening, the strongest opponents of liberty of conscience in this small respect, the most intolerant of our adversaries, are to be found among those who fought the hardest for liberty of conscience in their own behalf, and who owe immunity from civil disabilities and religious persecution to the tolerance of others. Enough, however, has been said on the religious aspect of the question; the secular objection is in some respects the most important, since it is on that field that the battle is now usually fought.—Earl of Dunraven, in the Nineteenth Century.

The Mexican Lasso.

The lasso itself is a rope made of the twisted fibre of the maguey, or aloe, known in European markets as Sisal hemp. There is a great difference in the quality; the best and strongest are twisted so extremely tight that it is almost impossible to untwist the strands. One end is worked into a small loop, lined inside with leather, through which, when about to throw the lasso, the other end is passed. The rope is about 30 feet long, about one-third of it formed into a noose, which is grasped a little above the loop—i. e., where the rope is double, the rest of it is coiled round and held in the left hand, ready to let go, the extreme end being kept separate, and of course retained. The noose should hang well clear of the ground when held level with the shoulder, and, when open, forms a circle of four or five feet in diameter. The lasso is swung over the head and left shoulder, and back over the right shoulder, a peculiar turn of the wrist as it begins to return keeping the noose open. It is thus made to circle round and round his head by the thrower until he is within distance of his object, when it is launched and flies off at a tangent, the noose assuming a circular form, and settling quietly around the object aimed at. Before it settles the thrower seizes the other end with the right hand, and gives it two rapid turns round the cabeza of his saddle, so as to get a purchase. If he is not quick enough at this, and the bull tightens the rope before a good purchase has been effected, the result is that the fingers get caught between the rope and the cabeza and are very much injured. It is no unfrequent thing to see a man who has lost one or two fingers in learning the art. It is beautiful to see the exactitude with which an adept will throw the lasso from or to any point over either shoulder, behind or in front. There is no credit in catching a bull by the horns, for he can not be thrown by them; but considerable skill is required to pitch the noose just in front of him when he is at full gallop, so that next step he treads into it; then, on its being tightened with a sudden jerk, rolls over in the dust. The horse, too, has to learn his part or the business, and bear at the right moment in the opposite direction, or he might be thrown instead of the bull, to which indeed he is often inferior in weight. It is considered disgraceful to have to loosen the lasso, and to let the bull carry it off with him. A good hand will catch by either leg alone a bull galloping past at any angle. The most difficult feat of all is to lasso him round the quarters when at full gallop at the moment when his hind legs are doubled up under him. Usually the noose slips off, and nothing happens; but if it be thrown precisely at the right instant, his hind legs are pinned tight up under his belly, and he is brought to a standstill in the position of a sitting dog, looking indescribably silly in such an unwonted position. These and other feats of lassoing are seen at their best at a hacienda, on the occasion of the annual herradero, when the young bulls are driven in from the plains, thrown down, and marked with a hot iron with the initials of their proprietors' names. Friends and neighbors come together from afar, and vie with one another in the display of dexterity and horsemanship.—The Saturday Review.

Dean Chisholm says he became acquainted a few years ago with an old man residing in the Causeyside of Paisley who remembered the time when there were only a dozen Roman Catholic families in that town; now, according to the Dean, Paisley is favoured with the presence of about 12,000 Romanists.

The late Mr. White, of Overtoun, has bequeathed £34,000 to religious and charitable institutions. The sum on £5,000 goes to the sustenation fund, £3,000 to the Foreign, £500 each to the Home and Livingstonia mission, to the Aged and Infirm Ministers' Fund, and to the Society for the Children of Ministers and Missionaries.

There has been an increase of upwards of 30,000 members of the Wesleyan body in Great Britain during the last three years. The returns for this year, which are now being made up, are expected to prove that during recent years there has been the greatest development of Methodism since the days of John Wesley.

The American Board of Commissioners for Foreign Missions, organized in 1810, conducts missions in India, Ceylon, Hawaiian Islands, Turkey, South Africa, China, Micronesia, Japan, Spain, Mexico, Australia and West Africa. There are 21 missions, 804 stations, 154 ordained missionaries, six of whom are physicians; 270 other assistants, making 433 missionaries from America. The native helpers number 1827, of whom 512 are pastors and preachers. There are 278 churches with 19,364 members: 58 theological and training schools, with 1538 pupils; 832 common schools, with 31,016 pupils, making a total of 35,625 pupils. The receipts of the Board for the year ending August 31, 1883, were $590,995.67.

AN ELEPHANT AT LARGE.

Demolishing Fences and Breaking into a House—The Inmates Flying.

An elephant belonging to a circus at present located in Coventry broke loose early one recent morning, and went in the darkness toward several detached cottages. Finding his progress barred by a fence and a gate, he smashed the gate into fragments, and carried a portion of it with him. Having gained access to the gardens which surrounded the cottages he discovered a tub containing food for pigs, of which he made a meal, and then, in continuing his explorations, he became wedged between a tree and the wall of one of the houses. In his efforts to turn round he burst open the door of the house, the noise alarming the inmates to such an extent that they dared not leave the upper rooms. Proceeding to the next house, the elephant broke open the door with his trunk, which he pushed into the room, and when the man of the house came down stairs to ascertain the cause of the noise he was struck with consternation, and quickly retreated to the upper room.

The man threw first a flower pot and then a board at the intruder, who manifested the utmost indifference, and eventually quietly walked away. He was followed through the garden by several of the alarmed householders, one of whom was despatched for the keeper. Meanwhile the elephant reached the street, and was met by a policeman, who turned on his bull's-eye, the flash of light drawing from the elephant a contemptuous grunt as he moved onward. Before he had proceeded very far his keeper got within hailing distance, and at the sound of his voice the elephant turned about and marched quietly back to his quarters.—Pall Mall Gazette.

MARKDALE MAY. 1, 1884.

DAIRING BURGLARY

McFarland's Store Entered and the Vault Blown Open.

OVER $200 STOLEN.

No Clue to the Perpetrators.

On Sunday night last the establishment of W. J. McFarland, of this village, was entered and burglarized by supposed professionals, who blew up the lock of the door leading into the vault, and carefully secured what cash was within with the exception of $150 in bills which was in a separate place. There being a heave thunder storm during the night, nothing was heard or known of the affair until Monday morning, on entering when things were somewhat disorderly in the Post-office department, which leads to the vault. The lock was evidently blown open, as the smell of powder was still in those parts. Their entrance to the store appears a mystery, as all the doors were fast in their usual way in the morning. They escaped however through the window from the Post-office, leaving a sledge hammer, brace and bit, screwdriver, and other such tools. Nothing was molested in the store, they confining their operations to searching for and securing hard cash, which was not at that particular time in large quantities, being only some $200 to be found. The night previous there was over $700 in the same till. The funds belong to the Post-office, and we are not yet certain whether the Postmaster or the department will be responsible. There is no clue to the guilty parties, and to our knowledge, no suspicion as to who they may be. It is thought they also attempted a break on Trimble's store, but the dog, which keeps shop at night, made a racket, and is thought to have thus saved a further theft.

GLENELG ELECTION.

On Monday next, May 5th, the nomination for Reeve to fill the vacancy will be held at the town hall, Glenelg.

There are various rumors as to who will be candidates for the position. Mr. Thos. Davis, who opposed F. MacRae, Esq., for Reeveship at the last election, will doubtless be to the fore. He has filed the office of Councillor as well as Deputy-Reeve in this township, and has proved himself worthy the confidence of the ratepayers, and should a man from this side of the township fail to take the field, the probabilities are that Mr. Davis will be the successful man.

Mr. Geo. Binnie is a young man of good judgment and fairly posted in municipal matters, and we are informed will be also a candidate.

We will be in a better position in another week to give a forecast.

Navigation Opening.

The City of Owen Sound will leave Collingwood to day for ports on Lake Superior and Port Arthur, and the Campana will leave to-morrow for Port Arthur direct. It is uncertain when the boats will be able to reach Port Arthur, as Thunder Bay is said to be still locked up with ice.—Tuesday's Mail.

Fire in Euphrasia.

OVER $2,500 WORTH OF PROPERTY DISTROYED.

On Tuesday morning last about 2 o'clock a. m. the buildings of Mr. Hugh Abercrombie, of lot 11 con. 1 Euphrasia together with all his stock, comprising of 7 horses, 22 head of cattle, 20 sheep, about 500 bushels of grain, and all his agricultural implements was totally distroyed by fire. No clew as to how the fire originated has been obtained, but is supposed to be work of incendiary. Mr. Abercrombie's loss is estimated over $2,500 as there was no insurance, save $400 on the buildings, in Royal Insurance Company. The scene of the ruins the following morning is said to be terrible, some of the horses appear to have broken from the stall and got into the middle of fire, the sheep were hudled in one corner of their compartment and a valuable bull broke lose and got to the door where he fell in the flames. This has been one of the severest losses of any of our agriculturalists in the County for years.

The Father of the Press.

THE OLDEST NEWSPAPER MAN IN CANADA DIES AT KINGSTON.

KINGSTON, April 28.—This morning Dr. E. G. Barker, city registrar, died at the advanced age of 85 years. He was generally considered the father of the Canadian press. In 1884 he founded the British Whig, and in 1889 began the publication of the Daily British Whig, the first daily in the Dominion. Some twelve years ago he retired from journalistic duties, the paper passing into the control of his grandson. E. J. B. Pense. Last New Year's eve the paper celebrated its 50th anniversary, and the 85th birthday of the veteran editor. The deceased was an energetic worker, a vigouros writer, and one of those early editors who did much towards laying the foundation of our Canadian constitution. His burial occurs tomorrow at two o'clock.

The Law of the Road.

TURN TO THE RIGHT.—The most important law of the road is, that when two persons in vehicles coming from opposite directions are about to meet, each shall reasonably bear to the right of the middle or travelled portion of the road, so that they can pass each other without interference. A traveller is not required to keep on the right side of the road all the time; he can drive where he pleases or where the going is best, so long as he turns to the right when he meets another vehicle. If the middle and usually travelled portion of the road is very muddy, and for this or any other reason persons are travelling along the side of the road, then the one who is on the left side of the road is in duty bound to turn out. Circumstances may arise which would justify a deviation from it, and when they do arise, a traveller cannot stick blindly to the law, and then claim damages if he is injured. In the crowded streets of a metropolis drivers are required to exercise very great care, and when the high degree of care dictates a departure from this law of the road, then it is not only justifiable, but a failure to observe it might cut off one's right to recover damages if he is injured. This turning to the right is just the opposite of that in England, which requires all drivers to turn to the left. The rule of turning in England is based on long honored custom; our rule is established by statute. FOOT PASSENGERS.—All persons have the same right to walk in the highway that they have to drive there, and they have the same right to walk in the middle of the street that they have to walk on the foot-path at the side. When one is walking in the wagon track, he must observe greater care to avoid collision with vehicles, but the fact of his being there is not of itself negligence. It is his duty to turn out for teams, especially if heavily laden, but teamsters have no right to run over him simply because he happned to be in the way. They would be liable for the injury if they did. Foot passengers have the undoubted right to cross the street at any time and place, and persons driving along it must use due care not to run into them, and must hold up to let them get by. The foot passenger must also exercise due care to avoide injury, for if he does not, he can recover no damages if injured. If he sees a team coming at a rapid rate he is not justified in attempting to cross ahead of it, or should he attempt crossing a crowded thoroughfare without first looking carefully both ways. H. A. HAIGH, in American Agriculturist for May.

Sir Colin. — This fine draught stallion, owned by Mr. Robt. Freeborn, is now travelling in the neighborhood of Williamsford, Chatsworth, Walter's Falls, Meaford Road, Flesherton and Markdale. He is a heavy animal, with good bone and robust constitution, and will doubtless make a good season.

The leading merchants of Markdale have agreed unanimously on closing their stores at 7 o'clock sharp every evening, beginning from 1st May to 1st Oct. Farmers and others will kindly take notice of this and try to have their shopping done before seven so that clerks, who have to stand in stores all through the heat of a long Summer day, may have a chance of engaging in some out door exercise and enjoying the fresh air. 190-94

Mr. Mark Armstrong is making valuable improvements on the streets which he is this season opening up. Last week he planted 150 choice young maples, which will add very materially to the appearance of this very handsome and desirable portion of the village. Mr. Armstrong, our esteemed young friend, deserves credit for his efforts to improve and beautify the place, and we hope to see him abundantly rewarded by a continued healthy growth of the town.

On Thursday night last a party of taffy hunters visited a neighboring bush where a gang had been chopping and sawing firewood. The syrup from the days boiling of sap was taken home so that the would-be taffy pullers were disappointed, and in order to have revenge they carried off and did hide two cross-cut saws and several axes, which caused the owners a loss of half a day in finding them. This was a very unmanly way of getting satisfaction for their disappointment.

Mulligan Guards.—Last Thursday evening the Mulligan Guards of Dundalk, paraded the streets in full dress till a late hour, headed by "Captain Catastrophe." "They marched to time and cut a shine" with their drums, cornets, flags, etc., till about 11 o'clock, when the regiment broke up, feeling tired after their evening's sport. "Paddy Miles", the leader, performed his part very efficiently indeed. The following are the list of officers:—Captain Catastrophe, "Paddy Miles"; Sergeant Calamity, D. O. McQuarrie; Color Sergeant Plato, J. S. Graham; Drum Major, Kit Carson, John Robinson; Bugle Major, Denver Dan, J. Gibbons; Corporal, Jesse James, J. Tedford; Drummer, Whalebone Hooker, J. R. Oldfield; Drummer, Lightning Joe, Harry Vodden; Band Major Socrates, Jim Russell; Private Sweet Stuff Smith, Cornett; Grisley Dick, Geo Dean; Black Hawk, T. Glazier; Stick in the Mud, W. Rutledge; Horace Greeley, J. R. McIntyre; Mark Twain, W. Glazier; Artmus Ward, H. H. Middleton; Gillhooly, J. R. Marshall.

A Convenient Pasture.

A pasture close to the farm buildings is a great convenience, and will save much valuable time during the busy season. The work horses may be turned into such a pasture in the evening after they have eaten their ration of hay and grain. It is an easy matter to bring the horses in again in the morning for their feed, before it is time for work. The cows may go to the back feeding ground for the day, and into the front pasture to pass the night. Boys who are tired from hard work through the day, appreciate the convenience of a pasture close by the milking ground. The cows are more contented if kept near the barns at night. The gates and other entrances to this night pasture should be arranged to save all possible steps, both from the horse stable and the milking yard. Some may object to having horses and cows in the same field, but the writer has concluded, after several years' experience, that there is no danger with any ordinary animals. Young stock of all kinds will be safer if kept from the old in a separate pasture. This convenient night pasture should be permanent, and furnish good feeding to the horses and cows throughout the whole season. It therefore needs to be kept in good heart. If naturally rich, the droppings from the animals will keep up the fertility for several years. A man with a manure pick or ballet, should go over the pasture each spring, and loosen and scatter the droppings. The mallet consists of a block of wood a foot long, square at one end and pointed at the other, into which a stout handle is fastened near the middle. A top-dressing of well rotted manure should be given every two or three years, or still better, a light dressing each winter. A hundred pounds of nitrate of soda per acre in early spring, aids greatly in giving a vigorous start to the young grass. If coarse weeds appear, they should be rooted out before they become thoroughly established or ripen any seed. A flowing spring in a central location, is of great value in any pasture, and especially here where cows may drink after being milked, and again early in the morning. It will also save much labor in watering the horses before and after work. If a flowing spring cannot be found, the next best water supply is a well with a wind mill pump.

A pasture properly manured, kept free from weeds, and thickly seeded with a large variety of grasses, may be as permanent and profitable as any field on the farm. The night pasture does not enter into the regular rotation adopted for the other fields. —Dr. B. D. Halsted, in American Agriculturist for May.

Burned at Nottawa.—Yesterday morning at about eleven o'clock, Mrs. Jas. McQuade, of Nottawa, was making soap near the house, when her dress caught fire. Miss McQuade, the eldest daughter, rushed to the rescue, and by heroic exertions succeeded in saving her mother from searious injury—though her own hands and arms were very seriously burnt.—Collingwood. Enterprise.

The special services in the Methodist Church, Owen Sound, have been very successful during the past month. Over 70 new members have been received on trial making in all for the conference year received nearly 200, or sufficient to double the entire membership of the church. Services are suspended for this week, but will be resumed next week.—O. S. Advertiser.

Stabbing Affray.—On Tuesday evening of last week as a young man named John Spencer, with some others, was going along the street, they met a colored man named John Courtney, who made an unprovoked assault on Spencer, plunging a knife into his arm with such force that it went through the arm and came out the other side. It is needless to say that drink had something to do with the assault. Courtney was brought before the Police Magistrate, and as will be seen by the Court news, was sent for nine months to the Central Prison.—O. S. Times.

Fire.—Between nine and ten this forenoon there was great excitement for a short time on it being discovered that the schr. Lady Macdonald, lying in the river, was on fire, and the general rush of our citizens for the docks made a lively scene. The fire originated from some pitch which was being melted on board, boiling over, but fortunately it was extinguished before any great damage was done. Had the fire gained headway, a number of other vessels in the river, as well as the new elevator, would have been in imminent danger. —O. S. Times.

Sad Mishap.—On Tuesday last two children of Mr. Uriah Curtis, a boy and a little girl, aged five years, were playing in the bush on their father's farm on the townline of Bentinck and Brant The little fellow got his sister to hold a stick on a log while he chopped a piece off with an axe, but in the operation he chopped a piece off one of his sister's fingers, and the next one was chopped through the bone. The little girl was brought to Dr. Landerkin, in Hanover, where both fingers were dressed, although a portion of each had to be cut off. The little sufferer bore the operation bravely —Grey Review.

The two-cent postal rate adopted in the United States seems to be working with satisfactory results. While the number of postal cards taking out has considerably decreased the number of letters has increased. The loss to the revenue by the reduction of the postage rate from three cents to two will be small. It is to be hoped that Canadian postal authorities at Ottawa will soon follow the example of their American contemporaries. It is an anomaly that letters from the States are to be carried at the two-cent rate to any office in Canada, whereas Canadian letters require a three-cent stamp.

A great many people get very angry at the newspapers sometimes, and it is curious to note the different ways they take to vent their wrath. One man writes, "stop my paper," and lays down his pen, thinking he has sufficiently punished the editor for the offending article. Another buys a club or a pistol, invades the editor's sanctum and gets kicked down stairs for his trouble. Some tell every one they meet that the paper is in financial difficulties and is bound to suspend publication very soon. They are much surprised when it goes right on extending its circulation and increasing its advertising patronage. When hatred of a newspaper is expressed in any of these ways, the editors can afford to smile, but when the standing forms of type are knocked into pi, the cases emptied in a heap on the floor, and things generally badly broken up, as happened in the office of the Stratford Times the other day, it is time for the townspeople to meet, as they did, and subscribe money for the capture of the criminal and the restocking of the office.—News.

Dancing of the Nautch Girls—The Sacred Drama of Harischandra.

There is no twilight in Ceylon. When the sun sets darkness falls suddenly upon the earth, and the stars shine out as if some hand had turned on the starlight. And it is thick darkness, too; so that an anthropological speculation is born in my mind, that the dark complexions of these people are due to the primitive survival of the night-like. A Shinghalese man is invisible against the night, and the tread of his bare foot is inaudible. The lighter, more visible varieties of their race would have been killed off by invaders and wild beasts, and those who mimicked the night would be passed by. In addition to this the predatory class would be successful in the proportion that, as it is said in the book of Job, they were marked by the night. The Colombo coachman will not drive a step after 6 o'clock unless his lamps are lit, lest he should run over a sleeping native. This darkness lends a special beauty to the bungalows of the rich, which appear illuminated, the rays from their lamps shining through the foliage in a mystical way, especially if they be cocoanut-oil lamps, which give a soft, spiritual light. The most palatial bungalow in Columbia, I should say, is that of Mutu Cumara Swamy, whose hospitality and that of his brothers was extended to me in consideration of my friendship for their uncle, the late Sir Cumara Swamy. As I drove up through the large park of palms, radiant with fire-flies, the bungalow looked like but when I arrived and entered, it was a fairy palace. I feel sadly in need of some new similitudes. I am trying to write without referring to the "Arabian Nights," but it is not easy when I recall the verandahs, porticos, rooms of such a mansion and the entertainment of last evening. The tropical heat was made pleasant by the gentle wind blowing from the neighboring sea through the open doors. It was difficult, as one passed amid the flowering trees and floral festoons, to say just where the garden ended and the verandah began, or even the drawing-room, which had flower-laden trees in each corner, flowers and wreaths everywhere. In front of the chair of honor to which I was conducted, stood a high table, and thereon a silver salver covered with stemless flowers, arranged with artistic skill. From the centre of the salver, which was nearly a yard long, rose several slowly-burning stems, whose incense filled the air with a sweet and subtle perfume. The odors, mingled with the soft light of the cocoa lamps, shed their influence upon seers and scene with a sensuous effect quite indescribable. When our beautiful hostess entered, with her rich Oriental robe, and the turbaned Tamil took his place behind her with large peacock fan, I said—"No doubt, that is Maya, goddess of illusion, who has waved her wand and begun her air-woven mask." But when presently a blonde young lady entered, in unmistakable English evening dress, realism came with her humorous clear eyes. There were but four or five foreigners present, and we had an opportunity of satisfying our curiosity in several things—for instance, chewing a little betel and making our teeth red with it. On the walls were sacred pictures, one of the infant Krishna and his mother, the new-born babe's head haloed with light. One side of the drawing-room was partly open, and from the room beyond we presently heard a slight jingling of silver ornaments, next caught flashes from jewelled hair, and after this the flash of dark eyes glancing into the room. Five Nautch girls entered with five men, singers and musicians. The girls sat in a row on the floor facing us, and the men behind them, the plain snow-white of the latter making a background for the RICH COSTUMES OF THE DANCERS.

A FAIRY PALACE IN THE DISTANCE;

These Nautch costumes, though glowing with color and laden with jewels, were not gaudy, nor even gorgeous; they were somewhat barbaric, but had a certain antiquarian character about them that was very pleasing. In old conventional pictures of goddesses and heroines—Draupadi, Damyanti, Sita—one may see dresses resembling these, with the exception of the silken trousers. These probably are the addition of a more prudish age. The Singhalese Nautch girls are dressed with scrupulous regard to decorum. These are all small of stature, several of them pretty, and the pearls and gold they wear, always excepting the nose-gems, and the silver anklets above their bare feet, well become their dusky beauty. Soon after they had seated themselves on the floor all, men and women, began to sing. It sounded as a chant with grace-notes at the end of each bar, and my host, who sat beside me, told me it was a hymn to Siva. I did not like it much; it impressed my ear as nasal, not to say whining, and decidedly monotonous. Then followed a love-song, and for a few moments it sounded like the same hymn over again; but as I listened more closely—as I tried to detach the accompaniment of tom-tom, pipe, and viol—I perceived that there was more variety and more science in this music than my ear could easily take in. For the first time it occurred to me that part of the fault I found in Oriental music might lie in my ear being not sufficiently cosmopolitan. But at the same time I felt sure that this music was not a product of art in the European sense of art; it was not a thing that aimed at beauty alone; it had ulterior purposes, to move the compassion of a god or a lover, and was a cry wrung one of the struggle for existence. It is a remarkable fact that all the ancient love-songs of India are uttered by women to men. My host, whose studies of such subjects have been careful and extensive, told me that, judging by the ancient love-songs, the love-making used to be entirely on the part of women. These Nautch girls belonged to the Hindu temple, and they sing and dance only these very ancient themes, transmitting them to their children with extreme literalness,

PRECISELY AS THEY RECEIVED THEM.

The great piece of the evening was a long dramatic love-song of extreme antiquity, sung by all the performers, male and female, accompanied by full instrumentation, and danced by the leading Nautch girl, who alone did not sing. Her gestures were very expressive, and I was at times reminded of the French saying: "What can't be said can be sung, and what can't be sung can be danced." The feet had little more to do with the dance than to bear ferward and backward the swaying, or rather undulating, form, while the arms were ever on the move, and the fingers twisted themselves into a thousand variations. None of these hand movements were the same, and each meant something. The first scene pantomimed, so to say, was the first glimpse of the beloved, told in embarrassment, meditation, and then the flinging up of the arms in appeal to the god of love. Then followed the first coquettish attempt to fascinate him—now by coyness, next by a display of charms. Then follows dismay—the beloved makes no sign of requital. The maiden becomes melancholy, weeps; then she becomes passionate, and confesses to him her love. He is still cold, and she is jealous. Finding he loves no other, she asks if he is a man who is thus unmoved by woman's love. He then proposes illicit love; that she refuses with an indignation that turns to sorrow. Then she becomes angry—and when her anger melts the heart of her beloved also melts. Then her finale of joy is danced. Much in this dance was touching, much was exciting, and it was all of absorbing interest; when the girl sat down, breathless, it for the first time occurred to me that she had been dancing fifteen minutes without an instant's pause; and yet the last thing I should have ascribed to it is beauty. It was all too serious for that. It is a strange thing to reflect on the sublime secularism of the fact that such a chant and dance as that just described at times make part of the Hindu temple-service. When David danced before the ark could it have been—but I musn't get too profound. There were other dances, one of the most striking being a dance to the words,

"MOTHER, A SCORPION HAS STUNG ME!"

These words were endlessly repeated in the chant, though in varying tones, while the dancer goes through all the drama of pain, illness, parting, faintness, death. This was skillful, and so were all the dances. Those in which all the Nautch girls danced—especially one in which they fenced with each other—were more beautiful; but it was the more ancient dances, representing love and death, which I found most interesting. After the dances were over I had an unexpected delight in hearing the singing of the closing acts of the great sacred drama of "Harischandra." I first made the acquaintance of this wonderful play, which may fairly be described as the "Passion Play" of India, through a translation by the late Sir Cumara Swamy. It is of epical dignity and pathetic beauty. Harishandra is "The Martyr of Truth." The prologue is in the court of the supreme deity, Indra, where the truthfulness of the great king is affirmed by one and denied by another. The result is a wager. Harischandra is subjected to the most terrible ordeals in order to induce him to tell a lie. He stands by his word at cost of his kingdom, his wife, his child—these and himself becoming slaves. In the end all their prosecutors throw off their disguise and are shown to be gods, and everything is restored. The poem is much the same as that of Job in the Hindu Paurans, where the test is not of Harishandra's veracity, but of his fidelity to his promise of gold for a sacrifice to the gods when he no longer has the gold (his property being destroyed, as Job's was.) This gold he obtains by into slavery. The popular form has humanised, but not exactly raised, the motive. My friend who sat by me translated for me in a low voice every sentence as it was sung, and then I began to appreciate something of the meaning of Hindu music. The singer was a man over 30, with a fine voice—very flexible—and though a slight inclination of the head occasionally was his only gesture, the persons of the drama seemed to live in his tones. There is one part of the drama where the wife of Hariscnandra, Tamavati, finds her only son dead, bitten by a serpent. She says to him: "Why do you not speak to me? What have I done that you do not reply or look on me?" One could hardly refrain from tears when the man sang these words. And again when Harischandra, ordered to be the executioner of his wife (charged with child murder), says: "Tamavati, my wife, lay thy head on the block, thy sweet face turned to the east!" The voice was here most plaintive, and suddenly rang out triumphally when the sword of execution becomes a necklace of pearls on her neck, and the gods pay homage to the inflexible "Martyr of Truth." It is notable that while so many charge these Orientals with being liars, this should be their national drama. It looks as if the Hindu Job were combined with the hero O'aye, whose memorial has been translated by Mr. Alger:

> Otaye, from his earliest youth,
> Was consecrated unto truth,
> And if the universe must die
> Unless Otaye told a lie,
> He would defy the fate's last crash,
> And let all sink in one pale ash,
> Or e'er by any means was wrung
> One drop of poison from his tongue.

As I left my friend's house it occurred to me whether it might not be possible for us to import from the Orient something in the way of an occasional evening entertainment quite as dainty as their now fairly Angelicized curry—some æsthetic dish such as that for which I was indebted to the thoughtful kindness of Mutu Cumara Swamy,—M. D. Conway in Glasgow Herald.

Well Met.

"There," she said, as she raised a window in a Pullman car the other day: "now I can breathe. The air in this car is stifling. Why don't they have better ventilation? If I couldn't sit next to an open window I believe I should die."

Presently a slender female sitting directly back leaned over and asked her if she wouldn't just as lieve close that window now, as the draught was more than she could stand.

"No, madam, I shall not close this window. I could not live with it down. I was just thinking how delightful it was with it open, now you want it shut, but I shall not shut it: so there."

"Then you are a selfish thing, and I shall have to change my seat."

Just then a gentleman sitting close by reached over and said: "Ladies, that window being raised makes no difference, as this car has double windows, and not a breath of air can possibly get through the one that is still down."

Then the one that had raised the window turned to the other, and, with a crushed look on her face, said: "Madam, I beg your pardon, but I think two fools have met at last."

JUST AS SHE TOLD IT.

BY JULIE K. WETHERILL.

What time is it? Lor-rd! we'll have half an hour to wait, and I do hate sitting round in a hotel with nothing to do.

Ain't New Orleans an awfully funny place? It can't hold a candle to Chicago. Some one told us to visit the French quarter; but, my goodness!—its awfully shabby; just awfully shabby; and as for the French Market, you get up at an unearthly early hour in the morning, and the coffee they have's fit to poison you. I think it's your duty to see everything that's to be seen; so I said to the chamber-maid, the other day, "Where are your handsome dwelling-houses?"

"Ah! out Prytania and St. Charles, mum, there's ilegant fine mansions," she said.

So we went, and—would you believe it?—they're all made of wood! Did you ever! Yes; this is a dreadfully queer place. I used to have sort of romantic notions about the South—thought it must be just per-r-fect. I thought, don't you know, you wore white dresses all winter, and sat on piazzas in hammocks, and that the Southern men were all dark, and tall, and very fiery; and the darkies were so funny, and sang, and played on banjos; but, gracious; they behave just like every one else; and as for white dresses, I've never come so near freezing to death in all my life.

Fred would say that's because I never read anything, nor listen to what any one's saying. But that ain't it at all.

You'd just die if you knew Fred. He's the funniest boy. Awfully nice, don't you know, only he will prose so about literature and culture. Oh! he's too funny. Why, when he likes one book by an author, he must rush right off and read all the rest of 'em. He read David Cop'field—did you ever read David Cop'field? Well, I did, and I declare I thought I'd be old and gray before I got through; but I'd promised Fred I'd read it. Well, then he read all of Dickuns. Same way about Thack'ray. He began Vanity Fair, and just went crazy about Thack'ray. Ever read Vanity Fair? Ain't it simply awful? I told Fred I just wouldn't read it, if he never spoke to me again.

Then that Becky Sharp, too. A girl at our school wrote a composition about Becky Sharp. What did she say about her? Lor-r-d! I didn't listen to it. All I know is, it was about Becky Sharp.

Fred ain't a bit like me. Now when I like one book by an author, I never read another, because I think I'd be sure not to like it half so well, and then I'd get to hate the whole lot like poison.

But you mustn't think Fred ain't nice. He's real handsome and fascinating; has big brown eyes and the cutest moustache; only he will be superior, and it's so fatiguing. Now what's the use being superior? Why can't you just be happy and sensible?

I've known Fred for per-r-fect ages. Why, he used to walk to school with me, and carry my books. But that was last year, for I've been out ever so long.

We used to quarrel like cats. One day he said to me, "Marie Cassidy, do you ever intend to be anything but a frivolous butterfly?"

"Frivolous fiddlestick's end!" said I, and I spoke very severely, too. "If you want superiority, just visit mommer seven evenings a week."

Mommer's superior enough, gracious knows. The way she goes in for general information is simply awful.

"Well," said he, "if you are content to remain—"

"Fred Delbert," I said, "am I a griffin or a Cyclops?"

"Why, of course not," he said opening them big eyes of his.

"Well, then I ain't a Cyclops, that's settled, and popper has lots of money—just dead loads of it—so what do I want with superiority? I'm sorry you find me so unattractive. There's De Lancy Witherington, he says my eyes are like bits of heaven on earth, and—"

Fred got so mad he regularly stamped. "Don't quote to me the inane remarks of an idiot," he shouted.

"Anyhow," I said, "he likes me just as I am, and he isn't always treading on my poor little pug."

"I hate pugs," said Fred. "They alwaws look as if they're making faces."

Well, somehow or other we made up again, and I made him kiss Gibi, because he'd said such horrid things about the poor little pet. Gibi's just killing; you ought to see him.

Fred and I were sort of engaged. Not quite, though, because popper said Fred was young, and I was young, and he didn't want to give up his little girl just yet awhile. That made me cry, and feel real badly, because I've never been anything but the bother of his life.

But Fred and I had a serious row once.

You see, there was a girl staying with Mrs. Calvin, in our block; Pamela Stonehenge was her name, and she came from somewhere East. Some people said she was so elegant and charming, and talked about her "olassic outline," but. Lor-r-d! she was so tall and thin, and her nose was miles too long. I don't care what anybody says, it was long.

She was dreadfully profound and high-toned, and Fred began to fly around her a little. I didn't let on I cared a bit, because I wasn't going to set him up, but I just flirted awfully with De Lancy.

It was at Mrs. Jenifer's ball, and De Lancy and I were sitting on the stairs, when I saw Fred and the classic Pamela skipping off to the conservatory. Ain't men too heartless? I was sure he must have something important to say to her, so I told De Lancy I wanted to stroll about and look at the flowers; and of course he agreed, for he was mashed—regularly mashed. I passed as close to Fred and Pamela as I could. They were talking in a low, earnest tone, and I heard something about "a scheme of cosmic philosophy."

Now did you ever! The idea of dragging a girl off into a conservatory to whisper such jaw-breaking things in her ear! I felt sort of relieved, for it's a comfort, after all, to have a lover who's too big a goose to flirt with other girls.

But when I thought it over that night, while I was taking out my hair-pins I began to think there might be more in it than met the eye. I don't know but it was the intellectual way of making love.

I was very cold to him when he brought me chocolate creams. I told him I abominated chocolate, and it was very plain he found it too troublesome to remember my likes and dislikes.

Well, then, in the midst of this, he had to go to St. Louis on business; and while he was away I repented, and began to feel sort of soft about him.

He had written he was pretty sure to be home Tuesday evening. I was sitting by the window, and the gas was turned low, and somehow I felt blue. I could see Mrs. Calvin's house, where that horrid Pamela Stonehenge was staying; and as I was looking two men went up Mrs. Calvin's steps. It was a hateful showery night; but they were laughing and talking, and when they put down their umbrellas I saw something that made me jump.

Fred has an umbrella with the funniest head, an ebony skull with Rhine-stone eyes that flash in the most life-like way, and there that thing was winking at me in the gas light across the street. I was so mad I just cried—regularly howled. To think that Fred would go to see her first of all!

Well, who should walk in bright and early the next morning but Fred himself! He looked pale—with remorse, I thought. But icebergs and polar bears were nothing to me in the way of coldness.

He began, "I wanted to see you the first thing Marie—"

"Indeed?" I interrupted. "I feel quite honored."

He turned very red, and stared at me. Then he said: "What do you mean? What are you talking about?"

"Oh! of course you haven't an idea," I said; and so it went on from bad to worse, until he just got up and remarked, with the most dreadful dignity.

"You seem to be accusing me of some thing; but as you will not do me the justice to explain yourself, I will bid you good-morning and good-by, Miss Cassidy."

Of course I never meant him to get on his dignity, and when I saw him going I had half a mind to run after him, only I was too proud.

Two or three days passed, but still no sign nor sympton of Fred. Mommer was getting ready to go to Chautauqua, and the house was turned upside down, and I was fairly distracted. At last I just wrote him a few lines, telling him I wished to explain something. I waited all that day, and all the next, but no answer came.

Then I got desperate. I just decided life wasn't worth living, and I'd be superior, and go in for sociology and demonology, and all that sort of thing.

So I told mommer I was going to Chautauqua with her, and she said she was glad I had awakened at length to a sense of my own deficiencies; and we started off.

It isn't any fun to travel with mommer. She always declares she's suffocating in the Pullman, and she thinks the train is running off the track every few minutes, and drives the conductors half crazy asking questions. Then she's always dropping her eyeglasses and hand-bag and handkerchief—particularly her handkerchief. I tell her it's like the French exercises, "Ou est le mouchoir de ma mere?" But that makes her hopping mad.

Chautauqua's an awful bore, don't you know—a lot of old drones and mummies going about, and pretending they enjoy it so much. I believe they really hate it, only they think it looks nice to be profound.

And then Palestine Park! Oh, my! how those Eastern people can make such guys of themselves, and dress in bags that havn't any hang, or fit, or anything, I can't imagine. Mommer would drag me about everywhere, to improve my mind, she said. She has a mania for measurements and calculations, and one day she was calculating the dimensions of the Great Pyramid, and I said, "Lor-r-d, mommer! you must have been evolved from a measuring-worm." She didn't like it one bit, but I think she ought to have been glad I knew how to apply my knowledge.

I was so broken-hearted I took up Hebrew, and it 'most blinded me. How people could ever have talked in such a language!

Well, one day I was in the steamboat on the lake, and I was looking over my account book. Popper always makes such a point of my keeping accounts, because he says it teaches me the value of money, but no one ever knew the value of money better than I do. I had Gibi with me, and its awfully expensive boarding with a dog; and then the servants are always so grasping! I declare they're just like those horrid daughters of the horse-leech that said, "Give! give!" though why the daughters were a bit worse than the sons I never could see, only people are always slandering women.

Somehow or other I never can get my accounts to come exactly right. There were four dollars I couldn't account for, so I just put them down to "charity," because "sundries" has such an unbusinesslike look, though, to tell the truth, I'd only given ten cents to an organ-grinder.

I was so hard at work that I never noticed that I'd been taken ever, so far past where I ought to have got out, so I just stepped at the next stopping-place, and waited for another boat to take me back. It was quite a pretty spot, with trees and things, and a sort of cave not far off; and I sat and gazed at the beauties of nature till I was 'most starved. All at once I heard a noise behind me, and I looked around and there was Fred coming out of the cave!

I thought for a moment maybe remorse had driven him to retire from the world and be a hermit. Wouldn't that have been romantic?

I glanced at him very haughtily, but he began right away: "Miss Cassidy—oh, Marie! don't let us make ourselves miserable by keeping this up!"

"Who's miserable?" I enquired. "Speak for yourself, Fred—I mean Mr. Delbert."

A horrid, unfeeling twinkle came into his eye, and he said, "Do you remember Miss Stonehenge?"

"Oh yes," said I, icily. "She has such a long nose!"

"She has it still—"

"Don't just on such a subject, if you please," I said.

"Well," said Fred, "I admit that it is a serious one. The point is that she was married last week to a Professor of Sanskrit."

"I suppose she's refused you," I said; "and you've come to me to be consoled."

Then he said a lot of absurd things I won't repeat; and I told him how I thought he'd gone to see Pamela that evening. It turned out that the poor boy had come back sick with malarial fever, and wasn't able to leave the house; and Ned Parkinson had dropped in and borrowed his umbrella.

"But that doesn't explain your not answering my note," I said.

"You see, when it came I was very sick at my rooms, and there wasn't a soul to do anything for me but an old man with a wig—"

"Well, did his wig prevent you from writing to me?" I asked; or n be very sarcastic when I feel like it.

"Of course not; but I was too sick even to raise my head. As soon as I could stand I rushed around to see you; but you had gone. Dellie Jones told me that you had gone to Chautauqua; so I followed you, and here I am."

"Well," I said, very sternly, "I'll forgive you this time, Fred; but you've treated me very badly. And, Fred, she has got a long nose—hasn't she?"

"Shockingly," he said.

So we were married, and came South for a wedding journey; and—Oh! there's Fred. It's time to start. Ain't he a darling? Do tell me—is my bang all right? Thanks ever so much! By-by.

At the temples of Kroto, Japan, is the great bell cast in 1633. It is 18 feet high, 9 feet in diameter, and 9½ inches thick. Its weight is nearly 74 tons. About 1,500 pounds of gold are said to have been incorporated in the composition. Its tone is magnificent. When struck with the open hand its sound can be heard at a distance of a hundred yards.

In regard to the state of affairs in Egypt the following dispatch from Cairo tells a sad tale:—There are 138 men, women, and children of all ages in the infirmary at Tourah, living like wild beasts in indescribable filth and neglect. Some bad dividends have been lately announced by steam shipping companies, but the Cunard Company has, according to the Pall Mall Gazette, made an exceptionally wretched report. No dividend whatever has been earned for the past year, while 4 per cent. was paid in May last, 3 per cent. in May, 1882, and 6 per cent. in May, 1881. The times are explained to have been generally bad for steam shipping during the past year, as to which there is no sort of doubt, and the lines of shipping running to America have not been the last to feel the want of remunerative freight.

In a recent scientific feuilleton in the Paris Debats, M. Henri Parville quotes a reference to the singular action of oil on waves by Theophylactes, the Byzantine historian of the sixth century. The passage occurs in a dialogue on "various natural questions." The question propounded is, why oil makes the sea calm? and the answer given is to the effect that as the wind is "a subtle and delicate thing," and oil is "adhesive, unctuous, and smoothe," the wind glides over the surface of the water on which oil has been spread, and cannot raise waves. The wind, in fact, slips over the water without being able to obtain a grip, so to speak.

A Parisian correspondent says that the archæological researches on the site of ancient Carthage, conducted by Messrs. Solomon Reinach and Ernest Babelon, have brought to light a number of objects of historical and artistic importance. Conformably to the instructions of the French institute, this scientific mission has been chiefly occupied in determining the relative levels of the Roman and the Punic soil on the site of Carthage. The great accumulation of rubbish and stones which forms the upper layer of the Carthaginian soil renders the work of excavation long and difficult. Five metres deep a series of wells, cisterns, and cellars of the Punic epoch has been discovered.

Cuba is at present passing through a period of extreme commercial depression. One result of this is to increase the dissatisfaction with Spanish rule. Even the wealthy planters who formerly were fierce Spanish partisans, and aided in suppressing that long-continued insurrection which ended only a few years ago, are now somewhat disloyal themselves, and inclined to favor independence or annexation to the United States. They do not want Cuba; and as that is pretty well understood, independence is mostly discussed. The country is ripe for any revolt that may be started. Aguero's attempt, which a few days ago was so insignificant as to be laughed at by the Spanish officials, has already met with such encouragement that it is now undeniably formidable, and there i o telling what may be its outcome.

Terrible fires in the turpentine regions of North Carolina raged for several days, destroying hundreds of thousands of trees, some of the largest turpentine orchards in the State. Several houses were destroyed and a number of families were rendered homeless.

The American Grocer finds that in 1883 [illegible],000 cases of tomatoes were packed in the United States, each containing two dozen cans. The exact figures are 70,645,896 cans. Their value at wholesale was probably $[illegible],000. Maryland puts up about one fifth of the product, and New Jersey over a [illegible]

Among the bills pending in the New Jersey Legislature is one to prohibit the manufacture of dynamite and other explosive compounds, or any dynamite machine, or the component parts thereof intended for the unlawful working of anybody, under a penalty of from $1,000 to $5,000 fine, or imprisonment of from thirty days to five years.

They are having trouble in Texas over a man who has just received two sentences one 5 years' imprisonment and the other to be hanged. They want to hang him now. Some man claims he ought to serve his term first, as that sentence was pronounced prior to the one of hanging. A juror gave as his opinion that "as the prisoner was bound sure loser, he'd better close out with the bank and swing to wunst."

The Lake Superior ore trade is reported in a worse condition than it has been for twelve or fifteen years. Seven out of the twelve mines in the region are idle, those which are running are owned by the largest and wealthiest corporations who are restricting the output. At least one of the mines is of the best quality and is sold at Cleveland for six dollars per ton, which is lower than for many years past. At this price there is only a profit of five cents ...

A bill has been introduced in the United States Senate to provide for the creation of a sericulture bureau which shall constitute a division of the Department of Agriculture and shall embrace in its organization three silk culture stations, to be established as follows: One to be located in the State of Pennsylvania, one in Florida, one in Alabama, one in Iowa and one in California. The bill provides for the appropriation of $50,000 for carrying on the object of the ...

A [illegible] Fargo (Dakota) farmer noticed a single stool of wheat in his oat field, which consisted of twenty-two stalks, headed out. The heads contained 860 grains, of which 760 were planted in 1882, yielding one-fifth of a bushel. Last Spring this wheat was planted and carefully cultivated. The product is seventeen bushels, an increase of eighty bushels, and a yield of fifty-six bushels and thirty-two pounds to the acre. Seventy-six bushels from a single kernel in three years is a good growth.

Elephants for Farm Work.

I am pulling along here very well; have managed to secure several hundred bushels of coffee more than I had estimated, and the work is always pleasant. Value of our crop, about $3,000. Never had the pleasure of working with elephants. Sent off our crop with them this season. I will not intrude myself too much upon their attention. You see I did not feel entitled to the honor of an intimate acquaintance, I treated them with great respect and deference, much the same as a street Arab does a policeman. I can't get over my antipathy to that "trunk." The Malay style of feeding elephants has certainly the merit of simplicity. When the day's work is done they are turned out into the jungle to find their own food; and so they go rambling about, all night, pulling and tearing away at any tree or shrub they fancy. When morning comes the drivers, tracing them by their own approach marks, put the driving hook over their ears and lead them off to work. Elephants seem to graze in a forest quite as contentedly as cattle in a pasture. Their ability to scramble up and down apparently impassable places is wonderful. I never saw any animal before show the intelligence to break a branch off a tree to fan away the flies. They helped themselves to our coffee trees for this purpose.—Letter from India.

Some fruit raisers keep a book in which they register the age and variety of every tree in their orchard, together with any facts in regard to its grafting, productiveness, treatment, etc., which are thought to be desirable.

A CALIFORNIA WELL.

That Supplies Good Drinking Water and Good Fuel at the Same Time.

Cutler Salmon of French Camp, not far from Stockton, Cal., sunk a well with a seven-inch tube to a depth of about 840 feet, and struck a copious stream of excellent water. Desiring to learn whether he could increase the flow by going deeper, and fearing that, should he continue the well the same size, he might injure the quality of the upper strata of water, Mr. Salmon hit on the plan of of sinking a four-inch tube inside the seven-inch one, and thus making what might be called the experimental well four inches in diameter. This inner one he bored to a depth of 1,250 feet, and then came to water again. This lower stream came came to the surface, and, indeed, rose in a tube twenty-two feet above the ground. The last water found was unfit for drinking, and but for an accidental discovery of its wonderful properties might have been considered a nuisance. It was found that there was a large amount of gas in this water from the lower depth. This came bubbling to the surface, making one think of a gigantic soda fountain.

Some one suggested the idea of seeing if the gas would burn. A coal-oil can was put over the top of the tubing, and having a few holes punched in it. an impoverised gas fixture was at hand. Only a match was required to complete the preparations, The match was lighted and applied to a hole in the can, and flames shot up three or four feet in the air and burned steadily. The gas would burn. Mr. Salmon had fire and water coming out of the same hole in the ground. The tube of the outer well, that which was only 480 feet deep and furnished the good water, was tapped and sufficient water for all domestic uses and for the stock &c., was led off in pipes to the house and other localities. A curbing was built arouud the twin wells in such a way that it formed a reservoir for the water from the 1,250-foot level and that portion from above which was not conveyed away in the pipes, All through this water in the reservoir came bubbling up the gas, generated somehow, somewhere down below. When Mr. Salmon next went to Stockton he had a gasometer made with a stop-cock in the top, and this he took home and fastened over his wells. The bottom was beneath the surface of the water in the reservoir, and the gas speedily filled the bell-shaped receiver. The next thing was to attach a gas pipe, and connect his home-made gas machine with the house.

He put a pipe perforated with small holes across his large open fire-place, turned on the gas, applied a match, and the problem of cheap fuel was instantly solved. After that gas pipe was put into the fire box of the kitchen stove, and now the meals are prepared with the new fuel. Mr. Salmon has also used this gas for illuminating, but it does not seem to entirely fiill the bill, although it is a great improvement on a tallow dip. It has been suggested that, as this gas seems to be almost pure hydrogen, it might be carburetted and its illuminating quality improved. The gas throws off a great amount of heat, and, without a doubt, such a well would supply a large number of families with the means of warming their hotses aad preparing their food.

How to Mind a Baby.

First, a man need have one to take care of. It isn't every man that is fortunate enough to have one, and when he does his wife is always wanting to run over to the neighbor's only five minutes, and he has to attend the baby. Sometimes she caresses him. but oftener she says sternly,—

"John, take good care of the child till I come back"

You want to remonstrate, but cannot pluck up courage while that awful female's eye is upon you; so you prudently refrain and merely remark,—

"Don't stay long, dear."

She is scarcely out of sight when the luckless babe opens its eyes, and its mouth also, and emits a yell which causes the cat to bounce out of the door as if something had stung it. You timidly lift the cherub and sing an operatic air; it does not appreciate it, and yells the louder. You try to bribe it with a bit of sugar; not a bit of use, it spits it out. You get wrathy and shake it.

It stops a second, and you venture another, when, good heavens! it sets up such a roar that the passers by look up in astonishment. You feel desperate; your hair stands on end and the perspiration oozes out of every pore as the agonizing thought comes over you, what if the luckless child should have a fit. You try baby talk; but "litty, litty lamb" has no effect—for it stretches as if a red hot poker had been laid upon its spine, and still it yells. You are afraid the neighborhood will be alarmed, and give it your gold watch as a last resource, just in time to save your whiskers; though it throws down a handful of your cherished moustache to take the watch, and you thankfully find an easy chair to rest your aching limbs, when down comes that costly watch on the floor, and the cause of all the trouble breaks into an ear-splitting roar, and you set your teeth and prepare to administer personal chastisement, when in rushes the happy woman known as your wife, snatches the long-suffering child from your willing arms, and sitting down, stills it by magic, while you gaze mouonfully at the remains of your watch and cherished moustache, and, muttering a malediction on babykind in general, and on the image of its father in particular, vow never to take care of a baby again—until the next time.

Every one, rich and poor, takes a dip once a day in a caldron of hot water in Japan. The rich bathe before dinner and at night. The whole household dip in the same water. Precedence is given to visitors, then the elders, followed by the young people according to age, and then the servants. On getting out of the caldron each bather gurgles mouth and throat with cold aromatized water. They then fan each other until they are all dry.

Mr. Mackay had the good taste to refuse the decoration offered to him as a protest against the destruction of one of his works by Mr. Hacker, though the list of subscribers included M. Renan, Alexandre Dumas, Berthelot and Pasteur. "I shall soon be starting for Italy," he wrote. "If people wish to give me a banquet, let it be later, on the occasion of the exhibition of my works, but at present I cannot accept it."

In the Public Garden, Boston, there will be planted this year 500,000 pansies. The first floral display will continue through April, May and June.

HOW SHAKESPEARE WORKED.

The Methods of the Great English Dramatist—Definitions of Genius.

Of one conception of genius (a very low one, in my judgment) Shakespeare's work is totally destructive, says Richard Grant White in the Atlantic for May. Genius has been defined as the ability to take great pains. Genius is rather the ability to conceive and to do, with or without pains, that which is admirable and which is peculiar to the doer. The former definition seems as if it were contrived for the comfort and countenance of that large body of men who regard themselves as undeveloped, or at least possible geniuses,—men who could have written "King Lear" "if they had a mind to do it," and who have been prevented from elaborating that tragedy, or one equal to it, by adverse circumstances. Nevertheless, it has been growing in favor of late; probably because of the daily increasing importance of science, which proceeds by the careful collection and comparison of facts, and which demands that the most daring and imaginative theories shall be advanced by the slow and patient steps of toil and caution. However true this conception of genius may be in science, it is not true in art, in literature, the annals of which are studied with splendid lights, which have been spoken into existence by the creative will, if not by the creative word of omnipotent genius, exercising its native powers almost unconsciously. Of Shakespeare, at least, it is to be said that great pains were no condition of the working of his wonders. On the contrary, the achievement of this genius was always in directly inverse ratio to the height of his aim and the greatness of his endeavor. When he toiled, when he wrought with deliberate effort, when he set up for himself a high standard of attainment, he was comparatively feeble and dull and insignificant, with no fire in his prophecy, no truth in his fable. It was when he was doing his journey-work, with small trouble to himself, with the lowest purpose and the least possible labor either in planning or in finishing, that he was splendid and beautiful and strong, with a splendor, a beauty, and a strength that are beyond the conception of any other man who has left the mark of his hand upon the ages. When he set out to be a poet, to do something that would bear criticism and give him a place in literature, he produced "Venus and Adonis," and "The Rape of Lucrece," which would have been utterly forgotten long ago had they not been his. When, with lower purpose, he undertook only to please "his private friends," he evolved the marvelous mystery of his fascinating sonnets. But, when grinding in his daily mill, he blindly put out his hands, and took for grist almost any old play or old tale the story of which he thought would interest a miscellaneous London audience, he turned out such job work as "Romeo and Juliet," "As You Like It," "Hamlet," "King Lear," "Othello," "Antony and Cleopatra." Nothing is made clearer by a study of his work than that at the times when he wrote those dramas, it was in him to write them in the way in which they were written, and in no other. It was just as easy for him to turn them off as he did as it was for any minor journalist of nowadays to elaborate his little paragraphs.

Dangers of Gambling.

The Canada Presbyterian says:—With some people gambling seems to be an infatuation. In all cases it is a dangerous and a ruinous one. Others try to make it a means of livelihood. As a trade, it would be difficult to find one more disreputable. Rag-picking is an honorable occupation compared with gambling. Professional gamblers are about the worst scoundrels that prey on society. It is no mitigation to say that were there no dishonest simpletons, there would be no pigeon-pluckers. There are degrees of wickedness; the fools who make a habit of gambling are descending rapidly, but the knaves who live by it have little further to fall. In a recent trial in Buffalo several gamblers sought to evade justice by corrupting the members of the Grand Jury. This coming to the Judge's knowledge, they were told that if there was any violation of the law, its penalties would be rigidly enforced. The Judge was in earnest, and the jury felt it. They gave the names of those who approached them, and speedy arrests followed. There is no good reason why an American judge should not be just even though the judiciary is elective.

Lime with a solution of salt and water, and then properly thinned with skim milk from which all the cream has been taken, makes a permanent whitewash for out-door work, and, it is said, renders the wood incombustible. It is an excellent wash for preserving wood, and for all farm purposes.

A Vermont dairyman says a young calf should be fed three times a day. Overfeeding at long intervals, and especially with cold food, kills a good many valuable calves.

The cow stable should be kept neat and clean, or the milk cannot be perfectly pure. The air of a filthy stable will taint milk that is drawn in it; and when the air is foul the cows under such lack of care will be more or less dirty, and some of this filth will find its way into the pail.

Loss.—Burton Bros, timber merchants Barrie, lost a valuable horse in the Beaver river near Cummings Saw Mill on Thursday last.—Thornbury Venture.

All over the land are going into ecstasy ver Dr. King's New Discovery for Consumption. There unlocked for recovery by the timely use of this great life Saving remedy, causes them to go nearly wild in its praise. It is guaranteed to positively cure Severe Caught, Colds, Asthma, Hay Fever, Bronchitis, Hoarseness, Loss of Voice, or any affection of the Throat and Lungs. Trial bottles free at A. Turner, & Co's Drug Store. Large size $1.00 2

Calgarry, April 27.—The heaviest snowstorm of the season occurred on Friday night. Eight inches fell, but it is fast disappearing under a chinook.

THE EFFECTS OF WHISKEY.

The effects of whiskey are always evil, and those who feed upon alcoholic stimulants, vainly endeavoring to cure coughs and consumption, but nurse a viper. Hagyard's Pectoral Balsam is a remedy that is always reliable for all throat bronchial and lung troubles, and never does harm to any one.

River Driving.—Messrs. Flatt & Bradley of Hamilton, and Burton Bros Barrie, timber merchants, have men busily engaged in driving square timber on the Beaver river. Both companies have over 5000 pieces of elm timber in the river, besides a large quantity lying at the station.—Thornbury Venture.

CURE FOR DEAFNESS.

As numerous testimonials will show, there is no more reliable cure for deafness than Hagyard's Yellow Oil. It is also the best remedy for ear ache, sore throat, croup, rheumatism, and for pains and lameness generally. Use externally and internally.

On Saturday morning last a horse and waggon was backed off the Town dock at Collingwood. The driver went in the water first, with the waggon on top of him and the horse afterwards. The boy was going down for the third and last time when he was rescued by spearing his clothes with a pike-pole. The horse was drowned.

IMPORTANT CHANGES.

There are two periods in the life of every female when the system undergoes great changes. First the change from childhood to womanhood; next, that of womanhood to old age. These are the critical changes of life, and the system should be nourished and regulated by that matchless tonic, Burdock Blood Bitters. It is invaluable in all diseases peculiar to females.

A short time ago an Ottawa bookkeeper absconded with his employer's money. He was arrested on the same day in Montreal as he stepped off the train. On Thursday night R. D. Fisher, teller of the Dominion bank at Oshawa disappeared. Friday morning he was arrested in Kingston. The absconding business doesn't seem to pan out very well in Canada.

FRAUDULENT TRANSACTIONS.

There are many frauds perpetrated in medicine, and many advertised remedies worse than useless. Not so with Hagyard's Yellow Oil. It remains as ever the best internal and external medicine for all pain, soreness and injuries with which human flesh is afflicted.

The Army.—The Salvation Army still keeps to its work. An accordeon has been added to the big drum, and the street parades draws almost as large audiences as the indoor performances. The number of "War Crys" sold is reported at 400.—Collingwood Enterprise.

A BLESSING TO ALL MANKIND.

In these times when our Newspapers are flooded with patent medicine advertisements, it is gratifying to know what to procure that will certainly cure you. If you are billious, Blood out of order, Liver inactive or generally debilitated, there is nothing in the world that will cure you so quickly as Electric Bitters. They are a blessing to all mankind, and can be had for only fifty cents a bottle at A. Turner & Co's Drug Store. 2

Car on Fire.—Quite a little sensation occurred on the train on Tuesday morning a few minutes after it left Meaford, when the car was discovered to be on fire. We rushed forward and informed Conductor Pim, who made for the spot after pulling the cord to stop the train. He ordered the hands to get the water tanks, and soon after the train was stopped the fire was subdued by tearing the lining from the ceiling and drenching it with water round the stove-pipe, which had fired the wood to red heat. In a minute more the car would have been in a blaze. Some ladies on board were frightened pretty badly.—Meaford Monitor.

THE SECRET OUT.

The secret of beauty has been at last revealed. Without good health, pure blood and a fair clear skin none can possess good looks. What is more repulsive than pimples, blotches and a sallow or pasty complexion? Burdock Blood Bitters reveal the fact that all can gain pure blood and freedom from the repulsive diseases of the skin that result from impurities.

When a lady sitting for a picture would compose her mouth to a bland and serene character, she should, just upon entering the room, say "Bosom," and keep the expression into which the mouth subsides until the desired effect in the camera is produced. If, on the other hand, she wishes to assume a distinguished and somewhat noble bearing, not suggestive of sweetness, she should say "Brush," the result of which is infallible. If she wishes to make her mouth look small, she must say "Flip," but if the mouth be already too small, and needs enlarging, she must say "Cabbage," If she wishes to look mournful, she must say "Kershnuk," and if resigned, she must forcibly ejaculate "S'cat."

WHAT IN A NAME?

Scrofula is so called from the Latin scrofa, a pig, from the supposition that the disease came from eating swine's flesh. It is often inherited from parents, and leades to abscesses, ulceous sores, debility, king's evil and consumption. The case of the Rev. Wm. Stout, of Wiarton, who suffered 23 years from scrofulous abscesses, is one of the most remarkable on record. Burdock Blood Bitters cured him after the best medical skil had failed.

Markdale Petitioning.—A petition signed by W. A. Brown and thirty three other respectable residents, was sent to the License Commissioners of South Grey, protesting against the issue of another Tavern and Shop license in Markdale. The latter is now likely to be granted and one of the four hotels is sure to get left.—Durham Chronicle.

NEWSPAPER LAW.

Any person who takes a newspaper regularly from the post office, whether directed to his name or another's, or whether he has subscribed or not—is responsible for the payment.

If a person orders his paper discontinued he must pay all arrearages, or the publisher may continue to send it until payment is made, and collect the whole amount, whether the paper is taken out of the office or not.

If Subscribers refuse or neglect to take periodicals or newspapers from the office to which they are directed, they are held responsible until they have settled their bills.

The Courts have decided that refusing to take newspapers and periodicals from the office, or removing and leaving them uncalled for, is PRIMA FACIE evidence of intentional fraud.

JOHN WHITBY,
Assessor.

Mr. Whitby will accept our thanks for the above interesting information which should have appeared last week but was crowded out.

Our Harbor.

For some time past the scene along the docks at the river has been a lively one, with the various steamer and sailing vessels getting ready for the season's trade. Of steamers, we have the Campana, Frances Smith, Magnet, Africa, Enterprise, W. T. Robb, C. A. Pratt, Maytham, Kendrick, and Meteor, all fitted out; besides a considerable number of sailing vessels. They are nearly all ready for sailing now, and most of them will take their departure in a few days.

The season now commencing promises to be a busy one in our harbor, and Owen Sound will be able to boast of a fleet of boats such as is possessed by no other port on the Georgian Bay or Lake Huron. Most prominent amongst them are of course the new steel steamers of the C. P. R.—the Algoma, Capt. Moore; the Arthabasca, Capt. Jas. Foote; and the Alberta, Capt. Anderson. They are expected to arrive in a few days, and will form a line from Owen Sound to Port Arthur, calling at no intervening port. Their days of sailing will be on Tuesdays, Thursdays, and Saturdays, on the arrival of the fast express train from Toronto, and it is expected they will make the trip in much shorter time than has ever been done before. From the enquiries already being made at the office here, it is evident they will do a large passenger business.

As the C. P. R. steamers will call at none of the entervening ports, the fleet of the Owen Sound Steamship Line will supply that service. The Spartan having been rebuilt at Detroit last season, and magnificently fitted up, will be here in the early part of next week to take her place in the line again. Besides her, there will be the Magnet, Frances Smith, Africa and City of Owen Sound. The Spartan and Magnet will form the local line to Sault Ste. Marie, and will leave every Wednesday and Saturday; while the other three will take the Lake Superior route, calling at the North Shore ports, and their days of sailing will be Tuesday and Friday, on the arrival of the night train. The O. S. Steamship Company will have its head office in Parker's Block, in charge of Mr. Parker, Vice President, and Mr. J. M. Chapman, General Agent; whilst Mr. Chisholm, Freight and Passenger Agent, will have an office on Water Street, adjoining Kilbourn and Bishop's.

In addition to these lines, the Campana, Capt. Jno. McNabb, which up to the advent of the C. P. R. steamers has been undoubtedly the finest boat on the lake, will run as last season, leaving every Wednesday. The Atlantic and Pacific, of the G. N. Transit Company, it is expected will also call as usual.

The first boat of the season arrived on Tuesday afternoon, being the Heather Bell from Meaford, with a couple of fishing boats in tow. She came in here for supplies, and left next morning for Club Island. The Harbor Master, with his usual liberality, presented the Captain with a new hat.

The Campana left at noon to-day for Collingwood. The City of Owen Sound made an attempt to start from Collingwood on Tuesday but after being two hours in the ice had to put back. We understand she is once more on her way, and will probably arrive here as we go to press, and go on her way north this evening. The Africa is also loaded, and expects to get off to-night. The Pacific is also expected in this afternoon, on her first trip.—O. S. Times.

Tobacco.

There are some indications that tobacco using, in some of its forms at least, is on the decrease in the United States. An extensive New York wholesale dealer says that cigarette smoking is fast dying out. He estimates that fourteen million less cigarettes were used in the country last year than in '82. Have the people taken to using their tobacco in some other form, or is there a boom in this form of temperance? Tobacco using is not one of the least evil forms of intemperance—though it is certainly not the worst form. Millions of dollars are even yet spent unnecessarily for tobacco in America every year, and the number of men who lose their health, or lose their lives in consequence of this unecessary indulgence is much greater than is generally imagined. The temperance workers ought, as a general thing, to pay more attention to the evils of tobacco using than they do. Not only is it an intemperate habit in itself, but it certainly tends to other habits of intemperance, especilly to producing a crave for strong dring. How seldom it is that a drunkard is not a tobacco user also! Horace Greely was a strong opponent of tobacco using. A memorable saying of his was that he did not believe that every tobacco user was a blackguard, but he never knew a blackguard who did not use tobacco. Horace Greely did not know everything, however.

Bible Stories.

(From the Guelph Herald, April 16th 1884.)

All who have the care or training of children know how fond they are of pictures and how pleased with stories when adapted to their understanding and there are no stories that charm them more than the wonderful ones of the Bible. The stories of Joseph, Moses, David, Daniel, and Josiah the Boy King, and the best of all of Jesus and his deciples, properly illustrated with suitable engravings are the delight of childhood. Never before have these stories been told in such a simple connected and excellent way as in Charles Foster's Bible Stories now being published by the World Publishing Co. of Guelph, Ontario. The Book cotains every story from Genesis to Revelations, illustrated by over 130 engravings so arranged that the story comes on a page opposite the picture illustrating it, thus making it an object teaching work and the many maps are an additional help. No mother with a family of children can afford to be without this book; to her it is of more value than a whole library of other books; it meets and answers the thousand and one questions the children asks her, and teaches them the best of knowledge.

The following speaks for itself: The publishers are authorized to use the names of the following clergymen who cordially recommend the work to those who desire their families to get a clear primary knowledge of the Sacred Scriptures:

Right Rev. Arthur Sweatman, D. D., Lord Bishop of Toronto.

Very Rev. H. J. Grasett, D. D., late Dean of Toronto.

Rev. W. S. Ramsford, B. A., New York, late of St. James' Cathedral, Toronto.

North Shore Lake Superior.

We have been favored with a look through a letter from our respected friend John McDuffie, who holds a situation on the C. P. R. about 250 miles east of Port Arthur, and has spent the winter in that fair north region. They have been closed out from the world to a great extent all winter, having very little information of the doings of the outside world either by newspaper, or private correspondence.

He reports the boys all hearty but somewhat homesick, and many anxiously looking for navigation to open that they may get home. There are several from Markdale, amongst whom are John McIntyre, Robt. and Arthur Mordock, Stanley Reynolds, and Dan McCormick.

Extensive Fire in Shelburne.

LOSS $80,000.

Special dispatch to the Standard.

SHELBURNE, May 5.—A fire broke out yesterday morning about 12,30 in the Royal hotel stables, which spread so rapidly that the whole of the valuable premises known as the Royal block were soon in flames and speedily burnt to the ground. The following are the sufferers:—Whitford, Armstrong hotel, loss about $4,000, insred for 1,500; A. V. Galbraith, jeweller, loss $200; L. Knapp, liquors loss $2,000, no insurence; Lindsay Bros., merchants, goods badly damaged, loss not known, insured for $4,000; J. F. Belfry, druggist loss $4,000, insured for $1,000; Geo. Gillespie, photographer, loss $2,200, insured for $1,000; W. McGilvary, harness-maker, stock and household effects, loss $1,500, insurence for $500; John Jelly, one horse, valued at $130. The owners of the buildings, Messrs. Stewart & Bennett, of Orangeville, are heavy losers, the buildings being valued at $15,000, insured for $7,500. The following insurence companies are among the losers:—City of London Hartford, Royal Phœnix, Gore Mutual, Northern, Commercial Union, and the Waterloo Mutual. It is expected that the block will be rebuilt at once.

THE leading merchants of Markdale have agreed unanimously on closing their stores at 7 o'clock sharp every evening, beginning from 1st May to 1st Oct. Farmers and others will kindly take notice of this and try to have their shopping done before seven so that clerks, who have to stand in stores all through the heat of a long Summer day, may have a chance of engaging in some out door exercise and enjoying the fresh air. 190-94

"Tom Parkes has been caught, and James Woodfall has escaped, I am afraid," said Laurence.

"Then he was there! Tell me all about it," I said anxiously.

"Won't to-morrow do?" pleaded poor Laurence earnestly. "I am afraid, if you get so much excited, your arm will get inflamed, and I ought to be setting off for the doctor now."

"No, no; you couldn't get to Beaconsburgh to-night, you know you couldn't. It wouldn't be safe," said I. "Your bandaging will do quite well until the doctor comes as usual to see Sarah to-morrow morning. Now tell me quickly all about the robbery. Did you find the policemen in the park?" Then suddenly I sprang up from the sofa. "Where is Mr. Rayner? Why was Gordon here instead of him? Oh, Laurence, my head seems to be going round! I don't understand it at all. I am getting quite bewildered. Why was it?"

"Let me tell you about the robbery. You will hear and understand it all in time," said he very gravely and very gently. "I found the policemen in the park and stationed them in the shrubbery, and I stood myself with that man over there and one other, as close as possible to the back entrance of the house; and there we waited until nearly half-past seven, when a man came up through the fog and tapped at the door. One of the maids opened it, by appointment as it turned out, for she was expecting him, though I don't believe the poor girl suspected what his real business was; for it was Tom Parkes. And, when they went inside, Tom went last, and left the door ajar. A few minutes later another man came up and slipped in so quietly, so quickly, that we could hardly have sworn in the dense fog to his going in at all. Then presently Tom and the girl came out. He said good-bye to her without as much delay as she would have liked, walked a few steps away until she had shut the door, then returned and crept alongside the wall of the house until he was under the strong-room window. There were four of our men stationed very close to that, and their chief, who was with me, crept along easily under cover of the fog, which was as thick as ever, to join them. I followed with the other man. In a few minutes we heard a soft whistle from the strong-room window, as we guessed. Tom answered by another, and we saw a third man come up and join Tom. I was so close that I saw a bundle let cautiously down from the window by a cord. Tom handed it to the third man, whom we allowed to walk off with it—followed however by two policemen—in order to watch the further proceedings of the other two thieves. Another bundle was let down, which Tom carried off himself; and then we watched anxiously for the next movement of the man in the house. The strong-room window is about twenty feet from the ground; but the man jumped down and landed on his feet. In an instant five of us were upon him, but, though I think each of us in turn thought we had caught him, he eluded us all and got clear away, and in the fog escaped us. But that man at the window there, who has been so many years in the force, recognized him and identified him as James Woodfall, and I recognised him too."

"You, Laurence! I didn't know you had ever seen him!" I cried.

At that moment the elderly man left the window.

"It's no good, sir, I'm afraid. The one rogue's got off as clear as the other. Can you tell me where Maynard is, miss?"

I got up from the sofa and led the way into the dining-room. Mrs. Rayner was still sitting, pale and upright, with staring gray eyes, Maynard still sleeping. The other detective shook him, and glanced at the wine.

"Drugged," said he shortly.

With a few vigorous shakes he succeeded in rousing Maynard, and, when he began to look around him in a dazed way, the other said sharply—

"Pretty fellow you are to be hoodwinked like that, and drink and sleep quietly under the very roof of one of the greatest scoundrels unhung!"

"Who?" said the other, startled. "Mr. Rayner?"

"Mr. Rayner! Yes, 'Mr. Rayner' to simple folk like you; but to me and every thief-taker that knows his business—the missing forger, James Woodfall!"

CHAPTER XXIX.

As the detective pronounced the name "James Woodfall," I gave a cry that startled them all. Shaken as my trust in Mr. Rayner had already been, the shock seemed in a moment to change the aspect of the whole world to me. I shrank even from Laurence as he would have put his arms round me, and my wild wandering eyes fell upon Mrs. Rayner, who sat with her hands tightly clasped and head bent, listening to the proclamation of the secret which had weighed her down for years. And, as I looked at her, the scales seemed to fall from my eyes, my dull wits to become keener, and part of the mystery of the house on the marsh to grow clear to me.

I sank down upon the floor beside her, and she put her thin wasted arms round my neck and kissed me without a word. And the three men quietly left the room. We did not say much even then.

"Oh, Mrs. Rayner," I whispered, "it is terrible for you!"

"Not so terrible to me," she whispered back wearily. "I have known it for years—almost ever since I married him. But don't talk about it any more," she said, glancing furtively round the room. "He may be in the house at this moment; and they might search and watch for months, but they would never catch him. But he will make us suffer—me—ah, and you too, now! You were so unsuspicious, yet it must have been you who set Laurence Reade upon the track."

"Not of Mr. Rayner. Oh, I never thought of such a thing!" I whispered shuddering.

And I told her all about my suspicions of Tom Parkes, my visit to the Hall, my letter to Laurence, and all I said in it.

"Mr. Reade has shown energy and courage," said she. "But he will suffer for it too. You don't know that man yet. He will never let Laurence marry you. Even if he were in prison, he would manage to prevent it."

Luckily Laurence himself tapped at the door at that moment, for Mrs. Rayner's gloom forebodings were fast increasing the fever of my overwrought mind. He came to say that the constables had returned to the house, having failed in the fog to find any traces of Gordon, or of—of any of the others. He was going to return with them to the Hall, where they would sleep, leaving Maynard to pass the night at the Alders, as his missing host had invited him to do, and a couple of constables to keep watch in turn, though there was nothing less likely than that the—the persons they were in search of would return to the Alders that night. Then he said very gently to poor Mrs. Rayner—

"Will you forgive me for what I have done in all innocence? I had some vague suspicions, the reasons for which I will explain to you presently; but indeed I never thought to bring such a blow as this upon you."

"It is no blow to me," said she, raising her sad eyes to his face. "That man—my husband—would have got rid of me long ago, but that he hated violence and dreaded it. Everything short of that he has tried," she whispered; "and it is not my fault that my wretched life has lingered on in spite of him."

Laurence ground his teeth.

"The wretch!" he said, in a low voice. "But he shall pay for it now. I'll ransack the whole world till we have unearthed him."

"You will never do that," said she calmly. "He dares too much for that. He is no coward to lie hid in a corner," she went on, with a sort of perverse pride in the man for whom every spark of love was long since dead. "He will brave you to your faces and escape you all. But you have done your best. You are a brave man, Mr. Reade. You would help me if you could. Good night."

She shook hands with him, and left the room. He turned to me quickly.

"You must both leave this place," said he. "The long-continued suffering has almost turned that poor lady's brain. But she is safe from that vile wretch now; and you too, oh, my darling, thank Heaven!"

There was a tap at the door, and the voice of the elder detective said—

"Are you ready, sir?"

"All right," said Laurence; and then added, in a voice for me only, "I'm not ready a bit. I should like to stay and comfort you for ever. Take care of your poor little wounded arm. Good night, good night, my darling!"

I heard him leave the house with the constables. Then, exhausted by the events of the day and night, I just managed to crawl up-stairs to my room, and, throwing myself upon the bed without undressing, I fell into a deep sleep which was more like a swoon. In the early morning I woke, feeling stiff and ill, undressed, and got into bed; and when the sun had risen I got up with hot and aching head, and found that my arm was beginning to be very painful.

Haidee and I had breakfast alone, for the cook told me that Mr. Maynard had already started for London; and I was just going to see how Mrs. Rayner was when Doctor Lowe arrived on his daily visit to Sarah. As soon as he saw me he ordered me off to bed, and then, after making him swear secrecy, which did not make much difference, as the story would certainly be all over the neighbourhood and in the London newspapers before long, I let him draw from me an account of the greater part of the events of the previous day. He said very little in comment beyond telling me that he had always mistrusted Mr. Rayner, but that now he admired him; and then, strictly forbidding me to leave my bed until his visit next day, he left me.

Jane came up to me soon after. She had only just come home from Wright's Farm, and was full of curiosity excited to the highest pitch by the vague account that the cook, who was deaf and had not heard much, had given her of the events which had taken place in her absence. I told her that there had been a robbery at the Hall, that the man who had asked to speak to me was a detective, and that he and Mr. Rayner had left the Alders.

My faith in the latter was gone altogether; but my affection for him was gradually coming back again. The fearfully wicked things that he had done I had only heard about; and how could the impression so given out weigh that much stronger one of his constant kindness to me? And to think that it was I who had drawn down justice—for it was justice; I sorrowfully admitted—upon him caused me bitter remorse.

Laurence told me, in one of the little notes he kept leaving for me all day long, that it was expected that Mr. Rayner would brave everything and return to the Alders sooner or later, if only for a flying visit, and that, in consequence, the search of the house which must take place was to be posponed, and the place watched, with as much caution as possible, from the outside. By letting the life at the Alders go on as usual, it was hoped that he might be lured back under the impression that he was not expected to return there. Laurence had telegraphed to my mother to tell her that I was quite safe and the journey put off, in order to allay her fears about me.

Mrs. Rayner brought one of those notes up to me late in the afternoon. In addition to her usual palor she had great black rings round her eyes; and, in answer to my inquiries, she confessed that she had not slept all night.

"I have something to tell you," she whispered in my ear. "Mrs. Saunders drinks, and is not a proper guardian for Sarah. She is afraid of Mr. Rayner; but last night, knowing he was not in the house, she was in nearly as excited a state as her patient, and was very rough with her. Sarah's room is nearly opposite mine, and I opened my door and heard what sounded like a struggle. Maynard, who was in the next room to the dressing-room, either did not hear or did not like to interfere. But now he is gone; and I ought to be used to terrors, but I am afraid;" and she shuddered.

"Surely there is nothing to be afraid of if you lock your door, Mrs. Rayner?"

"I have no key. Will you leave your door open and the door at the foot of the turret staircase? I know you must not leave your bed; but it will be some comfort to know you are within hearing."

I promised; and that night, when Jane came up to my room for the last time, I made her leave the doors open when she went down.

The sense of being on the alert made me wakeful, and two or three times during the night I rose and stood at the top of my staircase, listening. And the third time I did hear something. I heard a faint cry, and presently the soft shutting of a door, then steps in the corridor below, and whispering. I crept half-way down the stairs; the whispering continued. I got to the bottom, and recognised Sarah's voice muttering to herself. I would rather have again faced Gordon with his revolver than this madwoman; but I was so anxious about Mrs. Rayner that, after a few minutes spent in prayer, I ventured out from the doorway, and found Sarah crouched in a corner muttering to herself. The wretched woman started up on seeing me; but, instead of attempting to approach me, she hung back, moving her still bandaged head and her one free hand restlessly, and saying—

"I've done it—I've done it! He'll come back now. I've done what he wanted. He can marry the Christie girl now. It's all right. He'll come back again now."

With terrible fear at my heart, I dashed along the corridor to Mrs. Rayner's room and went straight in. The atmosphere of the room was sickly and stifling. I went up to the bed. Mrs. Rayner was lying with a cloth over her face! I snatched it off. It was steeped in something which I afterwards learnt was chloroform. Thank Heaven, she was alive!—for she was breathing heavily. I rushed to the two windows and flung them wide open, pulled the bell-rope until the house echoed, and moved her arms up and down. The cook and Jane came in, terribly alarmed, in their night gowns. I left them with Mrs. Rayner while I ran down stairs for some brandy.

There was some on the sideboard in the dining-room, I knew; and I was returning with it, and was just outside the dining room door, I caught sight of a man in the gloom at the end of the passage leading from the hall. He had come from Mr. Rayner's study, and disappeared in a moment in the darkness. It was impossible to recognise him; but I could not doubt that it was Mr. Rayner.

Where was he going? Was he going to escape by the back way? Did he know the house was watched? I made a step forward, anxious to warn him: but he had already disappeared, and I dared not follow him.

I crept up-stairs, too much agitated to be of any use any longer; but happily Mrs. Rayner was already recovering, and the brandy-and-water restored her entirely to consciousness. I spent the rest of the night in her room, after I had, with the cook's assistance, persuaded the unhappy lunatic who had done the mischief to return to her own room, where we found, as I had expected, Mrs. Saunders in a stupid, heavy sleep, half in her arm chair and half on the floor. The cook declined to watch in place of her for the remainder of the night, but as a precaution locked the door on the outside and took the key away.

"Now, if Sarah wants to do any more mischief, let her try it on Mrs. Saunders," said she.

I could scarcely approve of this way of settling the difficulty; but happily no harm came of it; and Mrs. Saunders profited by the lesson, and kept pretty sober after that.

This woman, having been sent from town by Mr. Rayner, had taken upon herself in some sort the authority formerly held by Sarah in the household, and she now suggested that Mrs. Rayner had better go back to her old room in the left wing, saying she would take charge of it for her as Sarah had done. The poor lady came up herself to my room, where, having made my arm much worse by my expedition in the night I was lying in bed the whole of the next day.

"Why do you go back if you don't wish to do so, Mrs. Rayner?" I asked.

"I expect it is by Mr. Rayner's orders," she whispered.

And, my strong suspicion that he was in the house acting like a spell upon me, I said no more.

But I was curious to know what was the mystery that hung about that bed-room in the left wing which no one was allowed to enter but Mrs. Rayner, Mr. Rayner, and Sarah; and I resolved that, as soon as I could, I would try to induce Mrs. Rayner to let me go in there.

As I lay thinking of all the strange and horrible events which had filled my life lately, the thought of Mr. Rayner lying concealed in his own house, perhaps hidden in some cellar the existence of which was unknown to every one else, came uppermost in my mind. It was the most dreadful blow I had ever experienced to have my respect and affection for a kind friend turned suddenly into horror of a great criminal. But I would not believe that he was all bad. How could a man who was so kind and sweet-tempered have no redeeming points at all? And it was I, who had never received anything but kindness at his hands, who—innocently indeed—had drawn down this pursuit upon him. There were only two things that I could do now. I could pray for him, as I did most earnestly, that he might repent of what he had done, and become in very truth all that he had seemed to me; and I could perhaps let him know how the thought that it was I who had brought down justice upon him tormented me.

A possible means of communicating with him occurred to me. In spite of the Doctor's prohibition, I sprang out of bed, got my desk, and wrote a note asking his forgiveness, and giving him a full explanation of the way in which, in all innocence, I had written the letter which had led to this pursuit of him. I told him the house was being watched, and was to be searched before long, and begged that, when he had got away, he would find some means of letting me know he was in safety. "I do pray for you every night and morning. I can't forget all your kindness to me, whatever you have done, and I don't wish to do so," I added, as a last thought in a P. S. And then I put on my dressing-gown, and, when I heard nobody about, slipped down by the back staircase to his study, where I put the note, directed simply to "G. Rayner, Esq.," just inside the drawer of his writing-table, and crept guiltily up-stairs again.

Mrs. Manners came to see me that afternoon; Laurence had confided nearly everything to her, and she was much more severe upon Mr. Rayner than I—quite unchristian, I thought, and rather angry with me for not being as bitter as herself against him.

"Don't you know he wanted Sarah to kill his own wife that he might marry you, child, and, when Sarah was taken ill and couldn't do it, he wanted to run away with you?"

"Yes; but, as he was prevented from doing either of those things, it is easier to forgive him. Don't you think I ought to try to forgive him, Mrs. Manners?"

"I don't know, I am sure, child," said she, after a little hesitation. "But I think it ought to require an effort."

Then she told me that, when Laurence had heard that morning through Jane of the night's adventure, he had gone to Doctor Lowe and insisted upon Sarah's removal to the county lunatic asylum that very day; and I never saw the poor creature again.

When Mrs. Manners had left me, and Jane had come up at four o'clock with a cup of tea, I insisted on getting up and being dressed, as I wanted to see Mrs. Rayner, and find out whether she had heard of Sarah's departure. I heard that she had gone to her old room in the left wing, and, having taken the precaution to wrap a shawl round me before entering that long cold passage, I passed through the heavy swing-door, the very sight of which I hated.

I was opposite to the store-room door, when it was softly opened, and, without being able to make any resistance, I was drawn inside by a man's arm. I looked up, expecting to see Mr. Rayner, and was horror-stricken to find myself in the arms of Gordon, the man who had shot me. It was so dark already in the store-room, lighted only by one little high window, that, his back being turned towards it, I could not see his face.

"Don't tremble so," said he—his voice was always hard, but he did not mean to speak unkindly. "I meant to do for you before I left this house; but this has saved you." And he showed me my letter to Mr. Rayner.

"Do you know where he is?" I asked eagerly.

"No, ma'am," said he, in his respectful servant's manner; "but I should say that he is on his way to America by now, where he meant to have taken you."

"Me? America?"

"Yes, ma'am. Miss Haidee was to have left at Liverpool Street Station, and brought back to the Alders."

"But I wouldn't have gone."

"I beg your pardon, ma'am; but I don't think your will would have stood out against James'—Mr. Rayner's. And, if this letter had not shown you to be loyal to him, I would not have left you here alive. I am surprised myself, knowing how set he was upon having your company, that he did not come back and carry you off with him. But I suppose he thought better of it, begging your pardon, ma'am. I may take this opportunity of apologising for having once borrowed a trinket of yours while you were staying at Denham Court. But, as it was one which I myself had had the pleasure of assisting Mr. Rayner to procure from Lord Dalston's, I thought it wisest to pull off the little plate at the back, for fear of its being recognised by Mr. Carruthers, in whose service I was when I was first introduced to Lord Dalston's seat in Derbyshire."

"My pendant!" I cried. "It—it was real then?"

"Yes, ma'am. I had to remonstrate then with Mr. Rayner for his rashness in giving it you; but nothing ever went wrong with him—daring as he is—till you came across his path, ma'am. He was too tender-hearted. If I did not feel sure that he is by this time on the high-road to fresh success in the New World, I would shoot you dead this instant without a moment's compunction."

I shuddered, glancing at his hands, which were slim and small, like those of a man who has never done rough work. I saw that he had got rid of his handcuffs.

"I have nothing to keep me here now, ma'am; so I shall be off to-night; and, if you care to hear how I get on, you will be able to do so by applying to my late master, Mr. Carruthers."

He led me courteously to the door, bowed me out, and shut himself in again, while I went on, trembling and bewildered, towards Mrs. Rayner's room.

I knocked at the door. At first there was no answer. I called her by name, and begged her to let me in. At last I heard her voice close to the other side of the door.

"What do you want, Miss Christie?"

"May I come in, Mrs. Rayner? I have something to tell you."

"I can't let you in. Can't you speak through the door?"

"No, no; I must see you. I have something very important to say about Mr. Rayner," I whispered into the key-hole.

"Is he here?" she faltered.

"No; he has gone to America," I whispered.

She gave a long shuddering sigh, and then said—

"I—I will let you in."

She turned the key slowly, while I trembled with impatience outside the door.

When I found myself inside the room which had been a mystery to me for so long, nothing struck me at first but a sense of cold and darkness. There was only one window, which was barred on the inside; the fog still hung about the place, and the little light there had been all day was fading fast, for it was five o'clock. But, as I stepped forward farther into the room, I drew my breath fast in horror. For I became aware of a smell of damp and decay; I felt that the boards of the floor under the carpet were rotten and yielding to my feet, and I saw that the paper was peeling off the wet and mouldy walls, and that the water was slowly trickling down them.

"Oh, Mrs. Rayner," I cried, aghast, "is this your room—where you sleep?"

"I have slept in it for three years," said she. "If my husband had had his will, it would have been my tomb."

A New Decorative Plant.

The variety of banana called Musa ensete is a remarkable showy and fine plant for giving a tropical effect to the flower garden. The foliage is long, broad, of a bright green color: with the mid-rib large and of a crimson color. To secure a large plant the first season, plant out in very rich soil, and supply with plenty of water. A good supply of liquid manure when the soil is getting exhausted, will keep up its vigor and beauty. It is only on large places that this plant can be seen with best effect, associated with other large plants having ornamental leaves. A clump of bed on a lawn is a relief from the more formal flowers beds so much in fashion at the present time. One finest bedding plants of the future will be found among the massive ornamental leafed plants such as palms, dracæenas, musas, caladiums, and similar kinds.

The massing of colors, and the formation of animals, letters, and other figures, will, no doubt continue to be largely seen in the gardens of those interested in horticulture generally, but I cannot look upon it as being what gardening ought to be. The musa can be wintered in a light cellar or cool greenhouse, but it must be kept pretty dry under such conditions, having only just water enough to keep it from shrevelling up. When started in the spring, water it gradually at first and as the foilage increases, give more water. Do not set out of doors until all danger of frost is past.

PRESIDENTIAL FAVORITES.

Some Interesting Facts Concerning the Men who Stand Closest to the Chief Executive.

Visitors who, from curiosity or business, have called at the White House, must have been impressed by the courteous yet systematic manner with which they were received and escorted through the mansion. The gentlemen whose duty it is to receive all persons coming to the White House are Colonel E. S. Dunmore, Mr. John T. Rickard and Mr. T. F. Pendel, and they have occupied their present positions through the administrations since and even during the war. Mr. Pendel was President Lincoln's body-guard; saw him to his carriage the fatal night on which he visited Ford's theatre, and he has now in his possession the blood-stained coat which Mr. Lincoln wore on that memorable occasion. There is not a public man in America to-day who does not know, and who is not known by these gentlemen, and the reminiscences of public and social life which they can recount would fill a congressional volume. During the weary yet exciting years of the war; through the more peaceful times of Grant's administration; while Hayes held the reins of government, and when Garfield was shot, it was these men who stood in the executive mansion, welcoming the advent of each new administration, bowing at its departure, and receiving both martyrs through its portals.

During that long, hot and never to be forgotten summer when President Garfield lay between "two worlds," the nation became aware of the deadly malarial influence which hung about the White House. But all through that period these three men never deserted their posts for a single day, although each one was suffering intensely. In conversation with the writer, Colonel Densmore said:

"It is impossible to describe the tortures I have undergone. To be compelled to smile and treat the thousands of visitors who come here daily with courtesy when one is in the greatest agony requires a tremendous effort. All that summer I had terrible headaches, heart-burn and a stifling sensation that sometimes took away my breath. My appetite was uncertain and I felt severe pains in the small of my back. I was under the doctor's care with strict instructions not to go out of the house but I remained on duty nevertheless. You would be surprised to know the amount of quinine I took; on some days it was as much as sixteen grains."

"And was Mr. Rickard badly off too?"

"I should think he was. Why time and again we have picked him up and laid him on the mantel, here in the vestibule, he was so used up."

"Yes," exclaimed Mr. Rickard, "I was so weak I could not rise after lying down, without help, and could only walk with the aid of two canes, and then in a stooping position. Oh, we have been in a pretty bad condition here, all of us."

"And yet you are all the embodiment of health," said the writer, as he looked at the three bright and vigorous men before him.

"Oh, yes," said Mr. Rickard, "we have not known what sickness was for more than a year."

"Have you some secret way of overcoming malaria and its attendant horrors?"

"I think we have a most certain way," replied Colonel Densmore, "but it is no secret. You see, about two years ago my wife began to grow blind, and I was alarmed at her condition. She finally became so she could not tell whether a person were white or black at a distance of ten feet. One of her lady friends advised her to try a certain treatment that had done wonders for her, and to make a long story short, she did so and was completely cured. This induced me to try the same means for my own restoration and as soon as I found it was doing me good I recommended it to my associates and we have all been cured right here in the stronghold of malaria and kept in perfect health ever since by means of Warner's Safe Cure. Now I am not a believer in medicines in general, but I do not hesitate to say that I am satisfied I should have died of Bright's disease of the kidneys before this, had it not been for this wonderful remedy. Indeed, I use it as a household medicine and give it to my children whenever they have any ailments."

"Yes," exclaimed Mr. Pendel, "I use it in my family all the while and have found it the most efficient remedy we have ever employed. I know of very many public men who are using it to-day and they all speak well of it."

"I weigh 160 pounds to-day" said Mr. Rickard, "and when my physicians told me over a year ago I could not hope to recover I weighed 122 pounds. Under such influences you cannot wonder that I consider it the best medicine before the American people."

The above statements from these gentlemen need no comments. They are voluntary and outspoken expressions from sources which are the highest in the land. Were there the slightest question regarding their authenticity they would not be made public, but as they furnish such valuable truths for all who are suffering, we unhesitatingly publish them for the good of all.

During the last two or three years the moral condition of Boston has degenerated rapidly. Such is the assertion of the Congregationalist, which specifies that gambling hells, liquor saloons, and other bad resorts have multiplied swiftly, and have carried on their work of corruption and ruin with shameless and increasing boldness.

Some of the English medical journals have already begun to point out the great importance of not over-feeding infants with starchy foods, such as bread, farina gruel, etc., as the warm season approaches. According to authorities like Sir James Paget, such over-feeding is a fruitful cause of the large infant mortality in warm weather. The one article most necessary to the life of the child at all times is water.

The hard fact, recently so often brought to the notice of English scientific societies, that two millions of bodies have been interred during the last twenty-five years within the limits of the London postal circle, has very greatly changed the popular view of cremation. Two years ago three of the scientific papers said that cremation was "unnatural" and "against human feeling," but they now think that self-preservation is the first and strongest of laws.

The Parisians will soon have an opportunity of witnessing a bull fight at a charity fete to be held at the Hippodrome. Frascuelo, the world-renowned toreador, himself will take part in it. If the bull, however, is fiery, he will probably forget this.

In a paper read before Edinburgh Health Society, Dr. Almond referred to the custom of having the head covered out of doors and uncovered within doors as very injurious on account of it making people so sensitive to draughts of air as to cause them to take cold. Boys, he said, who went bareheaded out of doors could stand a greater amount of ventilation in schoolrooms and sleeping rooms than those who wear head coverings.

The Memphis Medical Monthly says that the Missouri Supreme Court has decided that information obtained by a physician from a patient must not be disclosed on the witness stand, where the information was necessary to enable the doctor to prescribe as physician or operate as a surgeon. The court held that it would not do, while the mouth of a physician is closed as to the actual spoken words of the patient, to open it as to knowledge acquired from his diagnosis.

The Polyclinic states that the use of paper towels in cleansing wounds has been found very satisfactory. A new native Indian journal has, according to the Madras Athenæum been started for the express purpose of advocating the remarriage of Indian widows and the reduction of the wedding expenses, which Indian customs renders costly. In a recent number of the new organ we are told seven Hindoo widows announce their re-diness to re-enter the marriage state. In one case the widow is only twelve years of age, and her father is anxious to betroth her to a Bengal gentleman.

In a recent trial on the Thames of an electric launch forty feet long, with a storage battery, a speed of seven knots an hour was attained. The speed of a steam launch, with engine, boiler, water, and coal sufficient for a six hours' run, would have been from one and a half to two miles an hour greater. Comparing the electrical system with steam, the advantages in favor of electricity are entire absence of noise, great cleanliness, and very small room needed for machinery; and when once charged it is ready at a moment's notice.

A few days ago one of the soldiers quartered in the barracks at Naples, having taken offence at some of his comrades for calling him a tinker, waited until bedtime, and, immediately after signal for extinguishing the lights was given, took down his rifle and commenced firing indiscriminately among them. Before he could be secured he had discharged no fewer than 57 shots, killing three men on the spot and wounding eight more, one of whom died soon after being taken to the hospital, while five of the others are reported to be in a hopeless state.

It may be news to some that the religious observance of Good Friday, now so general, is not the continuation of an ancient custom so much as a revival of modern times. In the earlier part of the reign of George III. many church-going folks took no notice of the day; and in his "Bestituta" Sir Egerton Brydges speaks of the "clamor, uproar and rage" with which an order of Archbishop Cornwallis "to observe decently Good Friday" was received by persons of a different way of thinking from his Grace. But the animosity of what Sir Egerton Brydges calls "the Presbyterian newspapers" seem to have been chiefly directed against Porteus, afterward Bishop of London, who was supposed to have been the Primate's adviser in this matter.

The Isle of Man, says the St. James' Gazette, ought to be more correctly styled the Isle of Women; since it is only in the Kingdom of the Manxmen that the claims of women are properly recognized. By way of precedents to the Government which has the Franchise bill in hand, it is pointed out that the last time the Manx Legislature had before it the question of parliamentary reform it dealt with the question of female suffrage as well. In 1881 the House of Keys passed a bill which conferred the same electoral privileges on women as on men. But, enlightened as it is in other respects, Man still groans under an Upper Chamber; and that body refused to pass the bill in its entirety, and only allowed a £4 ownership qualification to give the vote to women. However, even this is something.

Lately in a Roman court a handsome young man of 26 and his wife, 17, were charged with theft. He had been cook and she housemaid in an Irish gentleman's family. A robbery having occurred, the young couple were suspected and imprisoned. When brought before the bench both burst into tears. As soon as they could be calmed, the young man, as usual, was asked his name, and, covering his face, he replied that he was Count Riccardo Strozzi, a legitimate descendant of one of the most illustrious families in Italy. The wife is also of a very good family. They had fallen in love with each other and run away, travelling about in disguise in order not to be recognised. At last being penniless, they entered the above family as servants. Fortunately their innocence was proved clear at last. The coincidence of their flight with the day of the robbery was thoroughly explained, and they were set at liberty amid the cheers of the whole court.

Mr. Spurgeon.

Mr. Spurgeon stands head and shoulders above all the Nonconformist preachers. Somebody once expressed a regret that the great Baptist minister was not a member of the Establishment, to which the late Bishop of Winchester answered by quoting a portion of the tenth commandment. But Mr. Spurgeon was much more aggressive in those days than he is now; he has softened much of late years, and churchmen can go to hear him without fear of being offended. On the days when he preaches his Tabernacle holds a multitude. It is a huge hall, and to see gallery upon gallery crowded with eager faces—some 6,000—all turned towards the Pastor whose voice has the power of troubling men to the depths of their hearts, is a stirring sight. Mr. Spurgeon's is not a high class congregation, and the preacher knows that its understanding can best be opened by metaphors and parables borrowed from the customs of the retail trade, and with similes taken from the colloquialisms of the streets. Laughter is not forbidden at the Tabernacle, and the congregation often breaks into titters, but the merriment is always directed against some piece of hypocrisy which the preacher has exposed and it does one good to hear it. He says: "You are always for giving God short measure, just as if He had not made the pint pot." "You don't expect the Queen to carry your letters for nothing, but when you are posting a letter heavenward you won't trouble to stick a little bit of Christian faith onto the right-hand corner of the envelope, and you won't put a correct address on either, and then you wonder the letter isn't delivered, so that you don't get your remittance next post." "You trust Mr. Jones to pay you your wages regularly, and you say he is a good master, but you don't think God can be trusted like Mr. Jones; you won't serve Him because you don't believe in the pay." "You have heard of the man who diminished his dose of food every day to see on how little he could live, and many of you have got to the half-biscuit dose." These whimsicalities, always effective, constitute but the foam of Mr. Spurgeon's oratory; the torrent which casts them up is broad, deep, and of overwhelming power. Mr. Spurgeon is among preachers as Mr. Bright among Parliamentary orators. All desire to criticise vanishes, every faculty is subdued into admiration, when he has concluded a sermon with a burst of his truly inspired eloquence, leaving the whole of his congregation amazed and the vast majority of its members anxious or hopeful, but in any case roused as if they had seen the heavens open. We are compelled to add that Mr. Spurgeon has in the Baptist communion no co-minister wielding a tenth of his power, and that those who, having gone to the Tabernacle to hear him, have to listen to some other man, will be disappointed in more ways than one.

An Anecdote of Jenny Lind.

As an illustration of the constant anxiety of artists concerning their powers, Mrs. Reeves tells how one famous prima donna refused to sit down at all on a day when she was to sing: "No, she would walk about the room, talking, perhaps, singing perhaps, sometimes even busy with her needle and thread, but never sitting down the livelong day until the performance was over." "Why, I remember well enough how one day, on the morning of a performance, Jenny Lind (Mme. Goldschmidt), Mr. Reeves, Mr. Otto Goldschmidt, and myself were in the room and through the morning Jenny Lind and my husband were never still, passing one past the other, with music in hand, singing and practicing, and intent on the work before them. "Why, Jenny," said Mr. Goldschmidt, "you must have sung these songs many times; surely there is no need for all this." But the remonstrance was in vain. "You are a fine musician," said Mme. Goldschmidt, in her quiet, decisive manner to her husband, "but Mr. Reeves and I are singers, and we know what is best for us. Leave us alone." Suppose you had called to see Jenny Lind on a day when she was singing. She would probably come into the room with a bundle of music in her hand, put it on a chair and sit down on it; talk away pleasantly enough for a few minutes, become abstracted, rise, take up the music, turn to a passage in one of the pieces, and hum it over. Having satisfied herself of the correctness, she would replace it and sit down again as calmly as possible and resume the conversation at the point it was left off."

HOUSEHOLD HINTS.

Coal should be sprinkled as it is put into the cellar, to avoid as much dirt as possible.

The wash boiler should always be carefully dried, and if there is the least tendency to rust rub the inside with a little lard.

A famous lawyer used to say that a woman who could boil potatoes and melt butter well was a good cook, and he never required any other proof of her capabilities.

Take a vessel that will hold exactly 100 pound of pure water, and fill it with pure milk of average quality, and the weight will be found to be about 103 pounds. In other words the milk is three per cent heavier than water.

Tepid water with a little borax dissolved in it is good to wash colored table linen in. Nice tablecloths and napkins should not be allowed to become really much soiled, so that they will require vigorous rubbing with soap or in hot water.

The bride's veil originated in the Anglo-Saxon custom of performing the marriage ceremony under a square piece of cloth, held at each corner by a tall man, over the bridegroom and bride, to conceal her bluches. The veil was not used at the marriage of widows.

Twenty five years ago people would have thought a woman crazy if she had pinned Japanese fans on her walls, or filled vases with cat's tails and grasses, or set ginger jars in places of honor. But by this time we have found out that artistic possibilities lurk in reeds and weeds, in the marsh and the fen, and that the simplest articles may be replete with beauty.

Inexpensive but pleasing lavender water is made by mixing the following ingredients together:—Three ounces of the essence of bergamot, six drachms of the tincture of musk, one drachm of the oil of cloves, four drachms of the English oil of lavender, twelve ounces of rose water, and seven and one-half pints of alcohol. Of course a smaller quantity can be made if desired, preserving these proportions.

To clean painted woodwork provide a plate with some of the best whiting to be had, and have ready some clean warm water and a piece of flannel, which dip into the water and squeeze nearly dry; then take as much whiting as will adhere to it; apply it to the painted surface, when a little rubbing will instantly remove any dirt of grease. After which wash the part with clean water, rubbing it dry with soft chamois.

If you wish to improve upon the usual method of smothering beefsteake with onions, try this:—Cut one quart of onions in very small bits, not over an inch long, and as thin as a sharp knife will cut them. Let them lie in cold water with a good sprinkling of salt in it for half an hour. Drain them well, and fry them in a deep frying pan, with a good deal of very hot lard in it. They will cook immediately, and be crisp and excellent.

Early Days of Tobacco.

Tobacco was introduced into Europe from the Province of Tabaca in St. Domingo in 1559, by a Spanish Gentleman, named Hernandez de Toledo, who brought a small quantity into Spain and Portugal. From thence, by means of the French Ambassador at Lisbon, Jean Nicot from whom it derived its name of Nicotia, (whence we have the word nicotine), it found its way to Paris, where it was used in the form of powder by Catharine de Medici. Tobacco then came under the patronage of the Cardinal Santa Croce, the Pope's nuncio, who returning from his embassy at the Spanish and Portuguese courts, carried the plant to his own country, and thus acquired a fame little inferior to that which, at another period, he had won by piously bringing a portion of the real cross from the Holy Land. Both in France and the Papal States it was at once received with general enthusiam, in the shape of snuff; but it was some time after the use of tobacco as snuff that the practice is generally supposed to have been introduced into England by Sir Walter Raleigh; but Camden says, in his "Elizabeth," that Sir Francis Drake and his companions, on their return from Virginia in 1585, were "the first, as far as he knew, who introduced the Indian plant, called the Tabacca or Nicotia, into England, having been taught by the Indians to use it as a remedy against indigestion. And from the time of their return," says he, "it immediately began to grow into very general use, and to bear a high price; a great many persons some from luxury, and others for their health, being wont to draw in the stroog smelling smoke with insatiable greediness through an earthenware tube, and then to stuff it forth again through their nostrils; so that tabacca-taverns (tabernæ tabaccanæ) are now as generally kept in all our towns, as wine-houses or beer-houses."

Its principal opponents were the priests, the physicians, and the sovereign princes; by the former its use was declared sinful; and, 1684, Pope Urban VIII. published a bull, excommunicating all persons found guilty of taking snuff when in church. This bull was renewed in 1690, by Pope Innocent; and, about twenty-nine years afterwards, the Sultan Amurath IV. made smoking a capital offence. For a long time smoking was forbidden in Russia, under pain of having the nose cut off; and in some parts of Switzerland, it was likewise made a subject of public prosecution—the police regulations of the Canton of Berne, in 1661, placing the prohibition of smooking in the list of the Ten Commandments, immediately under that against adultery.

A Quick Passage.

The quickest time yet recorded as having been made by an ocean steamer is that made by the steamer Oregon from Queenstown to New York. The time was six days, ten hours and thirty seconds. This is quick work, but no doubt the time will come when the trip from shore to shore will be made in three or four days. Speed is not as important a consideration as safety, but in these days, when the object is to do everything in the shortest time possible, speed counts for a great deal with business men. There is another class with whom speed is a consideration, namely, those who are subjected to sea-sickness. If the ocean voyage could be made in three or four days the number of people who would cross the ocean would be largely increased. No doubt before long ocean steamers will adopt electricity as their motive power and then people will be carried across the ocean with a rush.

ZEBEHR PASHA.

Visit to the Ex-Governor of the Soudan—His Remarkable Life and Adventures.

The Story of His Career as Told by Himself.

On the outskirts of Cairo to the west, between a branch of the Mahmoudieh canal and the railway line, stands the house allotted by government to the ex-dictator of the Soudan. Everything about it bears marks of poverty. In the garden a small kiosk with a couple of divans, and floored with gaudy carpeting, serves as a reception-room by day. In one corner of the yard stands a Saioy mare tethered to the wall. At sunset she is brought inside the house, and her night-stable is at the foot of the stairs leading up to the siwan where Zebehr Pasha and his visitors dine and smoke their nargbilehs, with now and then a cup of strong tea highly spiced with Nubian herbs. When I arrived yesterday, writes a correspondent of the London Standard, the pasha was atteuding the funeral rites at the Ismailieh palace, and the honors of the house were done by his relative Abdullah and the Sheik Senoussi, of Morocco, who is a rich merchant, now settled in Alexandria. He has travelled many a time in Europe, and visited every capital and town of importance on the continent. Pleased to have someone to corroborate his tales, which would probably have been otherwise only half believed, he launched into descriptions of all the Frank wonders he had seen, his descriptions of our underground railways being especially amusing. He himself was careful never to travel except on a Sunday, because the traffic was diminished and there was then less danger of a collision between the trains which kept revolving between the stations every moment like wild spirits. On the arrival of Zebehr Pasha the other visitors hushed their talk into attentive silence, only rarely interposing a remark. During a frugal dinner, a l'Arabe, when it fell to me, as guest, to dip first into the dish and pick out a choice piece from each to hand to the host, not much was said. After dinner, however, I put a few leading questions, and the pasha, when fairly launched, spoke on incessantly for hours. In mere anecdote his manner was excited, and he kept snapping his fingers to accentuate surprise or scorn; but on more serious topics he weighed his words carefully, and his manner and voice reminded me curiously of Arabi.

Nothing could be more interesting than this conversation, or monologue, in the queer little room lighted by two candles, and obscured by the smoke of cigarettes and narghilehs. Grouped around were sheiks from the far Soudan, a bey or two, and the servants; while the central figure in a chair fitted in well with the surroundings. Tall and spare, almost to attenuation, with sparkling eyes, mobile lips, and the beautiful hands of his race, the pasha was dressed in civil black, with a scarlet and white-striped shawl thrown round his shoulders. Every look and gesture bespoke the commander, and as the ready words and proud laugh dropped from him, one could scarcely withhold admiration from the fallen general as he told the story of his past.

"I need not go over my record. It is probably well known to you, as it is to the world in general. No man now living in Egypt has rendered such services to his country as I did, and you see the reward. I do not complain, for it is the common fate to fail. I care nothing for the loss of wealth and lands and family in comparison with my honor. That was traduced years ago; but, thank God, in words, at least, it has been restored to me. It was Gordon's accusations which cut my heart out, but now he has confessed that he was wrong, which shows his true nobility. What amends it was in his power to make he has made. He has telegraphed for me to take his place, and to the government that the confiscation of my property was unjust, and it should be restored to me. He requested that some money should be given me at once, and I have been paid £5,000. That is a mere nothing, but the fault is not his. Do you know what the government owe me? Alone in the conquest of Darfour I spent some £300,000 or £400,000. Last year you must have seen four thousand hundred-weight of ivory advertised for sale by the government. It was all, or almost all, mine, besides shiploads of feathers, gold, and silver, and cattle and furniture. They did not leave more than the bare divans in my home, not even a carpet nor a glass. Enough of this, however. About my son this is what happened: Jealous intriguers at Cairo had poisoned the ear of the khedive against me, and I was summoned to the capital. Conscious of no wrong. I came at once, leaving my family and my property in full confidence. Here I found Gordon. I protested my innocence, and at Kas-en-Nil I offered to go up with him and prove to him the falseness of the accusations made against me. He refused, but told me to write to my son Suleiman a letter, ordering him to submit to Gordon. I wrote to him, telling him that Gordon went up as the representative of the khedive and myself; that he was to treat him as a lord and a father; to serve him as a slave, if he wished, and to obey his slightest word. I gave Gordon a letter of this sort also. I accompanied him to the station, and my last words to him were to commend my young son of 16 years to his protection, and to beg him to watch over him as he would over his own son. How could I fear anything after that? When Gordon arrived my son met him, and Gordon treated him with great kindness, and gave him a rank, and made him governor of Bahr Gazai, and my son made him presents—180 tons of ivory, and other things. Shortly afterwards a servant of my house, one Edriss, fled away and went to Gordon, and told him that Suleiman was treacherous at heart and working against him. Gordon at once believed this scoundrel, and named him governor in the place of my son without asking further. Suleiman, when he heard this, sent to Gordon nine Ulema, to assure him of his respect and loyalty. Directly they arrived Gordon shot them all. Two more were sent, and they were also immediately shot. I can not understand this treatment of embassadors. Suleiman then said he would go himself to Gordon, and started with twelve hundred followers for Dara, where he believed Gordon was. At six hours' distance from Dara he heard Gordon was at Khartoum. He turned to go thither and met Gessi, with 150 soldiers. Gessi summoned him to surrender. He protested against being treated as an enemy. Gessi replied that he was Gordon's representative, and Suleiman had better show the loyalty he professed by coming with him. Suleiman said that if Gessi would give him his solemn word that the charges against him should be properly sifted he would at once surrender and abide by the sentence. This was the greater proof of his loyalty, as he and his men so far outnumbered Gessi that had he wished he could easily have taken Gessi prisoner. Gessi, however, promised. Accordingly, Suleiman ordered his escort to lay down their arms, and then for six or seven days Gessi and he were friends, eating at the same table and living in each other's company. On the tenth day, however, Gessi called Suleiman and others of his family who were with him to come to him. They came to him and found him sitting under a great tree. In five minutes he had shot them all. I do not believe Gordon ever gave him the order to do such an act, for Gordon is a strangely merciful man. He can not speak our language, and so is often apt to get wrong impressions, but I do not think he would have shot my son without hearing him. However, that is a thing of the past. I have forgiven him, as we all hope to be forgiven. Gessi died at Suez afterward, and God will judge between him and me at the last day. I am very much afraid for Gordon now. If he loses his life it will be the fault of your policy in attacking the rebels at Suakim. The news has now passed from mouth to mouth through the length and breadth of Soudan, that the English are coming with fire and sword to destroy the Arabs. Of what use is it that Gordon proclaims peace whilst you carry on war? I think I could have settled the whole question at Suakim without firing a shot. I know all these people, and they know me. I would have gone to Osman Digma and soon have persuaded him to cease war, as I shall go to Obeid to the Mahdi as a friend if I am sent now to Khartoum. I can not approve of the price set on Digma's head. If he were a murderer hiding in a mountain cave you might do it; but it is not a worthy way for a great nation like England to treat an enemy who is still at the head of an army. When I made war on Darfour I lost hardly any lives, but they were just as stubborn foes as these. And when, after six days' running fight, when we were being perpetually attacked by the enemy, I reduced Hasb Allah, brother of the sultan, and leader of his army, to submission, how did I treat him? I myself went on foot to meet him; I helped him off his horse and led him to my tent. I never sat down in his presence, and served him at table, and washed his hands and feet, though he was my prisoner. So I brought him down to Cairo, and delivered him over to Ismail Pasha. That is how I would treat an enemy always. Kindness and soft words go farther than bullets and lances. I do not know how the idea has gone abroad that I am a slave-dealer. My people serve me gladly for the love they bear me. Let anyone go into my country and ask if Zebehr ever unjustly oppressed or killed a man, woman, or child. God is my witness, and I swear to you most solemnly that the charge laid against me is a false one. And is England afraid of a broken man like me? Can she not order me to put down slavery, and am I not forced to obey her commands? Am I a fool, if England sent me up, to go against her bequests? I am a soldier, and under authority, and the order given me, by God's permission, I will carry out to the last letter, as I have always done. And as for the pacification of the country, so confident am I of my people's love, that I will go up alone among them, returning joyfully to my dear home and I shall be received everywhere with the kisses of peace."

"I was down the river ivory-hunting, and heard some elephants trumpeting. On going in the direction of their voices, suddenly my boy Mahmoud and I came upon one of the largest crocodiles I have ever seen, basking asleep in the sunlight. Motioning my follower to hand me my heavy elephant gun. I was stealthily creeping on him when I saw the underwood moving to the right, and a fine lion appeared, also evidently stalking the crocodile. I was so astonished that I hardly knew what to do, so merely stood still as a statue to watch. Unless I had seen it myself I should never have believed what followed, which you can credit or not as you please. Crawling along on his belly, the lion drew to within about two meters of the crocodile, and then gathering himself up, came with a tremendous spring on to the nape of the crocodile's neck, where his skin is soft for an inch or two in the crease. Fixing teeth and claws, he wrenched and tore at his hold, whilst the crocodile was fairly pinned, and could not open his jaws in spite of the most frantic efforts. In less than five minutes the struggle was over. I then gave a great shout, and the lion when he saw us moved growling back to the edge of the forest. My boy wanted me to shoot him, but I was so pleased at the way he had killed the crocodile that I thought he had earned his feast, so after cutting off parts of the crocodile we left him to the lion, and next morning more than half of his underside had been eaten."

Many such stories of adventure and traits of life in the wild Soudan passed the time quickly, and it was past midnight before I left. Without being able to vouch for the truth of the conversation above related, I merely repeat it much as it was spoken, losing, however, all the vigor of the native Arabic, and eloquent voice and gesture. No one, however, after speaking to Zebehr for long could fail to perceive his strength of character, and, in adding my own to the general opinion in Cairo, that we shall make a great mistake if we fail to avail ourselves of the keen tool ready to our hand, I only pay a forced tribute to the fascination of my yesterday's host.

Another Wise One.

All of the wisdom of asses does not appear to have died with Balaam's time if the following statement is to be credited:—"Dr. William A. Hammond says in the Youth's Companion that while stationed at Fort Webster, in what is now Arizona, he started down the canyon on a very fine and large mule. The beast stopped abruptly, and signified that he would not budge a step. Spurs were dug into his flanks to no purpose. There he stood as firm as a rock. Hammond pulled him around and galloped back to the fort. Next morning it was ascertained that at a point scarcely a hundred yards in advance of where the mule had gained his victory some Apache Indians had ambushed the road, and but for the brute's keen nose and ears and firmness in resisting an obstinate man short work would have been made of both."

MARKDALE MAY. 8, 1884.

GLENELG ELECTION.

Very little interest was taken in the nomination to fill ths vacancy in Glenelg on Monday last. There were scarcely twenty ratepayers present. Messrs. Thos. Davis and Geo. Binnie were nominated, and the expense of an election is now certain.

Next Monday voting will take place at the various polling sub-divisions, and the probabilities are that a very small vote will be polled owing to the busy season of the year with farmers.

Mr. Davis will doubtless be elected as he is well and favorably known throughout the township, having served both as Councillor and Deputy-Reeve with satisfaction to the ratepayers.

QUEEN'S BIRTH-DAY CELEBRATION.

The 24th of May is drawing near, and preparations are being made for a grand celebration in Markdale. The agricultural grounds are in good condition this year, the sports committee having spent about $100 on it last year in fitting up the course and other improvements.

There will be no necessity for any material outlay in this respect this year, so that the prizes offered for the various games will doubtless be enlarged and increased in number.

We expect next week to be in a position to speak more definitely.

The committee are determined, however, to make this the best that has ever been in this place.

The ladies of the Methodist church will hold their annual bazaar and concert, for which preparations are now being made, and altogether we may look for a "Big day."

SIDEWALKS.

The question of building sidewalks and keeping the same in repair is one of the principal items of expense in villages about the size of Markdale, and it is very desirable to have all public streets supplied with a good safe walk.

As the season of year for building and repairing such is now at hand, a few suggestions as to the plan of laying down walks may not be out of place.

In the first place we would say, when hemlock lumber is used for planking (as is most generally in this district) the walk should be elevated sufficiently for a free circulation of air under, as it is well known that hemlock will rot out in half the time that it will wear out. If cedar sleepers are used with pine plank, the walk would be just as well close to the ground.

Again we would say, never lay a sixt-foot sidewalk on two sleepers. This has been a great mistake during the past in this village. When only two sleepers are used there is such a length of board over the end that when a plank becomes loose it is exceedingly unsafe to travel over such places, while a cow or other animal stepping on the end of a plank is sure to either loosen or break the plank. Every six foot sidewalk should have three sleepers, with the outside ones very close to the ends of the plank. Experience has taught us that a walk built the latter way will last double the time of the former. A four-foot walk does not require three sleepers, but they should be placed not more than two inches from the end of the plank. Great care should be observed in having a good substantial foundation, both as to material used, and in having it made firm.

The plan of electing fresh hands as village police each year is not likely to result in much improvement in this very important duty, the building of sidewalks, because experience is indispensible in the proper and satisfactory discharging of such duty, consequently one who has experience and proved himself efficient in this respect, if such there are, should be re-elected or otherwise his services secured for the management of this particular business.

OUR PUBLIC DEBT.

The fact that over eighty million dollars was voted out of the Dominion treasury during the late session of the House of Commons tends to very serious feelings on the part of nearly every intelligent Canadian. Of course every dollar of it is just so much added to our previous debt, which was already very large It may be that the Canadian Pacific loan will be repaid, but taking the most hopeful view of that matter there still remains the balance of fifty millions of additional burdens. The object for which every sum was voted may be very commendable and very worthy, but still there must be a very uncomfortable feeling with every one at the very thought of how readily the people's representatives voted every sum through.

One very serious feature of the whole case is that the people of Canada must, of necessity, be soon a heavier taxed people than our neighbors south of us. In the United States the heavy national debt, largely incurred during the war, is being paid off very rapidly. Last year their debt was reduced by something like fourteen millions and this year will see another great reduction. In view of these facts the burden of national taxation on the people is being largely reduced, and the reductions in the near future will probably be still greater. There is reason to fear that our own national obligations are becoming so great that it will not be possible to lighten up much here and still keep faith with our creditors. Let it once become clearly understood that the chances are of much lighter taxation in the United States than in Canada and the result will tell pretty seriously on our prospects from immigration. Of course it is not possible to keep such facts concealed. They are known to the world and our sharp witted rivals across the line will be sure to make the most of them whenever it may suit their purpose to do so.

A good deal is said about it being an "unpatriotic" thing to lay bare our own position whenever it may appear unfavorable. Such a plea is simply nonsensical. The extent of the public obligations of any country cannot be kept a secret. Possibly some such feeling has been the reason why many have kept silent before, and the very fact that the public mind has not been as fully awakened by the PRESS as it should have been to the dangers of increased public debt may have been one of the reasons why so many M. P.'s voted with such little hestitation as they did.

Of course the amounts voted out during the recent session are now past recalling. There is little use of bewailing the objects for which the sums were voted. The present danger to guard against is that further increase of debt may be proposed, and may be assented to with just as little hesitation by the majority in the House of Commons. In view of such a danger there is the great importance of impressing the men in whose hands our destinies are placed that no further obligations will be tolerated, unless to provide for some downright necessity. The tax payers and property holders of Canada,—the men with real stakes in the interests of the country—should feel sufficiently the gravity of their situation to refuse to be led by any party cry and swayed by any partizan feelings. It is all very well to aid public enterprises and deyelop the country's resources by large public works, but it is a serious thing to pile on a public dept to such gigantic proportions that its burden may crush heavily on the prospects of the present and the coming generation.—Truth.

Immigrant Sleeping Cars.—The wretched accommodation provided for immigrants will soon cease to be a reproach to at least on Canadian railways. Five immigrant sleeping coaches manufactured expressly for the C. P. R. at Cobourg reached the Union Station this morning en route for the Port Arthur division of the Canada Pacific, where they will in future run. The coaches, which are equipped with Westinghouse air brakes, are 56 feet long, exclusive of the platform. Comfortable day and sleeping accommodation is provided for 86 adult passengers, who will be supplied with warm water by a neat cotriyance attached to the two heaters in each. The interior of each coach is richly finished in polished Canadian woods, and the seats are of a pattern specially designed by General Manager Van Horne for the immigrant traffic. The windows are double, and the arrangements for ventilation are complete. As soon as the Ontario & Quebec opens fifteen of these cars will be placed on the line between Quebec, Montreal, and Owen Sound.—O. S. Advertiser.

The Wiartion Echo proprietor, runs an extensive Stationery and fancy goods store, in connection with the printing business.

The Chesley Enterprise has greatly improved under its new proprietor Mr. Wm. Kay. We wish you success brother.

Flesherton.

From our own correspondent.

A large crowd of people attended the monthly fair held in this place last Monday. The show of stock on the market was small, and but a limited number changed hands. On the evening of the same day a scene which seldom disgraces the public streets of Flesherton was witnessed opposite the Flesherton Hotel. While two men named Hargrave and Jamieson were having some pugilistic exercises. The noise made, the language used and the brandishing of a cane, by an old gentleman, whose locks are blossoming, made him look as if reason had left its throne and he had become a fit subject for a dwelling whose doors are well guarded.

Mr. Thos. Duncan sold his household effects by auction last Monday. He is breaking up house keeping here, his family going to Toronto, while he still continues his business as tailor here himself.

Messrs. Strain & Large have got the contract of doing the plaster work on Mr. M. Richardson's new block. The work on the building is being rapidly pushed forward.

Mr. D. E. Wright, late of Markdale, but an old resident of this place, has again taken up his abode in our midst.

In the absence of the pastor, Rev. Mr. Wilson, the Rev. Mr. Chisholm, of Maxwell, occupied his pulpit here last Sabbath.

Owen Sound.

From a correspondent.

The new elevator has now reached its utmost Leight, 130 ft., and from the roof on a fine day a splendid view of Owen Sound and surrounding country can be had.

Last week the harbor and wharfs presented a busy scene, a large number of men being employed in fitting up and loading the vessels in the harbor, and in the works of the C. P. R. around the station. There are still four or five schooners and as many small steam crafts in the river; but all the passenger steamers have started on their various routes. The Frances Smith sailed for Collingwood this morning. The Spartan is expected from Detroit to-morrow, and the big steel steamers of the C. P. R. are expected from Port Colborne in the beginning of next week. On Saturday two tugs brought a dredge and scows from Collingwood, and dredging is now going on at the station wharf so as to give the new boats plenty of water.

The Salvation Army meetings seem to loose none of their interest. Every night the barracks are crowded, and from the number of army uniforms and badges seen on the street, their number must be getting very large.

On Thursday evening as the City of Owen Sound was coming up the harbor, one of the passengers, an English emigrant fell into the hold and was almost instantly killed.

On Thursday evening Samuel Johnson, an old resident of Keppel, while returning from Owen Sound, fell from his waggon and received fatal injuries from which he died the next day. Whiskey is supposed to have been the cause of his fall.

On Friday morning Robert Wylie, Sr., for many years a town constable, was found lying on one of the bridges where it is supposed he had fallen in a fit sometime during the night. He never recovered consciousness and died on Friday evening.

Priceville.

Our businessmen report trade satisfactory.

Change in Business.—Dr. Ghent has sold his General Store to Mr. Latimore of Clyde, and will shortly remove to Toronto.

E. F. Hickson M. D. of Toronto is coming to practice in this place, he comes with a creditable reputation and will doubtless have a large practice We wish him success in our midst.

Mr. J. W. Dennis, our popular hotel keeper has erected a fine shed with hall above which will be complete shortly; the young people are looking forward and expecting a "trip on the light fantastic toe" when the hall is complete.

Mr Conkey is doing a lively trade among the lasts, having four men employed shoemaking.

Mr. Thos. Welsh, an old resident of Artemesia, died last Saturday and was buried at the Catholic Church Glenelg on Monday. The funeral was largely attended.

Serious Runaway Accident.—While Mr. E. Page was driving Mrs. Page and Mrs. John McGhee into Shelburne on Thursday last, the horses became frightened at a cow near the C. M. church above Horning's Mills and ran away. To make matters worse the nigh line broke, the result being that Mr. Page pulled the horses to the right against a bank, where a wheel of the waggon was wrenched off, and the occupants thrown out, both ladies being seriously injured. Mrs. Page, who is an elderly person, was badly shaken up and rendered unconscious. It is feared that the shock to her system may prove fatal. Mrs. McGhee had an elbow dislocated, and an arm fractured. She was also insensible for a while. Mr. Page escaped uninjured. The ladies were carried into the church, where they fainted a second time. They were removed home and attended to by Dr. Norton and Dr. Lawrence. The horses, it may be added, turned their faces round and continued their runaway career until they reached home.—Shelburne Free Press.

THE CLERK'S TALE.

It was a suffocating evening early in August, and I left my work at the foreign office to plod home to dinner through the dusty parks in the worst spirits. The wrongs of a junior clerk whose long-promised holiday had just been snatched away from him on the eve of fulfillment were boiling in me; I felt that they cried out for justice in a free country. Everything was prepared for this month's leave which was to have begun next day. My father had taken a house on one of the most attractive slopes above Grasmere, and the family residence in Lancaster Gate already bore that denuded and forlorn appearance which precedes a general domestic flight. We had breakfasted gayly, picnic fashion, with old and inadequate implements; we had prophesied with unabated cheerfulness, dining with still fewer of the appliances of civilization, the family plate being not lost but gone before to Grasmere. The house was in as uncomfortable a state as much packing and putting away could make it, for my people intended to spend between two and three months at "Emerald Bank." Here was I, with my wings outspread for flight, caught back and doomed to remain in solitude, with dismantled rooms and furniture lurking under dust sheets for company, and all because an unstable senior clerk suddenly declared that his health demanded instant change of air, instead of waiting to take his holiday later on, as he had intended. The tale of woe is not complete, for Olga Fielding, to whom I had been but three weeks betrothed, was coming with us to Grasmere, and we had promised ourselves a month of unalloyed bliss among the Westmoreland hills before she was obliged to go back to her filial duties in Copenhagen. There, as her mother was dead, she had to preside over all matters, social and domestic, in her father's extensive establishment.

Gracious heavens! what an ill-arranged planet is this, and what a disorganized constitution was that miserable T.'s, to choose such a moment to be out of repair! The first week of September Olga would have to follow her father, who had returned to Copenhagen, and we should meet no more till after Christmas. Was it not enough to make a worm blaspheme? and the bang I gave the hall door on entering covered a vigorous expression of feeling.

Well, the news was broken to a dismayed and sympathetic circle. Olga, who had hitherto professed to consider me as likely to prove a very small addition to the natural features of the lake scenery, was quite overcome; there was some small balm in that. My mother was very unhappy. Even Barbara, the youngest of the family, and strong in the scorn of seventeen for matters of sentiment, forebore to jibe, and gave utterance to violent exclamations of regret, coupled with equally violent abuse of vague persons unknown.

My father, after the first natural shock of disgust, endeavored to console me with unpalatable philosophy and the cool light of reason, remedies which always seem an insult offered to affliction, when applied to one's own case. "It's hard on you, Harry, my boy, no doubt, and I'm sorry for it," he said, in that sobering tone which strikes a chill through the greatest moments of excitement, and makes all previous emotion appear annoyingly ridiculous: "but now that you have entered on the serious duties of life, you can't learn too soon that work and not play is the object of a man's life. I'm not at all sure that——" "Ah! how hor-r-r-rible," broke in the soft voice of my betrothed, with the pretty careful intonation, and long-drawn ripple of the r which she had inherited from her Danish mother. "Dear Mr. Richardson, do not let us be reasonable to-night. What is the use of being British subjects if we may not have a great grumble? No, that poor boy is very badly treated, and it is all fr-r-i-rightful!" And my lady, unclasping her eloquent hands, approached the iron gray parent for whom our affection had always been largely tempered with respect, and, flinging one arm tightly round his neck, laid her pretty head with its crown of bronze ripples confidingly on his robust black-cloth shoulder.

My father no doubt experienced a slight shock; he was unaccustomed to such audacious treatment from the young. But he liked it, he certainly liked it; and planting a parental salute on the breezy coils he left us to pour out our mutual woe at leisure.

That night I found it impossible to sleep. The atmosphere was so close and oppressive there seemed to be no air to breathe, and a dull feeling of undefined apprehension haunted me persistently through long hours of wakefulness and miserable brief dozes, refusing to be charmed by the voice of reason. Haggard, unrefreshed, and still conscious of the same vague foreboding clawing at my heart, I left that bed of suffering at an unwonted hour in the morning, and descended to the library, now a desert of bare boards, dotted about with precipitous islands under dusty cloths. Here a pipe, that unfailing comforter of dejected manhood, restored some balance to my disordered mind, but I still felt very depressed, and was preparing to go forth and seek the restorative dear to every unhinged Briton, an early swim, when the door opened, and to my amazement Olga glided into the room, pale and drooping, with dark lines under her brown eyes. After mutual exclamations and greetings, I demanded the reason of her wan and dejected appearance. She did not answer at first, but turned her face away and tormented the braid on her travelling dress in silence. "Well, if you will know, dear friend," she said at last, with a charming gesture of resignation, "I think your old foreign office has bewitched me. No, it's that unhappy T., who has the evil eye, for I have a feeling as if some danger was hanging over you, and I could not sleep all night for it. Oh Harry!" continued the impetuous damsel, suddenly throwing aside the dignity with which she was wont to treat me, now that the worst was out, "come away with us to-day. Never mind a thousand governments and clerkships! I will not go without you. Something dreadful will happen; you feel it too. You look fit for the hangman yourself." It took me a long while to restore Olga to calmness. I laughed at her prognostications and was careful to betray no similar feelings on my own part. She was more or less convinced at last of the utter ruin it would be to my future prospects to desert my post, and we were reasonably resigned if not cheered by breakfast time.

Well, I saw them all off from Euston Station, and trailed away, a hapless victim, to my dreary task in the exalted gloom of Whitehall. That day seemed interminable; yet there was nothing to look forward to at the end of it, and still with the previous night's weight on my spirits, I started on my way back to the howling wilderness in Lancaster Gate.

Near Hyde Park corner, where very few carriages remained to make hay of the dust, I was startled from melancholy reflection by a great bang on the back. Turning sharply round I confronted that athlete Jack Oliver, who had been at the same college as myself, and whom I had not met since we took our respective degrees at Oxford three years before. At Oriel I had been wont to write Jack down an ass, because his invariably boisterous spirits and perpetual athletics were at times a perfect nuisance, but in my present forlorn condition his jolly face and infectious laugh were a real Godsend.

We dined at the club together, and afterward went to the theatre, then smoked a pipe or two in company at Oliver's lodgings, so that it was toward 1 o'clock when I left him to return to Lancaster Gate. Walking along under the park railings, the trees made occasionally ghostly rustlings overhead; the air was very still and heavy in expectation of a travelling thunder-storm. The tall shut up houses facing the park looked as forbidding as so many mausoleums in the moonlight, and only the foot of a stray wayfarer here and there, or the welcome rattle of an occasional hansom, broke the strange stillness.

All the uncomfortable feelings of the last twenty-four hours, temporarily thrust back by Oliver's cheerful company, returned with overwhelming force. Indignant at being so befooled by what I had declared to myself must be a dyspeptic imagination (though my acquaintance with dyspepsia was happily of the slightest), I argued fiercely with my own folly; but all in vain, that indescribable dead weight of apprehension still crushed my spirits. The senseless sense of unseen danger grew stronger at every yard. I was ready to roar for very disquietude of spirit. "Confound it all," I almost shouted, "this is beyond a joke! What an abject piece of imbecility, for a man who has always flattered himself on having too much reason to fall a prey to any superstitious delusions whatever! I must be ill; if things go on like this tomorrow I shall give in, and go to old Barrows (the family Æsculapius) to be put together again."

Meanwhile every step forward appeared to grow more and more difficult. A sudden sound of footsteps close behind most unaccountably paralyzed my powers of locomotion, and filled me with a horrible dread. This was monstrous; with a kind of groan of disgust and misery over my own decrepitude, I resolutely turned round and waited till the steps reached me.

Merciful heavens! What was this that came up, brushed past me, and went on? My brain reeled, and cold perspiration broke out on my forehead, for, frantic as it may sound, it was myself that I saw go by. My exact image and counterpart came toward me, looked me full in the face with cold, indifferent eyes, differing from mine only in their expression at the moment, and passed on, brushing me with the sleeve of a light overcoat exactly like the one I wore. I noted with despairing recognition on the creature's left hand, which was raised, holding the unbuttoned flap of his coat in front of him (a favorite trick of mine), the very ring Olga had given me a week ago, and which was also on my finger at that moment.

For one long minute I stood stupified with horror, the next I darted forward after that terribly familiar form, which crossed the street and went on toward our door. I felt sure that I must be mad, or in the clutches of some hideous nightmare. Oh! for some power to shake it off and awake. But no! the area railings had a firm and chilly reality when I touched them. My footsteps and those others sounded all too solidly on the deserted pavement. I even caught myself deliriously smiling at a peculiar trick of walking in the thing in front, with which Barbara had often taunted me. It was an extraordinary opportunity of seeing oneself as others see one, but what mortal could have availed himself of it under such circumstances?

I staggered on behind him, unable to diminish the twenty yards or so that separated us. Would he stop at No 204? The suspense was almost intolerable. He did. He disappeared through the door, though the only surviving latch-key was in my hand. When I reached the door it was shut, and bore no signs of any unusual treatment. I could not go in; I could not follow into the house, and run the risk of meeting of that on the dark stairs. A horror unspeakable had taken possession of my senses; I turned and fled, and spent uncounted hours in walking about the silent streets and squares, unconscious of the lapse of time.

The early sunshine aroused and cheered my scattered wits. Gradually the sounds of common life awakening brought back my reasoning faculties; the discordant cry of that bird of dawn, the early sweep, was as music in my ears, and seemed to make the dreadful night fade into remoteness and unreality.

I made my way back to Lancaster Gate, footsore and exhausted. The milkman was driving merrily up and down; when I reached our doorsteps, it seemed a year since I had last ascended them. I rushed up to my room; it was of course, empty, the bed untouched. But on the pillow and turned-down sheet, exactly where my head and shoulders would have been in the natural course of things, lay the ruins of a large bust, the Hermes, which had been wont to stand on the bracket over the head of the bed. This bracket my mother had frequently entreated me to replace by a firmer support; it had given away at last under the ponderous weight of the bust, which, striking against the iron rail of the bed, had broken into the two or three murderous portions that reposed on the pillow and sheet, the bracket only having chosen to glance off on the floor. Had I been there Hermes must certainly have crushed my skull.

Thrilled with fresh emotion, but too exhausted then to meditate long over the event, I went slowly down to the dining-room, and fell asleep on the sofa. The old charwoman, who appeared later with my breakfast, told me she had been startled by a loud crash in the night, soon after the clock struck 1, but having been only half awake at the time she concluded that it was the thunder of my boots being thrown out to await the morning's cleaning. She was now, however, much excited about it, and disposed to revel in a tragedy. I told her I had found the statue fallen on my bed, and that, as it took three men to move it in a general way, I had been obliged to content myself with the sofa. The brief and matter-of-fact tone of my explanations failed to quell her exclamations of wonder and amazement, and she was not to be debarred from the pleasure of gloating over all the details of the tragedy which had been averted.

Since that night all has gone well with us. My blessed chief at the foreign office found means to let me go in a day or two, and our time at Grasmere was all that we had expected it to be. After Christmas, to our great joy, Mr. Fielding gave up his house at Copenhagen, and came to live in London. Olga and I were married next summer, and we have never again been disturbed by presentiments, apparitions, or any other subjects worthy to exercise the industry of the Society for Psychical Research.

Suakim and its Surroundings.

Suakim—the word is spelt in a variety of ways—is not only one of the most important towns of Nubia, but the chief port of the Soudan and of the whole western coast of the Red Sea. It came into the possession of Egypt in 1855 by cession or purchase from Turkey—along with Massowah and one or two other towns and the districts around them—and now appears to be regarded by the British Government and every one else as an integral part of the Egyptian dominions. Similar subjection of Suakim to Egypt existed in very remote times. The town proper lies on a small island about eight miles and three quarters in diameter—almost as long as the little bay in which it is placed, a mere tongue of water separating it from the mainland.

The chief articles of export are cotton, gum arabic, cattle, hides, butter, tamarinds, senna leaves and ivory. The imports consists of cotton goods, iron, wood, carpets, weapons, steel, and fancy wares. Berber in the east and Kassala in the south are the great centres for all the caravan traffic of Suakim, which is also the port on the one side for the whole Soudan—an inland country as large as India—and on the other side of Arabia. Hence it is much visited by the Mahommedan pilgrims to Mecca, their port of Jeddah occupying a corresponding position on the Arabian to that which Suakim does on the African coast. Twenty years ago from three to four thousand slaves per annum were shipped from here to Jeddah, and though this monstrous traffic has been much crippled of late years by the Egyptian Government, out of regard for English feeling, it is to be feared that it is not yet extinct. In ancient times, the whole of what we now call the Suakim seaboard—extending northwards along the coast as far as a line drawn from the first cataract, and southwards as far even as Bab-el-Mandeb—was known as the Troglodyte country. The Troglodytes, as the name implies, dwelt in caves, were by occupation herdsmen, and often uncililized and wretched in the extreme. A graphic picture of the hard life of another Troglodyte people, dwelling in the rocky fastnesses east of Jordan, is preserved for us in the thirtieth chapter of the book of Job. "For want and famine," it says, "they are solitary; fleeing into the wilderness in former time desolate and waste. Who cut up mallows by the bushes, and juniper roots for their meat. They were driven forth of men (who cried after them as after a thief), to dwell in the cliffs of the valleys, in caves of the earth, and in the rocks.—Chambers' Journal.

The Hot Water Mania.

In dealing with physical ills which mankind is heir to, as in everything else, particular remedies, outside of those prescribed by regular physicians, have their season. Just now it is said to be hot water; and it is so much in vogue that the Medical News calls it the "hot water mania." People are taking hot water for every sort of disease. There are doubtless thousands of dyspeptics who devote themselves several times a day to the irritation of their stomachs by the use of hot water as a beverage. If people must be dosing, it is fair to assume that hot water, if its purity is assured, is a more innocent remedy than many which are indulged in. It is certainly a remedy at the hand for which those must be thankful who are either poor in purse or reside a distance from physician and drug store. But there may be such a thing as too much hot water, as there is of many things which have more character. And this is what the Medical News asserts. It says that the physical effect of hot water taken into the stomach is to wash out that organ and prepare it for better work, but he warns those who are after health in hot water that too much hot water injures instead of helps. Moreover, it should be taken either before the process of digestion is begun, or after it is completed. That is, the person who is seeking health by that remedy cannot devote his days to the drinking of hot water. It is fair to assume that, like other remedies, the water cure will have its day, and the ailing public will turn to the remedy then held to be the popular one. May it be as simple, harmless, and above all as cheap as hot water.

FASHION NOTES.

Few pokes will be worn.

Most bonnets are stringless.

Owl feather fans are fashionable.

The favorite red is coquelicot or wild poppy.

Glace silks are effectively trimmed with velvet.

Gold and silver gossamer-like tissue appear among millinery materials.

Few walking or visiting costumes are composed of woollen stuff only.

Bustles as big as a small balloon deform the female form divine this spring.

Lawn tennis and archery will be the pet outdoor sports at Newport this season.

Slate gray and copper color combine admirably in brocades and in millinery.

Stiff and angular hats have almost entirely superseded the picturesque pokes and Danichefs.

The fashionable colors for ostrich feather fans are pale pink, shaded gray, buttercup yellow and white.

Gray and black, with silver braid decorations, are the admired combination for velvet dresses for dowagers.

Frise velvet grenadine is the favorite fabric for mantles and parts of summer evening toilets of ceremony.

Bonnets or hats entirely covered with black, jet-beaded net and trimmed with ostrich tips, take precedence of all other beaded net chapeaux.

AGRICULTURAL.

The Family Melon Patch.

In the growing of melons for the private garden, quality most necessarily outrank all other considerations. Next to this importance are earliness and productiveness. Like the repeaters at the polls, it is desirable that melons should come early and often. Owing to the influence of soils on the different varities it may be necessary to do some experimenting before we can hit upon the best kind for our own ground. Weight and keeping qualities are secondary matters in the family garden, and it should be borne in mind that quality in the melon does not improve as the size increases. I believe that a good plan for the private garden is to select some choice variety, and then grow only the one kind. In this way the grower can save his own seed each year, and know that it is of first quality. The readiness with which varieties intermix makes it questionable whether they will be kept pure if one attempts to grow different sorts. It is not certain that different varities will not "mix" if planted less than 100 yards apart, and if planted even at that distance there is no certainty about the matter; but if there is only one variety on the place, we know we can keep it pure, and also that we may improve it by careful selection.

While the melon does not require the amount of manure that is used in growing the cabbage or the onion, still next to a light warm soil, heavy fortilizing is one of the most important things—always bearing in mind that the manure should be well rotted. Proper cultivation in the family melon-patch has a double interest; it is necessary in order to attain the best results; and then there is so much more enjoyment connected with it. There is more satisfaction in ten hills thoroughly cared for than in 100 improperly planted and then left to shift for themselves. Then, whether the patch be large or small, let it be properly tended. If you have suitable manure at hand, broadcast it liberally and plough under. Then where you are to put each hill dig a hole as though you were setting a post. Fill this up with a mixture of soil and well-rolled, fine manure. If the patch is to be irrigated, it should be elevated above the surrounding surface as the loose soil will settle when flooded. Put the hills eight feet apart, and after the plants have passed all danger of frosts and insects thin to one vine. This will enable you to see how many melons each plant produces, and to save seed from those only which show the most productiveness as well as early maturity.

This year I had 100 hill of the Hackensack planted by themselves. The average for the patch was only four to the hill while one hill ripened 10 good sized melons, though they were very late. The melons from different hills varied greatly in size and also in markings. The quantity was variable, and the flesh ranged in color all the way from the deep green of the nutmeg to a pale yellow. Of course, in saving seed, it makes a great difference which type of melon is selected, if it is to be cultivated year after year. Especially with the watermelon it is desirable to select for greater productiveness. By planting 100 hills with a single vine in a place, one will be surprised to see how some of the vines can put in all the summer, and produce so little fruit.—Rural New Yorker.

"Fighting Weeds."

We meet frequently with this heading to paragraphs in exchanges. It conveys a wrong lesson, as commonly used. Simple and quiet extermination is better If weeds are allowed to get a foot in height, a warfare is then begun and carried on to an indefinite length of time, and the weeds often come off victorious. The usual cause of this failure is in attempting to cultivate too much land with a small force. The result is an enormous growth of weeds, a choking and diminution of the crop, and a supply of noxious seeds to fill the soil and last years. The weeds get entire possession in this way and the crops have an unequal chance until another ploughing checks them temporarily.

The remedy is a well arranged plan for going over the ground once a week, in all hoed crops, sweeping the surface, killing all weeds before they come up. All this work is more than paid for in the increasing growth of the crops by their continued stirring providing the right tools are employed. Take the corn crop for instance. The plough and the harrow will prepare a clean mellow bed of earth before planting. If the field is inverted sod, it may be reduced to a state of fine pulverization with the Acme harrow, or with a disc harrow, the finish being given with any smoothing harrow. By planting the seed an inch and a half or two inches deep, in the shallow furrow made by the marker, a fine slant-tooth harrow may be passed over both before and after the plants are up without injury to them. The operation may be continued once a week until the corn is a foot high. Some of the plants may be bent over but they will be erect again in a day or two. After this a shallow cultivator may be run between the rows till the corn is as high as a horse's back. This work, properly performed, will leave the field as clean as the floor—the small slant teeth killing the sprouting seed in the row among the plants as well as over the whole surface; and the subsequent cultivating keeping the spaces clean between the rows. We have never seen cleaner fields than such as were treated in this way and the cost of this labor, first and last, was less than the old hand-hoeing.

But it must not be forgotten that the attempt will be a failure if the necessary work is intermitted and the weeds get a start. It is indispensably necessary to keep them constantly under the surface. There must be no "fighting," but surpression and extermination.

The potato crop may be treated in the same way until the plants are five or six inches high, after which the leaves would be somewhat lacerated with the harrow. Carrots, beets, and turnips are too small in early growth, land require clean soil in advance, with frequent passing of the cultivator between the rows, which as they become larger by growth, require a cultivator that may be contracted in breadth.—Country Gentleman.

Helpful Hints.

When oats or other feed gets low in the granary, instead of straining to reach them, nail a stout strip to a bucket or box with which they can be easily lifted. A horse of mine takes especial delight in rolling in mud or manure. I tie an old broom-stick to the curry-comb and stand off at a clean and safe distance until I get the worst of it removed. If in ploughing one land-side horse is always one and crowds over against the one in the furrows, take an inch board about six inches square, and through a hole in the centre drive a wooden pin sharpened at one end. Tie this to the back band of the furthest horse so that the lazy one will strike it every time he crowds, and he will soon get tired of doing so. Always have on hand a piece of copper rivets of assorted sizes and a piece of oiled leather for cutting strings to keep the harness mended with; then breaks can be readily mended, or those threatening in tugs, lines, straps, etc., either by riveting or sewing with a stout leather string. When a calf persists in sucking after being separated from its dam for several weeks take an old halter and through the straps passing around in front of the nose put a stick having the points filed sharp and standing outward. A piece of leather sewed over the heads keep the nails in place. With the halter on the calf the cow will kick and keep at a distance, and it will soon give up in disgust. Formerly I was often annoyed and delayed by the loosening of nuts on coulter or rolling cutter, until I hit upon the plan of putting leather washers under the nuts which stopped their working loose. If you work in a field where you cannot place a jug of drinking water in the shade set it in the furrow, throw a bunch of grass over the mouth to keep it clean, and plough the jug under. The ground will shield it from the hot sun, and being cool and damp will keep the water cool. In ploughing to keep dirt out of the shoes, take the legs of an old pair of trousers and cut off pieces about a foot long. At opposite points of each sew two strings. Draw the pieces on over the shoes, tie the strings down underneath just in front of the heel. Then fasten the upper ends of the pieces around above the ankles with an elastic garter. For a marker to lay off corn rows among stumps, put two waggon wheels on an axle of a length to keep the wheels in the distance apart the rows are desired. Any stout stick of wood will do for an axle. fix on a seat to ride if desired. This marker will pass over ordinary stumps, and can be easily turned to avoid those directly in the way of a wheel.—American Agriculturist.

Artificial Heat with Fowls.

The question is often asked whether artificial heat should be employed in the henhouse, to make it more comfortable in the winter season and to increase the egg production at that season of the year when eggs are most valuable for the market. As our best fanciers are by no means unanimous in their answers, it may be inferred that there are two sides to the question; and so in fact there are, and with this as with so many other phases of the subject, it is hard to lay down rules that shall apply to all cases.

Manifestly the man who has but a few birds, and those comfortably housed is the best off as he is; while the one who has a large number, and wishes to get the greatest possible returns from them during the colder months may find it desirable to employ extra warmth. In very cold locations, too, where the thermometer insists on hovering for long periods in the vicinity of zero, it is but merciful to migitate as far as practicable the severity of the climate. But in ordinary breeding it seems to be pretty generally decided that much artificial heat is not desirable. While the very early chicks of the larger breeds will require it, or its equivalent, when first hatched, those intended for general sales are best off with the natural temperature after the tender days of early age are passed It is hardly probable that the average purchaser will be provided with artificially heated quarters, and to buy birds coming from such and try to change their habits is to invite disease and death. The complaint is not infrequent that sellers send out birds that have been forced to unusual developement in a warm house, and the purchaser finds only too late that he cannot accustom them to his own accomodations, but has all his fond anticipations scattered by the unaccountable loss of his purchase. Nobody is to blame strictly speaking, but somebody is disgusted and mad clear through.

One thing seems to be settled, and that is that artificial heat in the poultry house does not conduce to hardiness, but does have exactly the opposite result, and it would seem to be the proper thing to rear all birds intended for sale in that manner which shall give them the greatest degree of that very desirable quality.—American Poultry Yard.

The Dynamite Gun.

There has been tested recently on our sea coast a new kind of gun, which it is hoped will be useful in protecting our harbors. It contains a dynamite cartridge which is expelled from the gun by air-pressure. Dynamite would do very great destruction if it should be shot out of an ordinary cannon; but as it explodes by anything in shape of a shock, it would naturally do more damage to the cannon which expelled it than to the object against which it was directed. A gun, however, has been invented to send this dynamite cartridge against a fort, or an approaching iron-clad. The machine is upon exhibition at Delamater Iron Works in New York. It looks like a forty-foot brass pipe mounted on a steel girder. This is the barrel and carriage of the four-inch dynamite pneumatic gun. It weighs a ton, and is capable of sustaining a pressure of 1,090 pounds to the square inch. The dynamite cartridge is incased in soft metal, within a shell of brass, and fitted with a wooden tab. It is expelled by compressed air, and when the projectile, flying at speed, strikes head-on against a resisting surface, a hard metal pin embedded in the soft metal is forced into the fulminate at the head of the cartridge and discharges the dynamite. Should this cartridge hit the deck of an iron-clad vessel it would tear it all to pieces. It is claimed that this cartridge can be thrown three miles with a precision never obtained by gunpowder. Our Government has been experimenting at Fort Hamilton, N. Y., and has done some wonderful execution. Should we have a foreign war, these guns would be our dependence against foreign fleets, as we have no defence nor any navy. It is said these dynamite guns may be used as field-pieces, which would make war so destructive that it could not be carried on.

About two million sheep are at present in Colorado. The clip this year will be ten million pounds.

PERSONAL POINTS.

About Mr. Gladstone — Evangelist Moody—President Arthur—Prince Bismarck—And Other Well Known People.

Dom Pedro, having ascended the throne at the age of six, has now reigned longer than any other living sovereign.

All the horses, carriages, and farming utensils belonging to Mary Anderson at Long Branch, are to be sold, as she will stay abroad another year.

The death is announced, at the age of 92, of Benjamin Gratz, the youngest brother of Rebecca Gratz, who was the model from which Sir Walter Scott drew his beautiful character of Rebecca in "Ivanhoe."

Dr. Gatling, the inventor of the gun which bears his name, is a tall and large-framed man, with white whiskers and blue eyes and genial countenance; he is sixty-six years old.

Jem Ward, formerly pugilistic champion of England, recently deceased, possessed considerable artistic talent, and his paintings were often exhibited in the Liverpool Exhibition and favorably criticised. His daughter, Miss Eleanor Ward, a pupil of the composer Sir Julius Benedict, was an excellent pianist and singer.

Intellectual and bodily activity are rarely found in men of great age; but when so combined add to the chances of prolonged life. Witness three men who have played an active part in the world and who combine these rare gifts of nature and will, the Earl of Shaftesbury, the great humanitarian, Cardinal Newman, and the Emperor William.

Evangelist Moody is at work in London, but he seems to have parted company with Sankey. While the meetings have created as much excitement than in 1875, they are more successful in reaching the neglected masses. Once, when churchgoers were too plenty, Moody asked all Christians to rise. Nearly the whole church responded, and he requested them to make room for the unconverted standing outside.

M. DeLesseps is a devoted horseman, and may be seen daily galloping through the Bois de Boulogne, with his eight children by his second marriage, boys and girls, mounted on ponies, in nautical costumes, their hair streaming on the wind, their large collars turned over their shoulders, and their hats hanging over their backs—a little group, with their dark hair and complexions, and their white haired chief.

The series of speeches Mr. Gladstone has delivered in the present session are described as equal to anything he has ever done, as he once more stands out in bold and unapproachable relief from his colleagues as the supreme oratorical master of the House of Commons. People may say what they please about Lord Hartington's good sense and tact, and in Mr. Gladstone's absence may begin to hint that he is the safe leader, but the old man has only to come back and make one of his great speeches, and the intolerance of his friends and the silence and dissection of his foes once more remind the house that there is no one like him. There has been, it is said, a strange revival in him of the love of power. He has not, it is never had, the remotest intention of slipping into the House of Peers.

The repealers of the O'Connell School, though once numerous in Paris, are now few and far between." Dr. McCarthy, a physician of the Irish college, in the Rue des Irlandais, is one and Mr. J. P. Leonard the other. Dr. McCarthy is very zealous and popular, but would not touch politics in any form of force. Mr. Leonard, who is one of the longest Irish residents in Paris, has been teaching English here in various colleges. To them and others of congenial disposition comes sometimes from his chateau near Nice Sir Gavan Duffy to share companionship. Before the Land League was founded they were forming a project for a repeal movement, but it was seen that the people rallied so strongly round the movement of Davitt and Brennan, which Mr. Parnell subsequently joined.

President Arthur, says a writer in the Boston Herald, talks well, and is a good listener. He recently repeated, almost word for word, a page from "Vivian Grey." Although he had not read the novel for twenty years. He has a fair knowledge of English literature, and is well acquainted with the old poets and the great fiction writers. A correspondent of the Chicago Tribune praises Mr. Arthur for greatly improving the interior of the White House. When he entered it the old mansion was almost as barren as the builders left it there was no color anywhere, except in the conventional wall paper patterns; the carpets and furniture were ordinary and common place, and wherever there was a mantel screen it was of the ground kind. The carpets were worn, and everything was of a depressing dulness. The red, the blue, the green, and the east rooms have been transformed, and he has done as much as the money at command would permit toward making the interior of the White House worthy of its exterior—for the home of the President continues to be, architecturally the best building at the capital.

In a private conversation with a member of the German Parliament, Prince Bismarck recently explained his reasons for withdrawing from the direction of Prussian affairs: "I am 70 years old. My nerves are bad, and I have not time to be unctuous. How can I think of ruffled feelings and small diplomatist jealousies when obliged to follow events going on everywhere. Telegraphy fearfully multiplies my duties at the Chancellerie. Germany is interested in what happens at Rome, Madrid, Vienna, Berlin, St. Petersburg, Paris, London, New York, Washington, Hue, Tamatava, Melbourne, Sydney, Cairo and Khartoum. I must regard the world as a chessboard, and see how an event happening, no matter where, can be made indirectly or directly to affect German interests. Formerly a Chancellor just needed to be familiar with the dominant persons in the courts of Europe. He must now understand as well parties, wirepullers, financiers, and currents of public feeling, and act rapidly on information telegraphed to him in haste. To generalize rapidly, his eye should be everywhere and his knowledge most extensive and exact. The Chancellorship is no sinecure. Its duties might overtax a younger man. If the Emperor did not fully support me I could not get through them."

A WONDERFUL FIND.

A Relic of the Chivalry of Spain Deep in an Arizona Mine.

Since the establishment of permanent white settlements in Northern Arizona discoveries have been occasionally made of relics of prehistoric settlers, whose indentity has been heretofore considered irretrievably lost. In the majority of such instances the discoveries were made in re-opening old mining claims from which in ages gone another race had sought to wrest the treasures of the earth. This has been especially the feature in the working of the Chrome mine of the United Verde group in the Black Hills, and the discoveries which have been made in it would indeed warrant an incredulous reception were it not for the reputation and standing of the men who stand ready to vouch for them. While many of these discoveries have been made public through the agency of the local press, but one has heretofore ellcited any considerable discussion among scientists, that being the unexpected opening of an old tunnel by the miners at present working in the mine. The tunnel so opened presented the appearance of having been worked many years ago, in a style still common among miners in isolated portions of Mexico and Spanish America. Throughout the entire length timbers had been placed to support the walls for the greater security of the workmen. Scattered along the floor of the tunnel lay with we lworked edges, showing hard service in the hands which once wielded them. In the centre of the apartment, when it was first opened, stood a stake about four feet high and six inches square, on which was painted in a pigment obtained from red oxide of copper, a cross. While the astonished men were still regarding with amazement the wonders of their discovery, one of them, more inquisitive and perhaps possessed of more avarice than the rest, seized the stake so rudely that it dwindled to dust in his hand, as did also the more heavy timbers of the mine on being exposed to the air. At the time two theories were advanced to explain the strange occurrence—one being that the mine had been previously worked by ancient aborigines in search of the red oxide of copper for paint, and that the presence of the stake and cross was but the result of chance: the other was that the mine had been worked for the copper and silver, in which it is very rich, by Indian peons under the direction of Jesuit fathers, and the ore obtained shipped to ecclesiastical coffers in Mexico. The last theory was apparently sustained by the presence of slag near the mine, but was also apparently refuted by the abandonment of the mine at a point where the ledge was shown remarkably rich. Both theories are warmly discussed pro and con by the respective supporters, but that the last one was the correct one is now established beyond cavil. Since the date of the discovery the miners, under the direction of Supt. Thomas, have been engaged in carefully reopening the shafts and tunnels made by the prior workers. While this work has been done with the utmost care, it has also been done with such rapidity that a depth of 283 feet was attained on Sunday last. Early on Monday, while James Dillon and Johnny Bright were working at the extreme end of the tunnel, they were surpised to find an iron article, which they at first supposed to be some household utensil, and together with the prize they both reported the occurrence to Supt. Thomas, who was overjoyed to discover in it an ancient helmet of fine Milan manufacture,

A NUMBER OF STONE HATCHETS

SUPERB IN FINISH AND TEMPER.

Hastily returning with them, he at once placed at work a large force of men, and in lees than an hour had exhumed two complete suits of armor, in which still remained the ilum, femur, and tibia of warriors who long had borne their weight in weary marches and fierce fights. Of the armor, one—the first discovered—was of exquisite make of Milan steel, so much prized by the soldiers of the sixteenth century, and consisted of helmet, breast-plate, and back piece, with gussets reaching to the knees and jambes, while the other was of allcret armor, much famed in the middle ages for its defensive qualities, and a favorite with light cavalry. Besides the armor were found two swords, one of renowned Toledo make, bearing a legend in Spanish, which, on being translated to English reads: "Draw me not without cause; shield me not without honor." The other is of unknown make. All the articles found were to-day sent by Supt. Thomas to Gov. Tritle, will, with the permission of the United Verde company, present them to the Smithsonian institution.

Their arrival created the greatest curiosity among the few who knew of it, and in consequence the governor has been so bored by eager sightseers that he finally determined to satisfy the general desire by placing them on exhibition in the rooms of the Chess, Checker, and Whist Club, where all who wished were at liberty to examine them.

From the general condition of the warlike relics it is generally supposed that those who one time wore them were imprisoned and starved to death in the mine, either by accident or through the action of rebellious peons.

A Notorious Criminal.

The Paris police have just arrested one Chatel, a notorious Reoidiviste. He made his debut in 1869 by an attempt to murder the late Emperor of the French. He attired himself in the uniform of a grenadier of the imperial guard, and proceeded to the Tuileries, asking to see the emperor, to whom he was intrusted to deliver a message from his colonel. The cent garde on duty at the door of the emperor's study immediately saw through his disguise, owing to his wearing his bearskin the wrong way, and immediately collared him He released himself, and tried to escape by leaping over the balcony into the garden below, but broke his leg in the fall. The matter seems to have been hushed up, for though he admitted he meant to kill the emperor, and a formidable knife was found upon him, he was only tried for forcing his way into the palace, and got off with fifteen months' imprisonment. Since then he has been repeatedly arrested for burglaries, attempted murders, and kindred offences, but being at large just now, was wanted by the police, who succeeded in unearthing him in one of the suburban slums. He was in bed with a couple of revolvers ready to his hands, but was secured before he was able to use them. His trial bids fair to be interesting, as he is likely to give himself out as a political victim.

The "Vancouver."

The Vancouver, the new steamer of the Dominion Steamship Line, takes her place on the 8th. May in that company's line between Liverpool and Montreal. The dimensions of the Vancouver are:—Length between perpendiculars, 430 feet; breadth of beam, 45 feet: depth of hold, 33 feet 6 inches; tonnage, gross register 5 300 tons. She is built of Consett iron under special survey of the Admirality for Naval and Transport services, and of Lloyd's according to their heaviest, but in many important respects strengthened in excess of the requirements of the highest class, and she is therefore exceptionally strong. She has four decks and eight water-tight bulkheads, and carried up to the main deck. The sanitary arrangements for male passengers are under a long turtle-back forward, and for women and children under the turtle-back aft; the steerages are well ventilated and lighted. The single men are berthed on the forward part of the ship, and the single women are berthed aft in charge of an experienced matron, married couples in centre. Accommodation is provided for 160 saloon passengers, 30 second cabin, 88 intermediate, and 1,200 steerage. Electric light is supplied to every department of the ship, including the side lights in the lighthouses; the system being that of Messrs. Siemens Bros. & Co., London, combined with Swan's lamps. The accommodation provided for the intermediate passengers is much superior to what has hitherto been thought good enough. The saloon is amidships, forward of the engines and boilers, and is a very handsome apartment extending the full width of the ship with seats for 160 persons at four tables running fore and aft, and five tables on each side athwartships, thus permitting easier access, and making up family parties at table. Revolving arm chairs and sofas are richly upholstered in crimson velvet. The cabinetwork of the saloon is in panels and pilasters of teak, maple, planetree, and walnut, decorated in excellent taste with designs of fruit, foliage, flowers, birds, &c. A grand staircase, leads from the saloon entrance upwards to the music room, and thence to the promenade deck. The ladies' music-room is a very handsome apartment with approbate decorations. One of Messrs. John Brinsmead and Sons' finest upright grand pianos, of a new style known as the "Avenue" model, discourses sweet sounds to the touch of flying fingers. Here, also, is a well-stocked library. The state-rooms are unusually large, and several of them are fitted with family or honeymoon beds. The state-rooms being in a single line along the side of the ship makes them airy, light, and cheerful—a great desideratum to passengers. The berths are fitted with Rawcliffe's patent wire woven nattresses, which adapt themselves easily to the sleeper's form, and are most comfortable. The ladies' boudoir is near the saloon, with bath-room, closets, and lavatory adjoining; other bath-rooms, closets, and lavatories are carefully planned and placed where most convenient for the passengers. In the bridge deck there are a number af very commodious state-rooms, at the forward end the barber's shop is near by, while further aft are the second cabin state-rooms and cabin, also the officers' and engineer's state rooms and mess room, and at the after end are the surgeon's ample quarters, with surgery adjoining. Further aft, in the front of the turtle back, are six hospitals, fitted with every requisite: although there is so little serious illness at sea that these are rarely fully occupied. The promenade deck is 188 feet long, without any obstruction whatever, the Fidley casing rising about seven feet high, and carrying up overhead any dust or heat from the boiler department; the Vancouver is in this respect unsurpassed. There is ample promenade room on the main deck for intermediate and steerage passengers. The Vancouver will carry a very large cargo, and for expeditious working she has six hatches and six steam winches. When it may be necessary to work at night she is supplied with a cluster of electric lamps to illuminate the decks. The anchors are raised by a powerful crane instead of the old-fashioned davits, and the lifeboats are fitted with a new patent lowering process. The ship is steered by Harrison's patent steam stearing gear, the machinery being placed aft, where either the hand gear or steam gear can be used at option. The engines and boilers contain all the latest improvements, every detail having been the subject of careful study. The engines are of the three cylinder type, the high pressure cylinder being 58 inches diameter, and the two low pressure cylinders being 80 inches diameter each, and the stroke 66 inches; the boilers being six in number, having 30 furnaces, 46 inches diameter, made of Fox's patent corrugated steel, giving a large heating surface; the initial pressure of steam per square inch is 90 lbs, but the boilers are tested by the the Board of Trade to over double that pressure. It is expected that the Vancouver will prove one of the fastest vessels in the Canadian trade.

The Truth and Nothing Else.

Nowadays people want proof. Humbugs are more plentiful than dollars, and it is only by the greatest care that many are kept at conviction point that they are not fools. Proof is wanted, and that we can supply in connection with the claims of Putnam's Painless Corn Extractor as a sure, safe, and painless remedy for corns. Ask any druggists what he thinks of it. Ask any person who has used it. This will give you all the proof you want. Then buy a bottle, test it, and become a missionary for Putnam's Painless Corn Extractor.

Feaver colic, unnatural appetite, fretfulness weakness, and convulsions, are some of the effects of worms in Children; destroy the worms with Dr. Low's Worm Syrup.

In Roadster Stallions, the first was taken by J. R. Trimble's "Clear Grit," and we believe there could be no question about the presenting of the award. This beautiful horse was the centre of attraction, and many were the eulogies passed upon him. He is certainly a model of symmetry and grace, and Mr. Trimble has just cause for pride in being the owner of such an animal. We are informed he has made a splendid record for himself at the large shows, having won first prize and silver medal at the Industrial Exhibition held at Toronto last fall—taking these honors from a field of 43 horses, which were the best shown in Canada.—Monitor.

The Heetic Flush, pale hallow cheeks and precarious apetite, indicate Worms. Freeman's Worm Powders will quickly and effectually remove them.

LARDINE MACHINE OIL

Is Manufactured Solely by MeCall Bro's. & Co. Toronto, and is the only popular Machine Oil to-day in use by all mill men and farmers. Try Lardine.

A Chesley youth invested $1.40 in a recipt for "How to Appear in Society." The volume he received by return mail was not large, but short, pithy and to the point: "Always keep your nose clean, and don't suck more than one finger at a time."

"Why! What's the matter?" Lady—(With face enveloped in roll of hot cloths)—"Oh! I'm crazy with that Neuralgia that continually troubles me." —"Well, how foolish! Why don't you go to Hill Bro's, and get bottle of Fluid Lightning? It cured me in less than one minute. I always keep a bottle in the house. It only costs 25 cents. A. & M. 2

FLUID LIGHTNING.

There are but few that have never suffered almost intolerable pain from Toothache, Neuralgia, or like acute pains. To them such an instant relief in Fluid Lightning is an untold blessing in time of trouble. No disgusting offensive medicines to be taken for days. On application of Fluid Lightning cures. Sold at Hill Bro's. A. & M. 1

Mr. J. J. Middleton has sold lot 35, con. 7, Proton, to Mr. A. J. Decatur, for $1600, and taken in payment 72 acres of land in Manitoulin Island and other property. The Manitoulin lot is said to be excellent land. Mr. Middleton will leave for the Island in a few days.—Dundalk Herald.

All over the land are going into ecstasy over Dr. King's New Discovery for Consumption. There unlocked for recovery by the timely use of this great life Saving remedy, causes them to go nearly wild in its praise. It is guaranteed to positively cure Severe Caught, Colds, Asthma, Hay Fever, Bronchitis, Hoarseness, Loss of Voice, or any affection of the Throat and Lungs. Trial bottles free at A. Turner, & Co's Drug Store. Large sixe $1.00 2

THE EFFECTS OF WHISKEY.

The effects of whiskey are always evil, and those who feed upon alcoholic stimulants, vainly endeavoring to cure coughs and consumption, but nurse a viper. Hagyard's Pectoral Balsam is a remedy that is always reliable for all throat bronchial and lung troubles, and never does harm to any one.

Intermeoiate Examinations.—The only material change in the curriculum for the present year is the introduction of Reading and Writing. To encour age the study of music a paper will be given on the subject and the marks taken added to the aggregate. Those holding third-class certificates and trying for a renewal will be awarded, by the County Inspector, marks (not to exceed100) for efficiency in teaching to be added as a bonus to their total marks taken at the non-professional examination. Candidates will have to pay a fee of $1 and $2, if they desire to try second and third class examinations. Blank forms of applications can be had from the Inspector, which must be filled up and sent in by the 17th June.

CURE FOR DEAFNESS.

As numerous testimonials will show, there is no more reliable cure for deafness than Hagyard's Yellow Oil. It is also the best remedy for ear ache, sore throat, croup, rheumatism, and for pains and lameness generally. Use externally and internally.

IMPORTANT CHANGES.

There are two periods in the life of every female when the system undergoes great changes. First the change from childhood to womanhood; next, that of womanhood to old age. These are the critical changes of life, and the system should be nourished and regulated by that matchless tonic, Burdock Blood Bitters. It is invaluable in all diseases peculiar to females.

For a first-class Carriage or waggon go to Shanahan's Carriage Works, a large stock now on hand to chose from. Be sure you see them and get their prices and terms before purchasing elsewhere.

FRAUDULENT TRANSACTIONS.

There are many frauds perpetrated in medicine, and many advertised remedies worse than useless. Not so with Hagyard's Yellow Oil. It remains as ever the best internal and external medicine for all pain, soreness and injuries with which human flesh is afflicted.

A BLESSING TO ALL MANKIND.

In these times when our Newspapers are flooded with patent medicine advertisements, it is gratifying to know what to procure that will certainly cure you. If you are billious, Blood out of order, Liver inactive.or generally debilitated, there is nothing in the world that will cure you so quickly as Electric Bitters. They are a blessing to all mankind, and can be had for only fifty cents a bottle at A. Turner & Co's Drug Store. 2

The Creditor's Relief Act, passed by the Provincial Legislature, is now in operation in this Province. As we have no insolvency act, the creditors of a bankrupt had no means of securing a fair distribution of the estate. It was first come first served. Under this Act, all the creditors will rate alike. If the Sheriff seizes under a writ, all the other creditors can fyle their claims within a month and secure an equal distribution of the dividends. This will prove a great improvement.

THE SECRET OUT.

The secret of beauty has been at last revealed. Without good health, pure blood and a fair clear skin none can possess good looks. What is more repulsive than pimples, blotches and a sallow or pasty complexion? Burdock Blood Bitters reveal the fact that all can gain pure blood and freedom from the repulsive diseases of the skin that result from impurities.

Orange Judd, editor of the American Agriculturist for some thirty years, but unconnected with its business management for a year or two past, has lately retired from its editorial department and located in the West. He desires to gather a complete "Postal-Card Album" of his old readers and friends, and requests them all to send him now a Postal giving their present location and address, naming also, when convenient, the years in which they were his subscribers. Mr. Judd's address is Chicago, Illinois.

WHAT IN A NAME?

Scrofula is so called from the Latin scrofa, a pig, from the supposition that the disease came from eating swine's flesh. It is often inherited from parents, and leades to abscesses, ulcerous sores, debility, king's evil and consumption. The case of the Rev. Wm. Stout, of Wiarton, who suffered 23 years from scrofulous abscesses, is one of the most remarkable on record. Burdock Blood Bitters cured him after the best medical skil had failed.

Mr. J.R. Trimble's blood stallion, "Clear Grit, Jr.," carried off first prize at Chatsworth, Owen Sound, Woodford and Meaford Spring Shows, and the prospects for a big season are splendid.

FLUID LIGHTNING.

Fluid Lightning is the only cure for Toothache, Headache, Earache, and Neuralgia. It does not take a day or an hour to cure it, but in less than a minute all pain is gone. Thousands have tested its merits within the last year. Fluid Lightning is also a positive cure for Rheumatism. The worst possible cases have been permanently cured in one week. Price 25 cents at Hill Bro's. A, & M. 3

WHAT IS LARDINE.

Ask any farmer, thresher or saw mill man, or in fact any man who runs machinery of any kind and he will tell you that it is the only machine Oil which will wear equal to Castor Oil, and won't gum or clog your machinery. For sale at Haskett Bro's, Markdale. 176-215

Married Eight Times.

WIVES SCATTERED ALL OVER CANADA AND THE UNITED STATES.

DETROIT, May 9.—Manager C. J. Whitney is taking every possible step to bring the scoundrel who deceived his daughter to justice. Detectives and police officers are at work in all parts of the country, following up clues bearing on the past career of Neiveille, alias Perry, alias half a dozzen names. The amount of evidence discovered thus far is almost startling. Telegrams were received last night throwing new light on the sinful history. From present indications he will be lucky if he gets off with anything less than a life sentence.

INTERVIEW WITH THE PRISONER.

Whitney's daughter went to Toledo yesterday with Lawyer George W. Moore and Mrs. Fred. C. Whitney to see if something could not be learned from Neiveille, who thus far has stubbornly refused to tell anything of his past history. The meeting between Neiveille and Lillian is described as very sensational. The couple fell into each other's arms; then Neiveille pretended to faint away, and fell on the floor. Water was thrown into his face, and he revived, but soon keeled over again, and more water had to be thrown in his face, After considerable excitement all around, Lillian and Mr. Moore persuaded Neiveille to tell something of his history. Mr. Moore is not communicative, but the other who heard it say Neiveille

CLAIMS TO BE SIR ROGER TICHBORNE.

He said his mother was living in England and thinks him dead. He and the celebrated claimant were in the English army together; they were drummed out for tarring and feathering a comrade. He claims to be of Irish and English extraction, and says he gets his name from large estates in Great Britain which are bound up in chancery. He drew rent from his estate until 17 years of age, when he bad a row with his mother and came to America in company with the claimant. They were together some years. Neiveille addmitted having been but said he had been divorced each time. He says he met Miss Shaw, the woman who came to Detroit with him, at Poughkeepsie, N. Y., but denies that he was married to her.

MARRIED TWICE IN THIS COUNTRY,

An attempt was made to get a photograph of Neiveille, but his lawyer objected, and it seemed under Ohio law Neiveille could not be forced to sit for his likeness.

HIS DOINGS IN SCHENECTADY.

A telegram from Schenectady says Neiveille is probably the man who came there under the name of John H. Percy and married Miss Anna Henry. He was working the town as a book agent. He was arrested on the charge of false pretences, but his wife and mother-in-law settled matters. From there Percy went to Jersey City and married the daughter of a rich man, he then going by the name of Perry. The Schenectady woman says he got considerable money out of his mother-in-law, and the last time she heard of him he was in Canada.

MENTAL ABERRATION OF MISS WHITNEY.

That the genuine and spontaneous sympathy bestowed on Mr. Whitney, his unhappy daughter, and all the members of his family is well placed, has been demonstrated by evidences of mental aberration on the part of Miss Whitney. At a consultation of medical experts yesterday one of the physicians suggested that the young lady be placed for a time in a private asylum, to which her parents demurred, and travel abroad was suggested.

THE SON OF A HAMILTONIAN.

HAMILTON, May 9.—Neiveille, who eloped with C. J. Whitney's daughter from Detroit, was the son of a man who kept a butcher's shop here some years ago. His real name is Geo. R. Newbold. He was once a Methodist Episcopal preacher here.

Degrading the Press.

Surely the leading party journals in this city are doing all that lies in their power to bring party journalism into contempt, and themselves in disgrace. There can scarcely be lower depths than they have already attained. The former insinuations of both the leading papers here have been something really disgraceful, but probably nothing lower and meaner has appeared than in connection with the late case of dynamite finding at the parliament buildings. In connection with the announcement of the discovery of the dynamite cartridges in the wells of the building the Globe gave an implied intimation that the Tories connected with the Conspiracy Case probably had a hand in it. Stress is laid on the face that one of the cartridges was found immediately under the apartments of the Speaker, and the other under the safe containing important documents both of which could have been destroyed had the case gone on at the Assizes! What intelligent men in Toronto entertains for one moment the idea that the defendants in the Conspiracy Case would have been parties to getting rid of witnesses and documents in that murderous and savage way?

The Mail, not to be outdone by its rival, even in mean insinuations, comes out the next morning with two or three articles in which it is boldly intimated that the whole thing was the work of the present Ontario Government, or of some parties under the immediate control and direction of the Ministers. It says that "the prevailing opinion among those who profess to know a thing or two is that the cartridges were placed where they were found under the instructions of the government." It insinuates that the boy who made the discovery was probably inspired to do so, and that the Globe reporter was there under instructions at the time, and probably several others about the premises would not have been there then but for the very purpos of making the most out of all the pretended discovery." In a leading editorial article on the same subject it plainly says that Mr. Mowat and his colleagues "are not men above a little dabbling in ineffectual dynamite and unconnected fuse if any purpose could be saved by the experiment on the tide of public opinion,"

There has been more of this disgraceful sort of writing in both papers. Surely if we have a law in Canada for the suppresion of immoral and debasing literature it is not likely to reach any cases of more debasing literature during an entire year. What a sin and shame for journals aspiring to reputations for reliability and decency to use their opportunities in trying to convince the young man of the country that our leading public men are among the lowest, most deceptive, and most heartless creatures to be found outside of prison walls!

Why not now go the full length and let the Globe come out with the insinuation that the same Tories are hand in hand with the Fenian dynamiters in an endeavor to blow up the Speaker, the Government, and every Grit in Canada, and let the Mail follow with the deliberate announcement that the Provincial Premier and his Cabinet have all combined to blow up the Parliament buildings and destroy all the public property they possibly can and then attribute the whole crime to their opponents simply to injure the reputation of the Tory leaders in the public estimation? For shame, gentlemen; have some better respect to the reputation of the press than to allow any more such unworthy matter to appear.—Truth.

C. P. R.

By a general order issue by Manager Van Horn on the 1st inst., the Ontario and Quebec, Toronto Grey and Bruce and Credit Valley will henceforth be managed as part of the C. P. R. The old names of these railways will disappear, and they will now be known as the Ontario Division of the C. P. R. We notice that the last rail of the Ontario and Quebec was laid on Monday, and the work of ballasting is being vigorously pushed. The line will be open for freight traffic in a very short time, and by the 1st of July for first class passenger service. We will then have a direct through line from Owen Sound to Ottawa and Montreal, much shorter to the former city than that now travelled by way of the Grand Trunk. We believe it is also the intention to at once push on a direct line from Smith's Falls or Carleton Place to Montreal, which will greatly shorten the distance to the latter city, passengers going straight through without going near Ottawa.

With this direct connection from the East now completed, and the C. P. R. boats to make the connection westward Owen Sound is in a favored position as regards communication in boath directions, and we may expect to see a large stream of traffic this summer. Manager Whyte, who under the new arrangement is manager of the Ontario Division of the C. P. R., was in town this week, laying out the ground for the new station building and immigrant sheds to be erected here. The station building will be on the tannery property, and the immigrant sheds north of Russell street, in rear of Mr. Dunn's present residence.—O. S. Times.

Euphrasia Council.

The council met pursuant to adjournment, on 2nd of May, 1884. Members all present. Minutes of last session of council read and confirmed. The following named gentlemen were appointed fenceviewers, viz.: R. Carefoot, J. Raby, J. K. Reid, J. White, G. Proctor, J. McKenzie, G. Vickers, H. White, T. Ellis, J. Hurlburt, H. Knott, E. Parker, J. Pickerin, J. Yelland, J. Perry, C. Kelley, G. Richardson, R. H. Stinson, J. Still, J. Paterson, Jr., T. Richardson, J. Halbert, D. Squires, W. Dayman.

The poundkeepers appointed were as follows, viz.: A. McKewen, N. Hewson, W. Wilson, J. M. Thurston, J. B Winter, S. Wiley, T. McConnel, J. Wilson, J. Murray, Jr., T. Brady, N. Curry, R. Elliott, W. M. Artley.

By-law No. 336, appointing pathmasters, poundkeepers and fenceviewers, was carried through the different stages and passed.

The petition of A. Grier, Esq., and 27 others, in reference to the Valley road was laid over until next meeting of council.

The Reeve and clerk were appointed a committee to examine the assessment roll.

The clerk was ordered to send road lists to all pathmasters who make the declaration of office and send copies thereof to him.

The Reeve and Mr. Black were appointed a committee to wait on the council of Holland on business connected with Union S. S. No. 2.

By-law No. 337, commuting the statute labor, was carried through the different stages and passed.

The Reeve's orders were issued on the Treasurer to pay as follows, viz.: To George Graham, $3.40, lumber for bridge; to James Arthur, $1.81, lumber for bridge.

On motion being made and seconded the council adjourned until 10 o'clock a. m. on Friday, the 30th may, then to meet as a court of revision for the purpose of revising the assessment roll of the current year.

ROBERT DUNLOP,
Tp. Clerk.

Warning to Assessors.

A warning to assessors comes from Kent county. Edward A. Craig, an assessor, has just been convicted at Chatham assizes and sentenced to a fine of $200, with two weeks in jail, for wilfully inserting three names on the assessment roll for the township of Camder, with the intention of giving them an apparent right to vote. It was of no avail that the prisoner pleaded ignorance of the statute. The judge told him he had taken the oath to preform the work faithfully and honestly, and had been guilty of a flagrant violation of it.

IN GOLDEN BONDS.

CHAPTER XXX —AND LAST

The heartless cruelty of Mr Rayner in allowing his poor submissive wife to live in a room such as he would not for the world have kept horse, or dog, or even violin in shocked and repelled me, and wrung from me the cry—

"The villain!"

"Hush!" said she. "He may be listening to us now."

"I don't care!" cried I passionately. "I am glad if he hears—if he hears me say that this morning I hoped he would escape, but that now I hope they will find him, for they cannot possibly punish him as he deserves. Oh, Mrs. Rayner, and I—I sleeping up in the turret to be out of the damp! How you must have hated me!"

"I did once, I own," she whispered, sinking into a chair and taking the hands I stretched out towards her. "But it was foolish of me, for you did not know—how could you know?"

"But why did you stay? Why did you say nothing about it? And why were you not glad to go up-stairs, instead of begging as you did to remain here?"

"Because," she whispered, her nervous agitation coming back again, "I knew that while I remained down here they would not kill me outright; they would not let me die down here and introduce doctors and strangers to examine into the cause of my death into this room. I knew that a change of room was my death-warrant; and it would have been, but for the accident which happened to Sarah on the very night when, but for you, I should have been sleeping up-stairs ready to her hand."

I staggered back, suddenly remembering the message Mr. Rayner had in his letter told me to give Sarah. It was this—"Tell Sarah not to forget the work she has to do in my absence." And I remember also the grim way in which she had received it. Could he have meant that?

Mrs. Rayner continued—

"He hates violence; all was to have been over by his return, and he free to marry you."

"But he couldn't. I was engaged to Laurence, Mrs. Rayner."

She gave a little bitter smile.

"And do you think that, with Laurence away and Mr. Rayner here, you could have withstood him? In spite of his soft manners, he has a will that acts like a spell. I tell you," said she, twisting my fingers nervously, "though you say he is in America, and Laurence Reade says I shall never be in his power again, his influence is strong upon me even now. There is no peace, no freedom for me as long as he lives."

"Mrs. Rayner," said I suddenly, "may I ask you if what Mr. Rayner told me when I first came is true—that you were rich and he poor, and that he lived on your money?"

"No, it is not true. I had a little money when he first married me; which he ran through with at once."

"And is it true you once wrote books, and had a little boy whose death made a great change in you?" said I slowly, watching her face.

"No; I never had any child but Mona and Haidee."

"Then what did he——"

"What did he tell you so for? He delights in making up fantastic tales of that sort, and often in making me bear witness to the truth of his inventions; it is part of his wild humour. When he went away to carry out a robbery, he would let me know what he was going to do—just to torture me."

The dead calmness with which she told me all this was maddening to me.

"Why did you bear it? Why didn't you rebel, or run away and tell a policeman?"

"If Sarah had killed me, and you had married Mr. Rayner," she answered slowly, staring straight at me, "you would have understood why."

And the power this man exercised over every one who came much in his way became in a moment clear to me, when I saw by what different means he had on the one hand cowed his wife and the fiery Sarah, and on the other gained a strong influence over such different women as Mrs. Reade and myself. But the revelation was more than I could bear. I said faintly—

"May I go to my room, Mrs. Rayner? I—I am not well."

And she herself led me very slowly—for I was indeed weak and ill, half with the pain of my arm and half with misery and disgust—up to my bed in the turret-room.

Before the end of the day I heard that Mrs. Saunders had disappeared without any warning or any application for payment of services, as soon as Sarah had been taken off to the lunatic asylum. She had spared us any pangs of self-reproach on her account, however, by taking with her Mrs. Rayner's watch, and also the cook's, which had been left in the rooms of their respective owners.

"She doesn't expect to see Mr. Rayner again then," I whispered to Mrs. Rayner, who came to my bedside to tell me the news, "or she would never dare to do that."

And, persuaded by me, Mrs. Rayner now relieved of any dread on Sarah's account, returned to the front spare-room, which, however disagreeable the remembrance of Sarah's mad attempt on her life might be, was at any rate healthier than the dungeon in the left wing. There was really nothing to keep the poor lady at the Alders now, as I told Laurence by letter that evening all that Gordon had said to me in the store-room, and the idea had gained ground that Mr. Rayner had gone to America. But she insisted upon remaining until I was well enough to be moved, an event which I had myself retarded by rashly leaving my room three times since I had been told to keep my bed.

Next day, which was Saturday, Laurence wrote to say he that he had himself searched the store-room and Mr. Rayner's study, but found no trace of Gordon beyond a pair of handcuffs placed neatly in the middle of the store-room on the top of a pyramid of biscuit tins and pickle-jars, with a sheet of paper saying that the late wearer begged to return them with thanks to the police, who might perhaps succeed in making them stay longer on the wrist of a simpler rogue than his obedient servant, F. Gordon.

Those days that I spent in bed were a miserable time for all of us. The suspense we were all in—never sure whether Mr. Rayner was in America or whether he might be really close to us all the time. The bits of news brought us from hour to hour by the awe-stricken Jane—first that there was a large reward offered for his capture; then rumours, which always proves to be false, of his having been caught; then complaints of the number of people who came just to look at the outside of the house that the ugly stories were being told about! For the facts fell far short of the accounts which were freely circulated—of there being a cellar full of human bones, supposed to be the remains of Mr. Rayner's victims, under the Alders; that the household consisted entirely of women whom he had married at one time or another; and so forth.

Meanwhile the fog still hung about the place, and Nap, the retriever howled every night. When Monday came, I, anxious to be declared convalescent as soon as possible, and to be able to avail myself of Mrs. Manner's invitation to stay at the vicarage, persuaded Doctor Lowe to let me go down-stairs. It was about twelve o'clock when I left my room, and I had make my way as far as the corridor below, when I became aware of an unusual commotion on the ground-floor, doors being opened and shut, the sobbing of a woman, excited whisperings between Jane and the cook, and then a heavy tramp, tramp of men's feet through the hall and along the passage to Mr. Rayner's study.

I went to the top of the back stair-case, descended a few steps, and looked over. The gardener and Sam were carrying between them a door, on which something was lying covered by a sheet. The cook opened the study door, and they took it in. A horrible dread filled my mind and kept me powerless for a few moments. Then I ran along the corridor, down the front staircase, and met little Haidee with awe on her childish face.

"Oh, Miss Christie," she whispered, clutching my arm in terror, "they've found papa!"

Jane ran forward and caught me as I tottered in the child's clasp. Before I had recovered sufficiently to go to Mrs. Rayner in the drawing-room, Laurence and Mrs. Manners arrived, having heard the ghastly news already. They took us over to the vicarage at once, and I never returned to the Alders again.

In the evening Laurence told me all about the discovery. The gardener, who had done little work for the last three days beyond keeping the gate locked and driving away with a whip the boys who would swarm over when they got a chance, "just to have a look at the place," had been attracted that morning by the shrill cries of Mona, who, now more neglected than ever, spent all day in the garden in spite of the fog. He ran to the pond, where she was nearly always to be found, and whence her cries came, fearing she had fallen in. But he found her standing in the mud on the edge of it, screaming, "Come out, come out!" and clutching with a stick at an object in the water. It was the body of her father, entangled among the reeds.

The down-trodden grasses and rushes at that corner of the pond nearest to the stile which joined the path through the plantation to the path through the field beyond told the story of how he must have missed his way coming through the plantation in the dense fog of Wednesday night, on his way back from the Hall to the Alders, slipped into the pond, and been drowned out there in the fog and darkness, while his dog Nap, hearing his cry for help, had tried in vain, by howling and barking, to draw attention to his master's need.

It was an awful thing that night to lay awake in my strange room at the Vicarage, and picture to myself the dead Mr. Rayner laying at the Alders, the sole occupant, with the exception of the woman hired to watch by him, of the big dreary house where he, with his love of fun and laughter had seemed to me to be the one ray of brightness.

I heard next day that two passages, booked in the name of "Mr. and Mrs. Norris," had actually been taken by him on board a ship which left Liverpool for New York on the very Thursday when we were to have started on our journey "to Monaco." The tickets were found upon him and also the necklace, which proved to be a valuable ornament of rubies that had belonged to Mrs. Cunningham, which he had clasped around my neck on the night of his death, but which I had flung upon the floor. These were the only ones, of all the stolen jewels, which were ever recovered, with the exception of the diamond pendant, which I sent back to its owner, Lord Dalston. Upon the house being searched, the candle which had fallen from my hand when I first went into the cellar under the store room was found under the stagnant water there, and also the brown portmanteau, which was identified as the one belonging to Sir Jonas Mills; but the jewels, with the exception of one drop from an ear ring, had disappeared.

I heard about Gordon, as he told me I should, through Carruthers, who long before the impression these events made died away, received a letter dated from New York, in which Gordon, in a very respectful manner, apologised for the inconvenience his sudden disappearance might have caused his master, who had, he could not doubt, by this time learned the reason of it through the London papers. Mr. Carruthers would find that the bills he had commissioned him to settle in Beaconsburg on that unfortunate Wednesday afternoon had been paid, and he begged to forward him the receipts; he had also left the silver-mounted flask to be repaired at Bell's and the hunting stock at Marsdon's. He had given up service for the present and taken to a different profession as he felt, if he was not taking a liberty in saying so, that it would be impossible for him to find in America a master who gave him in all respects so much satisfaction as Mr. Carruthers had done.

Nothing more has ever been heard of Gordon under that name; but some time afterwards a representative of the United States Congress, who was described as a rich West India merchant, made a great sensation by a very impressive speech upon some financial question; a rough sketch of him in a New York illustrated paper fell into the hands of Mr. Carruthers, who sent it to Laurence, and under the trimly cut moustache and hair parted very much to one side we fancied we recognised something like the clear-cut features and bland expression of our old friend Gordon.

I was married to Laurence before the trial of poor Tom Parkes and of the subordinate who had been caught removing the plate from the Hall. I had to give evidence, and I was so much distressed at having to do so that Tom, good-natured to the last, called out—

"Don't take on so miss. Lor' bless you, you can't say any worse than they know! only a matter of form you know."

He took a stolid sort of glory in his iniquities, pleaded "Guilty" to the charges brought against him of taking an active part in all three robberies, and exulted especially in the neatness of the execution of the robbery at Denham Court, where the various articles stolen were being quietly abstracted one by one at different times by Gordon for two or three days before the Tuesday, when they were finally carried off by Mr. Rayner, and taken by him and Tom to the Alders, where Sarah had received them, as I had seen.

As to what had become of the jewls afterwards, Tom professed himself as innocent as a child; but, whether this is true or not, nobody believed him. He was sentenced to fourteen years penal servitude, and did not hear the sentence with half so much concern as I.

Poor Mrs. Rayner never entirely shook off the gloomy reserve which had grown around her during those long years of her miserable marriage. Kind-hearted Sir Jonas Mills was among the very first to come forward to help her; and, by his generous assistance and that of other friends, she went to live abroad, taking Haidee with her, and Jane, who proved a most devoted servant and friend.

Laurence and I who were married before she left England, undertook the care of poor little savage Mona, who has grown into almost as nice a girl as her sister. And now I have one of my own too.

(THE END.)

GRAINS OF GOLD.

Never leave home with unkind words.

Earnestness alone makes life eternity.

The apple falls near the tree.

By the error of others the wise man corrects his own.

The man who can govern a woman can govern a nation.

It is easier to make all Europe agree than two women.

Every day is a little life, and our whole life, is but a day repeated.

Affect not little shifts and subterfuges to avoid the force of an argument.

There is nothing so strong and safe in an emergency of life as the simple truth.

A great name is like an eternal epitaph engraved by the admiration of men on the road of time.

Though an archer shoot not so high as he aims, yet the higher he takes his aim the higher he shoots.

When arguments press equally in matters indifferent, the safest method is to give up ourselves to neither.

Simplicity, of all things, is the hardest to be copied, and ease is only to be acquired with the greatest labor.

The premeditation of death is the premiditation of liberty; he who has learned to die has forgot to serve.

Commonly, physicians, like wine, are best when they are old; and lawyers, like bread when they are young and new.

Of all the gifts that nature can give us, the faculty of remaining silent, or of answering apropos, is perhaps the most useful.

That state of life is the most happy where superfluities are not required and where necessaries are not wanting.

He that judges, without informing himself to the utmost that he is capable, cannot acquit himself of judging amiss.

The life of man consists not in seeing visions and dreaming dreams, but in active charity and willing service.

We must, if we are wise, make some calculations in our life, and say what we can spend now, and what we shall keep for the future.

There is but one philosophy, though there are a thousand schools, and its name is fortitude—to bear is to conquer our fate.

Mark this well, ye proud men of action! Ye are, after all, nothing but unconscious instruments of the men of thought.

When the mind has brought itself to attention it will be able to cope with difficulties and master them, and then it may go on soundly.

Ceasing to learn is beginning to die. Schooling is not only needed for girls and boys, but for men and women through every phase of life, if they would complete their career.

The doctor is of the opinion that even the extraordinary benevolence of Howard was one of the symptoms of the disease in his brain.

A young man who was sent the other day by the Roxbury, Mass., court to the House of Correction for four months had on his person a diary, which indicated that by begging he had secured about $2 50 or $3 a day, and that he had been in the habit of having a "good time." Nearly every evening was marked as costing twenty-five cents for admission to a theatre, concert or skating rink.

The Bombay Gazette states that the Mahommedans of that Presidency do not believe the Soudan pretender to be the "Imam Mahdi," or true Mahdi, yet regard him as a "Musjid," or spiritual guide. The true Mahdi, they believe, will not appear till about the close of the present century as witness to the coming of Mahomet. They also, it is said, entertain the curious belief that he is destined to experience no fewer than thirteen defeats before victory finally crowns his arms.

If the Mexican periodical, La Patria, is a representative of the religious feeling that exists in that country, the missionaries who are now trying to convert the heathen should be recalled and shipped to Mexico, where they will find a more civilized country in which to promulgate their doctrines. A recent number of that periodical was unreligious enough to contain several humorous as well as profane caricatures of the Lord, His apostles and His tormentors.

Wyatt Hare, of Nelson, Va., just dead, had some peculiarities, among them this one: He never bought a match. A fire, either open or banked, was kept up continually on the hearth. In this he trod in the footsteps of his father, and the fire upon that one hearth was a continuous fire for more than 100 years.

Sir Michael Costa having sent a copy of his Eli and a fine Stilton cheese to Rossini, and receiving no reply from the author of William Tell, wrote and asked if the package had arrived. "Yes, dear Costa, it came to hand," answered Rossini. "The Cheese was Magnificent."

President Grevy is credited with having recently beaten Vignaux, the French champion billiard player, in a match at the Elysee. The President, remarks the London Truth, is a good man with the cue, but if he really beat Vigneaux, we must conclude that the skill of the latter is not confined to the board of green cloth. Louis XIV. made a man a Minister because he always allowed "Le Grand Monarque" to beat him at billiards.

The late Duke of Buccleuch and the Duke of Northumberland once found themselves in a carriage going northward with a commercial traveller. The conversation was general between the three. At Alnwick station the Duke of Northumberland got out, and was borne away in a showy equipage. "That must be a swell," said the commercial traveller. "Do you know who it is?" "The Duke of Northumberland," replied his Grace of Buccleuch. "And they say," exclaimed the traveller, "that our nobility is haughty. Why, he talked to two snobs like you and me as though we had been his pals!"

Changes from one profession into another are not unfrequent, remarks the London World, and with results of a very varied character. The late Dr. Bickersteth left his studentship in medicine for holy orders, and became Bishop of Lichfield quitted the army for the church militant; there are two Q. C.'s now in practice, the one Mr. R. B. Finlay, a doctor of medicine, and the other a parson, to wit, Mr. Marriott, M. P. From law to medicine, however, the change is unusual; nevertheless Mr. R M. Routledge is a case in point. He is a barrister of over four years' standing, and an application which he has just made to the Medical Council to be exempted from the preliminary examination has, as a matter of course, been granted.

The report that Prince Albert Victor of Wales is to be raised to the peerage as the Duke of Dublin, says the St James' Gazette requires conformation, his Royal Highness's father being already Earl of Dublin by creation of her present Majesty in 1850. Such creation is not an absolute bar to a similar one. Substantially identical titles have before now been conferred on different persons, the grant of the existing earldom of Leicester in 1837, before that of 1784 had become extinct, being a case in point. The number of historical titles at the disposal of the sovereign just now is not excessive, especially if the choice be restricted as it has been in later times, to titles which have already been borne by princes of the blood. At present there is no Duke of York, no Duke of Gloucester, or of Aumerle. A few weeks will decide the question as to whether the dukedom of Albany and the earldom of Clarence be dormant or extinct. Prince Leopold was the first who ever bore the title of Earl of Clarence.

Winning Applause.

Fannie Horton, a once celebrated actress, won her first applause in a somewhat singular manner. During her performance in a particular scene she was loudly hissed, when, advancing to the footlights, she asked: "Which do you dislike—my playing or my person?" "The playing, the playing!" was the answer from all parts of the house. "Well," she returned, "that consoles me; for my playing may be bettered, but my person cannot alter!" The audience were so struck with the ingenuity of this retort that they immediately applauded as loudly as they had the moment before condemned her; and from that night she improved in her acting, and soon became a favorite with the public.—Chambers' Journal.

FOR THE FARMER.

Contagious Diseases of Cattle.

Professional men quite often evince a narrowness of view, and a prejudice even at times, which prevent them from discussing in a useful manner, some vexed questions which may be public property as well as professional. The time has long since passed away when professional men had a monopoly of matters pertaining to their profession or could hold themselves above criticism by intelligent persons outside of their class. And this view of the case becomes clear when we read the remarks made in the paper read by a veterinary surgeon at the Chicago convention. We propose to refer to but one of the views of several which we think to be mistaken in that paper. The author of the paper compares the origin of the diseases under consideration to the seeding of a field with corn, without which there could be no possible growth. This is a wholly erroneous view of the case. On the other hand, it would have been much more reasonable and truthful to compare the animal system to a soil apparently free from vegetable growth, but still charged with dormant seeds of weeds which are waiting for some favorable conditions, some warm shower and sunshine, to burst into sudden and vigorous growth.

This is the view taken by physicians and physiologists as regards the nature of many of these so called germ diseases ab initio. There are many cases of these diseases, of which no apparent outside origin can be even suspected that has relation to infection or contagion. There are sufficient cases, however, to warrant the beliefs, or certainty that the dormant seeds of disease which are always present in the system, waiting for development by favorable conditions, have been quickened into active life by these exciting causes, just as the soil, apparently clear and entirely free from pernicious growth, is quickly covered with an eruption of verdure from the effect of warmth and moisture.

And in a similar manner we have seen an apparently healthy and vigorous man working in the harvest field, remove his coat, and, when saturated with perspiration, sit in the shade and enjoy the cool breeze, which quickly closed the pores of the skin, turned back the current of evoporation of impure matter from the blood, and struck a chill to the very marrow. Within a few hours the man is stricken with typhoid fever which is an infectious disease,) and is at the very gates of the grave or within its cold walls. This is a type of perhaps the majority of sporadic cases of such diseases, and is especially true of those "germ" disorders which are popularly termed 'malaria," such as "ague," "chills," and intermittent or remittent fevers. Our own experience in regard to animals proves the same thing. Hog cholera is produced de nova beyond any doubt. So is splenic fever among cattle, and so is glanders among horses. But no doubt, too, these diseases are spread by contagion as well.

We might argue the question in the direction of the uselessness of precautionary hygiene and sanitary measures as a method of preventing this class of disease, and of the utter helplessness of man to avoid them, if they are always necessarily produced by contagion, because the contagion virus—the germs—are indestructible by any ordinary measures. But this is scarcely necessary. It is not long since, as might be pointed out, the Department of Agriculture reported that swine cholera was utterly exterminated and had disappeared. But yet, as usual, when the feeding season, with all its unwholesome conditions and environments, has begun, cholera appears here and there with the prevailing characteristics and results. No doubt each case is a centre from which the disease spreads, until, like the rings in a pool caused by the dropping of the rain upon it, the whole surface is soon in commotion the disease sweeps over wide localities and invades every herd.

It is to be regretted that the dangerous and ineffective practice of vaccination is recommended, or rather suggested. It has been very conclusively shown that this merely perpetuates the disease, especially as regards the fatal pleuro-pneumonia, and tends to divert attention from the indispensible sanitary precautions which alone can avoid the exciting causes of the diseases.

The usefulness of these precautions is conclusively shown in the present rarity of epidemic diseases in the well drained, more clean and wholesome cities, where formerly they ran fearful riot and slew thousands up to thousands of victims, whose lives were sacrificed to the filth and foulness with which large cities then overflowed. Sanitary precautions should be to the veterinary surgeon, as well as to the physician, what cleaning and clean cultivation are to the farmer, to destroy the seed or the germs of the organisms—weeds in either case—which lie dormant in the blood in the one and in the soil in another; for it is abundantly clear that the seeds of disease exist in the blood, waiting for favorable chances to germinate, just as those of the weeds exist in the soil, and that the diseases are not always sown after the manner in which we sow corn.—Chicago Times.

Poultry—Breeds for Laying.

The best breeds of fowls for laying, are those that suit the climate in which they are kept. It is an oft-repeated inquiry as to which breeds is most suitable, by those who contemplate poultry keeping. Such inquiry can only be answered by those who have experimented with different varieties in different locations. There is no doubt that the Leghorns are equal to any other breed for egg production, but it does not follow that they are the most profitable fowl under all circumstances. They are divided into two classes—the single, and rose combs—and there is a further subdivision, according to color. The single comb varieties of fowls are subject to frozen combs in very cold weather, but when properly managed they escape harm. The difficulty may be overcome by "dubbing" them, as is done with Games, but as the principal points of the Leghorns are given to the comb, they would thereby be disqualified from competition at the fairs and poultry shows. A frosted comb would not be very objectionable to those who only breed fowls for profit and not for exhibition, but when the comb becomes frosted, the hen ceases to lay until the injured member is completely healed. As the comb may be frozen several times during the cold season, the loss of time from egg production, owing to the effect of the temperature, would be quite an important item. The double comb varieties though exposing quite a large surface to the action of cold, have their combs closer to the head.

In thus noticing so small a matter as the comb, the object is to present one of the difficulties in the way of keeping a breed that never sits, but lays well. While the breed may not find favor in cold climates, that is no reason why it should not be popular in other sections. As the Leghorns have their virtues and faults, so do the other breeds of fowls. In raising fowls for market, many object to the Brahmas and Cochins on account of their slow growth, and this objection may be a strong one if the fowls are to be sent to market as chicks, as they do not feather until well advanced. If matured fowls are intended for shipment; the largest carcasses, with fine appearance, may be obtained from such breeds. The Plymouth Rocks, which grow fast, and are uniform in appearance when young, also make good market fowls when grown, but while they are excellent layers, they are liable to become excessively fat when highly fed, especially when they are confined, which is a hindrance to egg-production. This may also be an objection to the Brahmas and Cochins. The best results are derived from Plymouth Rocks when they have free range. All breeds do best with freedom, but the larger ones are more content ed under restriction. It is best, therefore, in selecting a breed for laying, to take into consideration its hardiness, fitness for market, time of maturity, adaptability to climate, and disposition. By selecting that breed which possesses qualities adapting them to the conditions of the particular sections of country, the best breed for laying as well as for other purposes will be secured.

THE CARE OF FRUIT TREES.

STARTED TREES.—If trees are transported in warm weather, especially if packed moist the buds will push, and when unpacked will be found to have white, weak shoots, several inches long. The only way to save such trees is to cut back every branch to a good bud that is still dormant.

INJURED TREES.—Nursery trees when sent a long distance, may be injured by drying, and when received, the bark will be shrivelled, and the tree apparently dead. Such trees may usually be saved. Open a trench large enough to receive them, and lay in the trees, root and branch, and sprinkle in the soil among the branches, laying the trees one upon another, taking care to have the soil come in contact with even the smallest branches. The bark will gradually absorb moisture from the soil, and in a few days become plump and apparently as bright and as fresh as ever.

STAKING NEWLY PLANTED TREES.—In exposed localities, trees are apt to get a "list" in the prevailing winds. If the trees are small and properly pruned at planting, there will be less trouble than when large trees, which must be staked. The safest way is to drive two stakes at a little distance, upon each side of the tree, and secure the trunk to both stakes by means of a straw band, or soft rope so as not to chafe.

PASTURING THE ORCHARD.—It is a singular fact that the orchard is the only field that farmers, as a general thing, expect to yield more than one crop. There is so much apparently unoccupied ground between the trees, that there is a desire to utilize it with some crop. When the trees are in bearing, they need all the soil. While the trees are young, a manured crop may be grown between the rows. The best treatment of an established orchard is, to sow it to clover and pasture young pigs upon it. By this, the fruit, soil and pigs will be benefited.

PROTECT THE ROOTS.—In transplanting or handling trees, recollect that every minute of exposure to the air injures them. If a tree can not be planted at once, make a hole and bury the roots. Those who go to a near nursery and take home their own trees, should puddle them. Make a hole in the ground a foot deep and as large as needed. Have a plentiful supply of water. Pour water into the hole and stir up the soil, until a thin mud is formed. Draw the roots of the trees through this until they, even the smallest, are completely covered with mud; then sprinkle dry soil over them to dry them off. This "puddling" or "grouting" of the roots, as the English call it, is useful not only for trees, but for plants of all kinds.

Detectives were posted at the doors of six prominent concert saloons in Chicago on the same evening, with instructions to count all the people who entered there between 7 p.m and midnight. At one door there were counted 1,680 males and 290 females—total, 1,970; at another, 1,423 males and 58 females—total, 1,481; at another, 2,609 males and 254 females—total, 2,863; at another, 2,658 males and 148 females—total, 2 806; at another, 1,657 males and 163 females—total, 1 820; at another, 1,591 males and 94 females—total, 1,685. It was found impracticable to make a separate count of the minors who entered these places on that evening, but it was plainly seen that of these 11,618 male and 1,007 female customers an astonishingly larger proportion were boys and girls, and as there were at that time about 3,000 saloons in the city, it was reasonably estimated that not less than 30,000 boys and girls were among their patrons.

THE TRAGEDIES OF NIAGARA.

An Old Guide and Hackman of the Falls Rehearses some of Them.

"To think that I should have left Niagara Falls twenty years ago after having been a witness of two terrible tragedies of the Falls, and then upon my first visit to them in that time be there in the midst of the excitement of the Vedder-Pearson horror!"

The speaker was an old man, who said his name was Andrew Dalrymple, of Camden. He was a passenger on the Erie Railway train, returning from a visit to Niagara Falls, where he said he was a hackman and a guide for ten years.

"I was greatly surprised to see the old tree trunk still rising in the American Rapids, between the small islands off of Goat Island and the American shore. I guess no one remembers, when the tree lodged there, but I remember it, for thirty years, and it never entered my mind that it could be there yet. But there it was, and as I stood on the Goat Island bridge last week and looked down at the gnarled trunk the thought of that early summer morning, over twenty years ago, when I was one of the first people to the Falls to discover a man clinging to the log, came back to me with a vividness that made me shudder. No one ever knew how he came there or who he was, but it was supposed that he had been rowing across the river somewhere above during the night before, and losing control of his boat had been swept down into the rapids, and the boat striking the tree trunk he had, by some miracle, gained a foot hold upon it. News never spread so rapidly as that of the discovery of this man in his perilous situation. Word was telegraphed at once to Buffalo, and a party of life-savers came on a special train to try and rescue the man. Before 10 o'clock thousands of people were gathered at every available spot where a sight of the unfortunate man and the efforts to save him could be obtained.

ALL THE RAILROADS RAN SPECIAL TRAINS, and the people came in conveyances of all kinds from the surrounding country. Noone seemed to know at first how to go to work, but the man clung to the tree watching every movement that was made. Of course it was impossible to make him hear or give him any directions. Finally, a life-boat was attached to a cable, and let down from the bridge toward him. It was drawn toward the log by ropes attached to it and handled by men on the island. The boat was making directly for the spot, and hopes that the poor man would soon be safely drawn ashore began to be felt by the assembled multitude. Suddenly, however, it was caught in a whirl of the rapids, the cable parted like a kite string, and the boat rushed past the man like a flash within two feet of him, and was carried over the Falls.

"After this the life savers were all at sea again. Several plans were suggested, and one was adopted which it took until late in the afternoon to get in readiness. In all these long hours of suspense I don't believe one of the spectators ever moved from his tracks. Everything else about Niagara Falls was forgotten except the terrible scene of a fellow-being hanging on the verge of death and patiently awaiting the success or failure of the efforts that were being made to rescue him.

"The plan adopted was to fasten a strong cable securely to the American shore, attach a staunch raft to it, carry the loose end of the cable over to the island and let it belly down with the raft to the tree trunk. By this means it was hoped the raft could be drawn steadily to the small island between the man and Goat Island, from which no trouble was anticipated in taking him. Some food and a glass of brandy were placed on the raft and ropes were fastened to it by which the man was to tie himself fast. The raft moved down and reached the man in safety. As he stepped upon it, lashed himself fast and then eagerly seized the refreshments such a shout as went up from the thousands of people that had watched the proceedings with beating hearts and bated breath was never heard before.

IT COULD BE HEARD ABOVE NIAGARA.

The raft was moved toward the island. Everything seemed to be working to a charm. The tension that was put upon the feelings of the spectators was so great that many fainted away. I was a strong man, but I know I wept like a child. Suddenly the raft stopped. The cable drawn as it was beneath the water, caught in some obstruction. All efforts to loosen it were unavailing. One groan of agony arose from crowd. Finally the man sprang to his feet, undid the fastenings that held him secure to the raft, and kneeling for a moment as if in prayer, sprang into the raging water and pulled bravely for the island, but a few feet away. At first he gained visibly, and the thought that he would be saved found utterance in another joyful shout from the spectators. But when he was almost within reach of the shore his strength began to fail, and steadily the distance between him and the shore increased. Then every one knew that all hope was gone. He made a few more desperate strokes, but the wild waters seized him and pitching and tossing and whirling him, hurried him over the great cataract. As he reached the edge of the Falls he was thrown upward from the water until his whole length came in view standing upright, and he disappeared as if he had made a voluntary leap over the brink. As he was dashed to and fro over the Falls not a sound was made by one of the vast crowd, and, terrible as was the scene, not an eye was turned away as he was carried along to his destruction. As he disappeared in the face of the cataract one heart rending shriek went up from the crowd. The poor fellow's body was never found nor his identity ever established.

"The other agonizing scene that I was doomed to witness was the carrying over the Falls of young Charles Addington and little Eva de Forest. That happened five or six years before the incident I have just related. The Addingtons and De Forests were prominent families in Buffalo in those days, and young Charles was engaged to be married to Ada De Forest. Miss De Forest's mother and her little sister Eva accompanied by young Addington and herself, came to the Falls one day in the summer to spend the day. While they were on Goat Island little Eva went away by herself, and Mrs. De Forest sent the young man after her. He found her standing near the shore. He thoughtlessly stole behind her, and, grasping her under the arms, held her out over the water. She suddenly threw up her hands and slipped through his arms into the water. He instantly sprang in after her and reached her before the swifter rapids had caught her. He succeeded in getting her back near enough to the shore to throw her on the bank, but she had not strength sufficient to hold on until her mother could grasp her and fell back into the water. They were both carried over the falls in sight of their beloved ones. For years afterward Addington's father visited the falls once a week, and would sit for hours gazing at the water where they were lost. He finally ceased coming, and we learned that he had died grieving for his boy, who was his only child.

STANLEY AND THE CONGO.

The American Explorer Solving Great Problems in the Interior of Africa —His Latest Achievements.

The significance of the latest news as to Mr. Stanley's doings and intentions may not be apparent to the ordinary reader without some explanation. He has, we are told, succeeded in planting a station at Stanley Falls. To those who have read the stirring narrative of his journey down the great river in 1877 this must appear a wonderful feat. At the time of the recent visit of Mr. Johnston to the Congo, Bolobo, some eighty miles to the north of Stanley pool and two and a half degrees south of the equator, seems to have been the most remote station; but beyond that there are now at least three stations. One of these, Lukalela, is about sixty miles to the north, and another, Equator Station, is just where the river leaves the equator in its course southward. The third one is that of the foundation of which we have just heard, at Stanley Falls, some five hundred miles further into the interior than the station last mentioned. To reach this remote point Mr. Stanley must have passed through the most dangerous part of the river, studded as are its richly wooded banks and islands with those tribes through which he and his followers had to run the gauntlet seven years ago. Beyond the equator the river expands in many places to a great width, its channel is studded with innumerable islands, and its shores fringed with an almost endless series of villages, some of the inhabitants of which were found to be armed with muskets. There is, for example, the famous village built of ivory, the "ferocious tribe" at Magala, and the "amiable people" of Bubunga. But, above all, Mr. Stanley must have succeeded in passing safely the mouth of the great river Aruwimi, in February, 1877, so graphically described in his narrative and represented in his sketch. The Stanley Falls, at which the new station has been planted, are seven cataracts, which form the first interruption to the navigation below Nyangwe (memorable for the tragedy witnessed by poor Livingston.) It was between Nyangwe and the Stanley Falls that the treacherous Tibbu Tib deserted Mr. Stanley just as the expedition was entering the country of reputed cannibals. Until Mr. Stanley furnishes us with details of his journey up the river, we can not say how far he has been successful in winning the good will of the people whose villages fringe its banks. But if we may judge from his success up as far as Bolobo, there is every reason to expect that it has not been less between that and Stanley Falls. True, we hear rumors of hostilities and rebellions, but as these come solely from French and Portuguese sources they require confirmation, to put it mildly. It is not to be expected that Mr. Stanley has accomplished his beneficent and hazardous mission without some display of force; but let us hope that this has been more passive than active. By the planting of this last station, Mr. Stanley may be said to have crowned and completed the mission with which he was intrusted by the king of the Belgians. Beyond the Stanley Falls we know that the river is navigable to near Nyangwe, where it is still something like a mile wide. There is at least one fall to the north of Nyangwe, and, we fear, more than one between that and Lake Mocro; and what now remains to be done is to trace definitely the upper course of the river and its numerous branches, many of which are at present conjectural. Perhaps the station at Stanley Falls may be made the basis of further explorations, though it is to be hoped that the German expedition under Dr. Wissmann will do much to complete the work of Livingston, Stanley, and Cameron.

WHERE THE NAVAL BATTLE OCCURRED

Meantime, Mr. Stanley himself has resolved, before returning to Europe, to break up entirely new ground and solve a problem for which geographers at least will be grateful. He intends, in fact, to do what Gen. Gordon would have done had he not, just when about to start for the Congo, been diverted to Khartoum. Mr. Stanley intends, we are curtly told, to reach one of the Egyptian stations in the Mombuttu country, on the Welle-Makua. One of the great problems of African hydrography is the course of this Welle Makua, often referred to as Schweinfurth's Welle. Mr. Stanley himself was confident that the great northern tributary of the Congo, the Aruwimi, at the mouth of which occurred the naval engagement referred to above, was the Welle of Schweinfurth, and gave what seemed to him at the time cogent reasons for his belief. But within the last four years an able Russian explorer, Dr. Junker, has been at work in this region; and the latest results of his explorations have just reached this country. He has had his headquarters in the Bahr-Gazelle province, ruled over by Lupton Bey, and thence has made several journeys to the south and southwest. No one therefore, is better entitled than he to express an opinion on the hydrography of the region. He is convinced that the Welle does not belong to the Congo basin at all, but that the great feeder of Lake Chad. The Welle rises in the hilly region of the northwest of Albert Nyanza, where many other streams have their source. So far as Dr. Junker has observed, it receives only two considerable tributaries from the north, although it is of great width and studded with islands. On the south it is fed by one large affluent, the Bomokandi, which itself rises quite close to the Welle, and runs for a long way parallel with the main river. The Bomokandi, however, is fed by many tributaries from the watershed, which lies at a considerable distance to the south. This watershed, Dr. Junker is evidently of opinion, is that which separates the system of the Congo from that of the Shari and Lake Chad. Although, like many other African water-partings, it is scarcely distinguishable, yet it seems to separate two regions of very different characteristics. Dr. Junker had heard of a large river, the Nepoko, to the south of this water-parting, and determined to visit it. This he did, and reached it after four days' travel to the south of the Bomokandi, at what he conjectured to be about the middle of its course. It was almost equal in size to the Bomokandi, and had evidently travelled a long way from the east. Instead of the many fine trees which everywhere clothe the banks of the rivers belonging to the Welle system on the north, the Nepoko and its tributaries flow through broad, flat swamps. A floating vegetation, very similar to what is met with in the Nile, pervades the swamps, and renders them passable for men but not for animals. Dr. Junker concludes his remarks by identifying the Nepoko with the Aruwimi of Stanley, and in another communication hopes to adduce proofs that the Welle is the upper course of the Shari. It is not to be expected that Mr. Stanley has heard of Dr. Junker's discoveries, so that he is likely to start under the impression that the Aruwimi will lead to the Welle. That is of little consequence. If he succeeds in traversing the country which lies between the Congo and the Mombuttu country, he will help materially to fill up a blank in the map of Africa. One of Lupton Bay's explorers a year or two ago discovered a large lake far to the west of Albert Nyanza, across which there is a considerable traffic in European goods. Whether this lake belongs to the Congo water system or to that of Lake Chad remains to be discovered; but it looks as if the Nepoko ran through it. We should say that Cassati, a recent Italian explorer in the same region, attaches the Nepoko to the Welle.

The Welle region seems to be thickly populated with a great variety of broken tribes, belonging mainly to the Mombuttu stock. It is worthy of remark that, throughout these latitudes, neither to the east nor to the west did Dr. Junker find any definite territory occupied by the dwarfish people so often referred to under the name of Akka. The people were certainly met with in many parts, but without any fixed settlement, wandering about as nomads among the other peoples. When Dr. Junker dispatched the letters from which we have obtained this information he intended to make still another journey to the southwest. A short communication from him dated October, 1883, states that he had then returned from this journey, but would not attempt to transmit his many charts and ethnographical collections to Europe on account of the troubles in the Soudan. The probability is that he may take refuge in the south, where he has made many friends, and so it is not unlikely that he may meet with Mr. Stanley as the latter pursues his journey beyond the Congo.

Tired Women.

If you look around on the faces in a street car, the number of faded and sad-looking countenances presenting themselves is startling. Mature women have especially a tired air about them, showing itself not only in pallid complexions, but in the wearied lines around the mouth and eyes. It is impossible to associate this appearance with happy lives, and yet, from dress and manner, the majority would seem to be comfortably placed in this world. Usually the climate is supposed to have a great deal to do with the early fading of youthful freshness, and the beauty of health, instead of reviving with the spring of the year, usually delays until the summer holidays, followed by the crisp autumn breezes, invigorate the human system. If the truth was known, however, I suspect that it would be found that the reason why women look tired is because they are perpetually fatigued.

Modern methods have not eased the cares of wives and mothers, whose duties have developed with the growth of science and the expansion of art. When children were thrashed into obedience to parental commands, when young people understood that to hear was to obey, when husbands only expected their regular three meals a day and mended and clean clothing, the duties of women were very much simpler than at the present time. In those happy days, when to eat, sleep and work was the whole duty of man, and the interests of posterity a side issue, the mistress of the household might, after her work was done, eat and sleep, too. At least, she had a chance to work when husband and children were engaged in business or in school for long hours of the day. In those days, rain or sunshine were the same, life moved in a groove, and there was a probability of things running smoothly. In those days people ate what was set before them, because there was not much variety to be had and they were not always developing new ideas in the way of occupations and diversions that upset the regular routine of a household. Perhaps it was monotonous, but it was restful for the housekeepers.

In the great upheaval of mind which has of late years set each individual soul on the search for that good living which the world is supposed to owe it, whether the quest is continued in the direction of business, pleasure, science, art or religion, it is the wife and mother who is expected to be the instrument of Providence in providing the means and forwarding the success of the seekers, and nobody thinks of all the extra burden this throws upon her—the strain on her sympathy, the tax on her bodily strength. From the child who wants a play made for him to the husband who wants to talk over his affairs with her, it is one long intermediate chain of little services which are expected from her. That she has personal tastes or inclinations is never taken into account. She has no time left for her own use, but is actually at the beck and call of all belonging to her from early morning until late at night.

It is a curious fact in connection with the nineteenth century, that few people are self-reliant, and still fewer can occupy themselves agreeably without aid. Like the Turk, they want somebody to amuse them. With the additional burden of seeing that the members of a family are amused, as well as their maternal wants provided for, it is no wonder that wives and mothers look tired. No doubt men feel the fatigue of the constant drive that is requisite to keep up with the general stride, but they have a peculiar faculty of being able to take a rest, even in the midst of turmoil. Women, unfortunately, from long experience in being overdriven, get into that state where they cannot repose, even when the opportunity offers. This is a state of nervous expectation, brought about by the knowledge that there will be something to do in a minute, even if there is nothing calling for attention just now.

In France there are now 4,475 miles of navigable rivers and 2,900 of canals, while in 1852 there were only 4,190 miles of river navigable and 2,449 miles of canal.

MARKDALE MAY. 15, 1884.

IN MEMORIAM.

ROBERT ROBERTSON, grain merchant, of Priceville, who died at Flesherton and Priceville Station, Toronto, Grey and Bruce Railway, early on the morning of Thursday, the 8th of May, 1884.

Mr. Robert Robertson, grain merchant, left his residence in Priceville, about 3:45 a. m. Thursday, the 8th of May, 1884, to attend to his work at Flesherton and Priceville Station. He drove out to the station (a distance of three miles), and intended to return home about 7 o'clock the same morning. When he arrived at the grainery he worked hard for some time removing some oats which were heating in the bin. It appears that he then came out to take a drink from a well near by, and stooping down was struck by apoplexy. He was found with the head and arms in the water, and his breast resting on the board at the top of the well. The water was within 4½ inches from the upper edge of the board. The body was extended on the ground, but there was no evidence of any struggle or motion after he fell. He was found by Mr. Whitaker about 6:50 a. m. Dr. Christoe, from Flesherton, was sent for immediately. Meanwhile every effort was being made to resuscitate the body; but when the Dr. came he pronounced that the man had been dead about an hour. Mr. Hemphill brought the word to Priceville. A large number of men went out to the station, some to attend to the grain, and others to bring the remains home.

The sad event has cast a deep gloom over the neighborhood. Mr. Robertson was widely known and highly respected. As a member of the community he took a deep interest in every thing that tended to the welfare and progress of the place. He was a true type of a faithful, honest, firm, straight-forward, energetic Scotchman.

Mr. Robertson was a native of John's Haven, Kincardineshire, Scotland. He was born February 7th, 1837. His age was therefore 47 years and 3 months. He leaves a widow and five young children, who have the heart-felt sympathy of a large circle of acquaintances.

The funeral took place on Saturday. Religious services were conducted by Rev. D. McLeod, commencing about 2:30 p. m., after which the remains were removed to the hearse and the mournful procession formed, and slowly advanced to the cemetery at the Presbyterian church. Although this is the busiest season of the year, a very large number of people assembled. The following gentlemen took the place of chief mourners, and also acted as pall bearers: — Henry Meldrum, Esq., Rev. D. McLeod, and Mr. Thos. Whitmore, and Messrs. D. McLean, Wm. Wright, A. McLean and James McDonald, elders of the congregation of which Mr. Robertson was a member.

The Flesherton Lodge of the A. O. U. W., to which Mr. R. belonged, removed the remains from the hearse, and deposited them in their last resting place, Messrs. Macmaster and Damude conducting the funeral service of the society.

At the request of Mrs. Robertson, H. Meldrum, Esq., late station master at Flesherton station, has taken the charge of Mr. Robertson's business until it is wound up. From the well-known integrity and business capacity of Mr. Meldrum, and from the satisfactory condition in which Mr. Robertson left his affairs, we are well assured that every obligation will be duly met and the business closed in a manner satisfactory to all parties interested.

THE QUEEN'S BIRTHDAY.

The committee for the celebration have completed their arrangements and a good day's sport is promised to all who come to Markdale on the 24th. $150 in cash prizes will be paid. For particulars we refer our readers to the prize list in this paper. The committee are determined to have the rules and regulations enforced so that each and all will be fairly dealt with. The Gymnasium club have consented to give a fair performance which is well worth coming to see in itself. A dancing platform will be erected and Park Bro's string band will furnish music. This portion of the sports will doubtless be well patronized. The Ladies Aid Bazaar promises to be specially interesting this year while the concert in connection, which will be held in the church in the evening promises to be a rich treat. A tremendous turnout is expected on the 24th.

Queen Victoria's New Book.

From the London, Eng. Daily Telegraph.

The royal volume, looked forward to with so much and such universal interest, has just been issued to the public, and will be read with sympathy, pleasure and admiration at every fire side throughout the wide dominions of the angust authoress. Her acute perception is as vigorous as ever. Scene follows scene, incident succeeds incident throughout this volume, tempting the willing reader from chapter to chapter, commanding interest and enlisting admiration and loyalty on every topic.

The book is sold in Grey by D. K. McPherson, Markdale. Don't wait till you are called upon, but send card ordering copy of book.

The leading merchants of Markdale have agreed unanimously on closing their stores at 7 o'clock sharp every evening, beginning from 1st May to 1st Oct. Farmers and others will kindly take notice of this and try to have their shopping done before seven so that clerks, who have to stand in stores all through the heat of a long Summer day, may have a chance of engaging in some out door exercise and enjoying the fresh air. 190 94

The first two vessels of the new Canada Pacific fleet, the Algoma and Alberta, arrived at Owen Sound from Sarnia on Saturday and Sunday respectively, the first named being received with enthusiastic demonstrations of welcome by the residents and crowds of emigrants who were awaiting her arrival. The welcome accorded the Alberta was none the less hearty, though owing to its being Sunday the exuberance was toned down to a decorous degree.

Thieves.—On Monday night the 5th inst., Mr. Hugh McKee of the 10th line Glenelg, was disturbed in his sleep, and on going to the barn to see if all was right found the barn door open and on coming near two men made their escape therefrom, a third was seen on the road with a horse and buggie all of whoom made their escape, Mr. McKee had a quantity of seed grain cleaned ready for sowing but whether it was their intention to carry off grain or steal horses or commit some other depredation is not known, nothing was taken however except a whip. Several petty theftes have been recently made in the neighborhood and there is strong suspicion as to who the guilty parties are.

GOD SAVE THE QUEEN.

D. J. SHANAHAN, President. WM. N. HASKETT, Sec.-Treasurer.

Owen Sound correspondence very interesting but too late for this issue.

A meeting will be held at the Revere Hotel on Monday evening next at 8 o'clock to arrange for a fishing match.

The stables and out buildings belonging to Moffet's Drug Store, Owen Sound were destroyed by fire Wednesday morning.

The Ladies of the Methodist church will hold their annual bazaar and concert on the 24th of May. The bazaar will be held in one of Hill Bro's. shops opposite the Markdale house, and will be well stocked with new, fancy and usefull articles, while the concert will be held in the Methodist Church, commencing at 7. 30p. m. A rich and varied program is being prepared in which the best local together with selected outside talent will take part. Admission 25 cents.

Contradicted.—Dr. Ghent, of Priceville, has informed us that the portion of Priceville correspondence in the Standard last week referring to his (Dr. Ghent) removing to Toronto is false and without foundation. The Dr. has partially made arrangements to sell his mercantile business, but in so doing has retained his medical office in the building occupied as store where he will be found as heretofore. We regret very much that such a report was sent us, and hope our correspondent will exercise the greatest care in future as such reports are sure to damage the business of those interested.

Struck by Lightning.

During the progress of the thunder storm a week ago last Sunday, the black-smith shop of Mr. Johnston Little, Maxwell, was struck by lightning. The lightning entered the roof and ran down one of the rafters, shattering it to pieces. It then ran down an iron bar, through the floor, and into the ground, which evidently saved the building from being burned. One of the freaks of lightning was to weld two bars of iron together as effectually as if it had been done by Mr. Little himself.—Advance.

American Agriculturist.

GREETING.

New York, May 6th, 1884.

With the June number, the American Agriculturist completes the first half of its forty-third year. Over 3,000 congratulatory letters from subscribers within a few weeks afford most gratifying assurances that the steady improvements in this Journal are evrywhere recognized. The present owners and publishers who, six years ago, assumed control and management, have freed the American Agriculturist from all ENCUMBRANCES, and, equipped with brains and means as never before, unhesitatingly promise a paper better and stronger with each succeeding issue. Dr. Geo. Thurber, for nearly a quarter of a century the Editor, and all the able Associates and Writers who have rendered material assistance in making the American Agriculturist what it is to-day—are still with us. At no period of its existance has this Company been in so prosperous and stable a condition, as it now is.

The "Prairie Farmer" Booming.

The Old Friends of The Prairie Farmer, and many farmers all over the West, and East, too, will be glad to learn of the good fortune that has come to this time-honoured Journal, which for nearly half a century (43 years) has been doing good service to and for the agricultural interests of our country. The number of May 3d announces that, henceforth, The Prairie Farmer will be under the Editorial Direction and Business Management of Mr. ORANGE JUDD, who, after more than a quarter century of service at the head of the American Agriculturist, has left his former field to other hands, and removed to near Chicago, a thousand miles nearer to hundreds of thousands of his older enterprising readers who have preceded him to the West. The number before us gives evidence of the vigor and experience he brings to his new field of work. All who want specimens of the papers as it is, and it to be, and to enjoy its advantages, can have The Prairie Farmer, weekly, from May the 1st, up to 1885, by sending a single dollar to Prairie Farmer Publishing Company, 150 Monroe St., Chicago, Ill.

AT THE FULL OF THE TIDE.

Among the summer visitors that year were two young girls, without friends or acquaintances in the gay company. For them was no lawn-tennis, no rambles with congenial spirits by the shore, no drives to the one or another of the many points of interest about them. They chose from necessity an unpretentious boarding-place, where the fare was not always of the best nor bountifully supplied. Plainly dressed, they were often seen in some picturesque nook by the sea or on the mountain roads, the one with her easel before her, for with her brush she strove to increase the income which their small property afforded; the other with folded hands and patient face—poor girl, she was blind—a picture artistically perfect, and one which touched each heart with pity. Nor were the sketches—one could hardly call them more—of the young artist without merit, for she caught the spirit of nature and transferred it feelingly to her canvas. One or two of these little pictures had found their way into the hands of fashionable guests, and one of them—a few storm-beaten trees, and a bit of rock jutting out into the breakers—was now attracting the attention of a group of tennis-players on their way to the field.

"A very excellent picture," commented one of them, a young fellow who had recently come from the city.

"Ya-as, rather, but very crude," returned another of the number, who aped English ways, and was consequently admired by the others

"I must disagree with you there. I find it anything but that. There is a sentiment about it which lifts it at once out of the ordinary run. I should say a lady painted it."

"It looks like one of Miss White's," chimed in one of the young ladies." "I have seen two or three of her pieces."

"Who is Miss White?" inquired the newcomer.

"Haven't you seen her yet? She is that pretty girl with a blind sister whom we met down by the beach yesterday. You surely must have noticed her."

"Not I, I assure you. But I should certainly notice anyone whom I suspected of being a fellow-artist."

"And very impertinent it would be, Mr. Fillebrown," cried a little fair-haired lady at his side, "if you were walking with me, as you were then."

The other regarded her laughingly, and so the subject was dropped, and they passed on.

Was it his superb figure, set off by his light flannel suit, bounding lightly over the grass to return or volley the ball, or was it the light-heartedness of the four players as they eagerly followed the fortunes of the game, which caused a passer-by to draw a long breath, perilously like a sigh, as she glanced at them over the pailing? Her companion remarked it, and pressed more closely to her side. "What is it dear?" asked she. Her voice rang with a vague plaintiveness born of her affliction, and her hand trembled on her sister's arm.

"Nothing much, pet, only the same old story, 'For one was poor and the other was rich.' I ought to be thankful that it has been given me to keep you from want and harm; but sometimes my heart rebels, and I wonder how it is that others have means to gratify every wish while I must struggle for our daily bread."

"Don't talk so, dear; you make me feel as if I were a burden to you."

The other stooped and kissed the upturned face.

"Never that, pet; you can never be a burden to anyone. My nature demands that I should love someone, and you are the one who satisfies it."

"Yet——"

"No, not 'yet.' Never. You always fling that horrible word 'man,' at me. My dear Nettie, they are monsters of iniquity, all of them. They have no feeling for anyone—they are all self. If you think that I shall ever link my fate with one of them be undeceived at once."

And poor Nellie was so overawed at her sister's superior wisdom and her earnestness that she kept silence until they had entered the forest.

There was, indeed, some truth in her judgment as regarded three of the players, but Walter Fillebrown was certainly rich in the usual sense. He had a moderate assured income; he had once or twice made successful ventures in stocks, or grain, or cotton, and his artistic talent paid. But he had a warm heart and a liberal education had fitted him to hold his own in whatever company he was placed. And, although Miss Rivers was far from suspecting it, she had interested him in the blind girl and her artistic sister, so that he was on the alert to meet them, and followed them with his eyes—thereby making a serious error of play—until they disappeared.

It was not altogether chance which led him, an hour or two later, along the path skirting the shore. By his side the billows lashed the rocks, or crawled up the steeply-sloping beaches; overhead great clouds flew, producing changes of light and color almost magical; the aroma of the pines and cedars were borne to him on the breeze; a great bird wheeled overhead, seeking its finny prey; a white-winged vessel was running in from the open sea with legions of feathery waves chasing at her heels. He turned a sharp corner in a cove walled on one side by titanic-rifted, square-cut rocks, while on the other great trees sprung at the water's edge from clefts in a rock flooring, on which lay fragments thrown up by the tide. Here lay a box of sketching materials and a few colors; beside an easel inclined a girl, asleep or deeply plunged in reverie; over against her another was searching in a pool between over-lapping rocks just above the water-line, her sweet profile revealed or hidden in her eagerness. Fillebrown saw that already the water had run over the only path by which she could return, and just then a wave higher than its fellows swept under the easel, which fell clattering on the rocks; swept, too, through a concealed channel into the rock-pool bubbling up among the mosses. Both girls started; the one drew back with a pretty gesture of affright, the other rose, uttering a terrified exclamation, and stretched out her hand uncertainly.

"Where are you, Grace?" cried she.

For answer a manly hand grasped hers, and a strange voice replied to her instinctive opposition. "Do not be afraid of me. Your sister can not come to you just now. Allow me to help you in her place."

"Grace, Grace?" called she.

"Well, pet?"

"What does this gentleman mean? Who is he? Where are you?"

"He is a stranger to me. But he is right. The tide has cut me off. Be careful of her, sir, because she is blind."

"I know it, Miss White. There"—leading his charge under the pines—"now the water can not possibly reach you." He leaped across the fissure in which the tide was already knee-deep. "Permit me!"

She looked hesitatingly at the rocks, ruefully at her easel, the sport of every wave, and shook her head. "I am afraid, sir, I can not attempt the leap you have just made and my poor easel——"

"That is quickly remedied." He leaned over, and taking advantage of the counter-current, drew it to the shore. He held out his hand to her again. "Now can you come?"

Fiercely curled an oncoming breaker and dashed against the rocks. The water deepened behind her, and a little stream trickled from it over the platform on which they stood. "I—I fear I can not. Do not think me cowardly, sir, but——"

"So be it. Excuse my impertinence, if impertinence it be."

He clasped her in his arms, and clearing the waterway stood with her by her sister's side. Her face was covered with blushes—a man had held her as no man ever had done before.

"I thank you, sir," she stammered presently, "though more for my sister's sake than my own." For she had noticed the water already rushing over the spot where her sister had been. "I could have escaped with a slight wetting."

"Doubtless," he returned courteously; "yet it is better not to wet one's feet when it can be avoided."

He showed no disposition to continue his way, but stood watching her as she gathered up her box of parcels, then glanced across at the little pool, now part and parcel of the fast-rising tide, as she looked back.

"May I ask what you were looking for over there?"

A faint color again arose to her cheeks. "Sea anemones and star-fish for my aquarium."

"There are plenty of them hereabouts. Though one oughtn't to look for them when the tide is rising unless one knows the ground."

She had by this time collected the sketching materials and had come over again to where he stood. "You addressed me as Miss White just now. How did you know my name, sir? I don't recollect having ever met you before."

He laughed quietly. "Perhaps you are not as entirely unknown as you imagine. You were pointed out to me as an artist. Being something of one myself, I was interested. Permit me to say you paint exceedingly well."

She made a gesture of dissent. "I only wish I could feel that what you tell me is true."

"Be assured that I never praise without cause," he returned quickly.

She busied herself in some way near her sister and said nothing.

After a short pause, "I trust that if we should become better acquainted, I may be permitted to sometime see your work. Pardon me for having forced my company upon you so long;" he lifted his hat and passed away under the trees. The elder sister turned and looked after him, half-expecting that he would glance backward at them, but he did not, and was soon out of sight. She remembered him now; he had been among the tennis-players; he, too, was one of the lordlings of the earth.

"What do you think of him, pet?" for she was accustomed to trust to her sister's intuitive perceptions of true gold and false.

"He is a true man," answered the other, "without fear and without reproach."

A hush fell upon them, broken only by the monotonous roar of the breakers. Grace seated herself and began to sketch a gnarled stump before her, about which were growing gay-colored flowers. Her sister clasped her hands behind her head and lay back on the rocks and mosses.

"Without fear and without reproach," she repeated. "Sister, you should love a man like that."

A brush fell from Grace's lap on the rocks. She stooped and picked it up before replying, "Yes."

"Yes. Ah, if I had only the gift of sight I might love such a one myself. Perhaps my infirmity quickens my other senses, but I know by his voice that he is a man one might trust utterly."

"It may be so. I had not thought of it," returned her sister, busy over her sketch.

"Some day you will think of it, and then you will go away from me and——"

"Hush!" The other rose quickly and pressed an impulsive kiss on her sister's brow. "What have I done that I should deserve this?"

It was no more than just that Miss White should notice him when they next met, and having done so she could not blame him for joining her. He introduced himself frankly, and in his off-hand, easy way at once won her favor. A foot-hold thus gained, he rapidly developed in her a strong interest, so that she learned to consult him in many matters relating to her work, and to place reliance upon what he said. Though not forward or obstrusive in his intentions, he was nevertheless so much occupied with her that his former companions saw less and less of him. He was by no means a great "catch," yet one or two of the summer loiterers did not consider it unworthy to engage in a slight flirtation with him—such a one as consists in moonlight strolls along the bar, or evenings passed in threading the little fleet of yachts clustered around the pier,—which, if conducted by one more in earnest than he might have become serious. But, however he might be inclined to flirt with those who invited it, his intercourse with the fair young artist and her sister was free from any suspicion of it. Sometimes a bunch of wild flowers—it was astonishing what numbers of them he found—or of cultivated plants found its way to cheer her on whom all beauties of color were lost; or his timely suggestions supplied the one thing lacking to insure the ready sale of the pictures upon which depended so much; one or two sketches, the joint work of both, added to the little pile which was steadily accumulating; sometimes he read to them while one worked and the other listened in contentment too complete for words; occasionally as they floated near one or another of the rocky islets he would sing ballads to the accompaniment of his banjo.

As the summer deepened, deepened with it their intimacy. He heeded not society calls to other summer resorts; he seemed unmindful of the enchantment of sweet voices which had been wont to cast over him their spells. His thoughts, his mind, his soul, were absorbed in this great enchantment, which overtopped them all. Small wonder was it that the elder sister, coming suddenly in, saw the younger's face buried with passionate fervor in a handful of flowers. Small wonder was it that in the moment of her happiness, as they stood together in the glow of the setting sun, she forgot for an instant what she had seen, and answering, met his lips as they sought hers. And then she dreaded to speak of what had come to her, and for the first time the bond of absolute confidence between the two young girls was broken. Yet, none the less was he with them both; none the less did he shower kindly attentions upon the poor helpless girl, and, if he sometimes took advantage of her infirmity to touch her sister's lips, or press her sister's hand, who shall blame him for it?

He rowed them at evening out into the bay. Calm and still were the waters, the moon looked over the mountain-tops, and made a path of silver over the sea; and beneath it all was the great treachery of the tide, which set with a strong current away from the shore. An oar snapped somehow—he had taken but two—and the rower, seizing the other, attempted to skull again into the harbor. But the force of the waters was too mighty; he was borne backward, and, as the lights paled and faded or were concealed by intervening rocks and trees, he became for the first time uneasy. Then he called, and his voice rang loudly over the water, but it met with no answering cry.

He ceased skulling and looked blankly about him. A heavy cloud arose and obscured the moon. Afar off a pale flash of lightning gleamed, and the dull, distant boom of the thunder proclaimed the coming of the storm god. Grace rose and clung to her lover's arm, for she was of a timid nature after all; but when she asked her sister if she were not afraid, a high smile lighted up the blind girl's face, and she made answer deeply: "I fear nothing since Walter is here to protect us." A blush of shame rose to the other's face. This love which trusted so utterly was indeed greater than hers, for she had sought a visible support. So they drifted till the mountain-tops and the distant land-line were enveloped in a black shroud, and around them was only the softly-swelling sea.

The blind girl shivered and drew her shawl more closely about her. "I am cold," she murmured; and her sister rose from her lover's side and went over to her, and gathered her into her embrace. "Thank you, dear," she said, and nestled into her sister's arms.

"The tide must be nearly at its ebb," said Walter bravely; "we will be carried back before morning."

Out of space behind them came a black shape, silently, like a ghost, gliding over the sea. Two colored lights, its eyes, glared at them; a third clung higher, and gently swayed from side to side. Propelled by some mysterious influence, the great misshapen thing crept nearer, as though to run them down and destroy them. From it presently came a sound of music, and a change in its course revealed a line of lighted cabin windows, which again swung out of sight.

Pattering drops, the edge of the passing storm, swept over the boat. Walter rose. "Steamer a-ho-oy!" he cried. There was no response. Thank heaven that he had at least powerful lungs! Again his clear voice rose, and now an answering trumpet-blast. "Where away?" smote on their ears with startling nearness.

"In a row-boat—dead ahead—or broken—drifting out to sea!"

A thrill seemed to pass through the nearing shape, a lantern hurriedly crossed it, a confused group of shadows rushed hither and thither; then the onward motion slowed, and on deck a blue light suddenly blazed, illuminating the sea with a strange, steely glare. It flooded the faces of those in the boat; so near were they that fifty yards advance would infallibly have crushed them. By it they could see that some of the shadows wore long robes; and now their voices were heard, sweet and clear, among the deeper tones around them. Arms were extended, fingers pointed.

"Lower a boat," cried Fillebrown; "I can not skull against the tide."

They were indeed sweeping past the steam yacht; every foot was taking them further away. The blue light went out, a second was lighted up, the davits creaked as a cutter struck the water and flew toward them.

"Ladies!" exclaimed the coxswain, in a surprised tone. He had evidently not expected such. It was the work of a moment to fasten the boats together; then sturdy arms pull them back to the steamer.

"Let Nellie go first." But she shrank back as her fingers touched the cold iron. "Where am I?" she cried.

"It is only the ladder, pet, leading to the deck." Yet she hesitated: she turned uncertainly. Fillebrown interpreted her wish, though he was far from suspecting its cause. As his hand touched her she trembled a little, then became passive, and courageously began that ascent of which she knew nothing. But his arm supported her; at that moment, wet and chilled through as she was, she was happy. As they gained the deck someone came to meet them.

"Ask the lady to step this way into the cab—why Fillebrown! now are you? What brings you here?"

"I will tell you in good time." He clasped his friend's hand, then in a low voice, "Take charge of her for a moment, please; she is blind."

"Poor girl!" A look of pity passed over the other's face as he hesitated to comply.

In another moment Grace stood beside him. They joined the others. "Mr. Adams—Miss White—Miss Nellie White."

The owner of the "Siren" bowed courteously to the ladies, perhaps more to the second, though she could not know it, than to the first, then led the way to the cabin.

A young fellow rushed from some shadowy corner up to Fillebrown and shook his hand with enthusiasm. "How are you, Walter, old boy!" he cried. "Delighted to see you;" then lower, "She's a 'stunner.' Introduce me, will you? Who is she?"

"My betrothed wife," answered the other, calmly; and then the "Siren" resumed her course and sped through the thunder-storm into a safe harbor at last.

Every day the task which Grace had set for herself became more difficult. Why had she not spoken at first? Why had she prevented Fillebrown from speaking, and influenced him by specious pleas to conceal from her sister their relation to each other? For the poor blind girl's love for him had become almost a passion, and she, accustomed to confide in her sister, confided this to her also—her hopes, her doubts, her fears. "Does he love me?" she would say. "Sometimes I almost think so, he is so kind, so tender, so gentle. How could he be this if he did not love? And yet, no—he can not, I am blind and helpless; he knows I would be a burden to him, even as I am to you. Do you think he loves me, sister?" And that sister unnerved by the great sorrow which tortured her, would murmur some reply which quieted the questioning for a little, and soothed the questioner's troubled heart.

This sorrow she must bear alone, for it must never be told to him, and he, manlike, strayed not into the faintest suspicion of it. What a terrible double part she was forced to play, and how would it end? Some disclosure, some breaking of the charm which now held her sister in its power, and then—oh, what an awakening would be hers. For her only chance of happiness in this world lay in this, and this could not be.

The long summer days glided into their fruition and decay; on every side were evidences of migration; the gaudy-plumed birds of passage were about to resume their way, and leave this northern climate for a more congenial abiding-place. Yet these three lingered; the golden-rod blossomed for them, and the trees put on their gayest livery; the rocks reflected in sinuous lines the glory about them; the sea took on a colder hue, and the sea anemones, with their hosts of cousins and cousinsgerman, drew themselves farther from the unfriendly air.

On an elevation overlooking the bay and town sat the lovers, through the branches the sun sent down his kindliest rays—poor, cold things they were at best—upon them. For a while a desultory conversation had been kept up; but now the third, reclining among her shawls, lulled by the faint roaring of the breakers, had fallen asleep.

Presently, seeing this, the two took up again the old subject; that never-tiring subject which held in its power the hopes, almost life, of that other so near.

"No, Walter. It can not be. Your income is not large enough to support three, and Nellie must always be my care."

"Yet you earn barely enough to make both ends meet."

"We can struggle along," she smiled faintly. "Better it is that you should wait; you are young yet and have a future. Achieve it! Some day, perhaps in five years, perhaps one, your talent will be properly recognized, then I will come to you gladly."

"And I must wait till then?"

"Yes, dear; we will not become a drag to pull you down. Perhaps—though it is almost a sin to say it—perhaps if I were alone, I would yield to you and come now; we could fight our battle together and make ourselves a foothold."

"Your words are sound sense;" he spoke bitterly now—"there speaks the woman of business." He caught her appealing look and checked himself, "I know you are right, darling, but what you say is none the less distressing for that. No. It has indeed narrowed itself down to this. My income will not suffice for three; but it might for two. This is a lesson I must learn; and, having learned, must profit by it."

He rose and paced nervously over the fallen leaves; she rose, too, and clasped her hands about his arm. "But I love you just the same, Walter."

"I know it, my dear, noble girl; and it will not be my fault if our marriage is long delayed."

They passed away together into the full gladness of the sunlight. A slight figure sank still deeper into the coverings about her; she emitted a smothered cry—they, bound up in each other, heard it not—then voice and form alike were still.

Presently the two returned. "She is still sleeping," said he, glancing at her, but his companion saw there a nameless something which filled her with dread. With a bound she was at her side. "Nellie!" she cried, but the lips moved not in answer, nor was the pressure of her hand returned. "Walter, come here. What is the matter?"

The face was white and cold. An agony seemed to have left there its fearful impress. The little hands clutched a few broken twigs and leaves; but the pulse beat still, though uncertainly and faintly. The two fell beside her, and rubbed her cold palms and colder brow. Water, which they had brought with them, was dashed in her face, and at last she revived. Slowly the color chased away the pallor of her cheeks.

"What has happened?" though the elder sister trembled as she asked the question, knowing full well the reply.

"Can you ask me, Grace?" What piteousness in her tone! What a world of reproach in her sightless eyes! "My God!" murmured the unhappy girl, "my cross is greater than I can bear."

And in their privacy of their chamber that night: "You were cruel, sister. He would not knowingly have deceived me so."

Thereafter on this subject she held her peace. Only the pallor of her face—its hard, pinched look—the listlessness of her movements, told of the great forbearance which she exercised; of the struggle which was going on within. Still she accompanied them on their artistic strolls, but she took little or no part in their conversation, seeming always to hug some phantom of her imagination, or to meditate upon some overmastering resolve. And once, as they sat by the shore, they missed her calling, they received no answer; searching, they found her not; till at last——

For the poor girl had dragged herself to where the moaning sea attracted her—through the scanty woods, over the shelving rocks—till the froth of the breakers rolled up to her feet, and their voices bellowed, inviting, in her ears.

"Yes, yes, I come to you,' she whispered; "it is the only way. I am always a drag, always a hindrance. Without me they could be happy. Oh, my loved one—my sister—accept my sacrifice, and rejoice."

Gently she slid into the waters. "It is cold," she murmured, "but I will not be cold long; it will soon be over, soon——." The waves engulfed her; a bubbling cry, a faint struggle, and then——

So they found her, lying peacefully but an arm's depth beneath the sea, whose spray sparkled in the sunlight, and made about her an aureole like that of the Christian martyr.

Years may come and go, but will those two ever reach that happiness which seemed so near? Ah, no! The act which should have united them has parted them forever; unless in the hereafter they may meet and be joined for eternity by her loving and forgiven spirit.

SCIENTIFIC GOSSIP.

Protection to Oil Paintings—Cardograms—False Comets—Ingenious Contrivance for Steamship Shaft, &c., &c.

Rapid progress is making on the Atlantic North Railway, South Africa. When completed this line will form a short and direct route between the coast and the Free State and Basutoland.

At Bourke, New South Wales, the average temperature of the hottest part of the year for the first fifteen days of the present year was 119.6° Fahrenheit, and the highest temperature recorded during that period was 122° Fahrenheit.

Mr. W. H. Massey, of the Society of Telegraph Engineers, London, has strongly advocated the introduction of a small engine and dynamo-electric machine on each locomotive in order to supply incandescent lamps, by means of which, the maintains, railroad carriages can be lighted better and cheaper than by gas-jets.

The first Londoner according to the Builder, who idtroduced conduit water into his premises, was a tradesman of Fleet-street. This is how a record of 1478 sets forth the occurrence: "A wax chandler in Fleet-street had by crafte perced a pipe of lead condit withynne the ground and so conveyed the water into his selar; wherefore he was judged to ride through the citie with a mytre dit uppon his hedde," the city crier meanwhile preceding the criminal and proclaiming his offense.

Card telegrams are much in use in Paris. There are two kinds of them—one like the ordinary postal card in form and color, and the other blue and capable of being so folded as to conceal the writing. They are not large enough to contain a message of more than 60 words When a card is dropped into the card telegram box of the nearest telegraph office the official in charge picks it up and has it transmitted through one of the pneumatic tubes which extend all over the city, thus insuring its delivery at the place to which it is addressed in less than half an hour from the time it was "posted."

A correspondent of the Scientific American describes several false comets observed by himself and others in and near Philadelphia within recent years. He ascribes them to reflection by a water-charged atmosphere of the sharp and well-defined flames produced by the ignition of natural gas at the extremity of escape pipes. Other places in Pennsylvania have been the scene of similar phenomena under analogous circumstances. Probably similar spectacles witnessed on Porto Rico and Sulphur Springs may, when all the facts are thoroughly sifted, be found to have their origin in not disimilar terrestrial agencies

M. Cailletet, one of the two French savants who succeeded in liquidizing the last of the gases, has invented an apparatus for the continuous production of intense cold. It consists of a closed steel cylinder containing a coil of copper pipe, the ends of which project from each head of the cylinder. Two copper tubes are also screwed into the cylinder, and one of them communicates with the mercurial piston pump already used by Cailletet, while the other receives the ethylene which has been compressed by the pump and cooled by methyl coloride. A circuit is then formed in which the same quantity of condensed ethylene is repeatedly evaporated in the copper coil, producing intense cold, and then compressed again by the pump being sufficiently cooled with ethyl chloride and ready for evaporation again.

In the absence of flexibility other than that provided by the springing of the screw shaft of a steamship the Engineer maintains that breakages will occur, and in order to minimize the results of fractures, suggests an ingenious expedient borrowed from rolling mill practice. In rolling mills a "breaking spindle" is always introduced between the driving wheel and the roll trains to save the rolls and gearing from the effects of undue strains. This spindle is simply a short length of shafting of smaller section than the rolls or roll-necks. If something must give way it will be the weak or breaking spindle, which being of cast iron, can be replaced for a few shillings, and with no more than a few minutes' delay. Why, very pertinently asks our contemporary, should not screw shafts have one short length in each, with a strength of, say 75 per cent of the rest of the shaft? Two or three lengths might be carried. If the shaft breaks at all it will be here, and the broken bit can be taken out and replaced by a sound section in a couple of hours.

A Good Clerk.

A good clerk is a prize too rarely found, and when found often unappreciated. When a man has a clerk in whom he can place confidence, he may regard himself as extremely fortunate. One good clerk will do more, and do it better, than two poor ones. He does not require constant looking after. When he does anything there is no necessity for his employer to do it over again. He will always take pains to treat customers well and serve them with exactly what they want. He never acts as if he owns the whole establishment, and a very large portion of the world outside of it. He is polite, unassuming and anxious to forward his employer's interests. He is sufficiently level headed to recognize the fact that the more his employer's business increases the better is his own chance for advancement. With this end in view he naturally takes a close personal interest in the business. When a man is fortunate enough to get such an employe, he would do well to endeavor to retain him. If he wants a holiday once in a while, let him have it. He will appreciate it and make it up to you. Should he ask a favor of you, grant it, as by so doing it will make him regard you as his best friend and the bond between you will be one of friendship as well as business interest. Many employers overlook the fact that a good clerk is a person of some influence. He can always bring trade with him, and need never be at a loss for employment. If he leaves one employer he can readily obtain a position with another, probably in the same neighborhood, and draw trade to his latest employer. When you get a good clerk keep him. You can feel a sense of security when you go to market or for an evening's recreation if you leave such a person in charge. Your business will be well attended to, and even if you pay him a liberal salary, you will find it a benefit in the long run.

MURDER MOST FOUL.

Aged Couple Brutally Murdered—The Crime a Mystery—Empanelling the Jury.

A murder trial which promises to be a sensational one recently commenced at Chicago, and it is not without interest to Canadians, as the accused is one Neil McKeague, the son of a farmer who lives near Thorold. Most murders in Chicago, though brutal, are done in the light of day; but this one is shrouded in mystery. The story of the crime is briefly this:—Sixteen miles north of Chicago lies the pretty little suburban village of Winnetka. In a handsome two-storied cottage, isolated from the other houses, lived James L. Willson and his wife. Willson was 72 years old and his wife 82 years. They were wealthy, and the husband frequently came to the city to superintend his money matters. On Wednesday, the 13th, a young lady named Miss Emma Myer (whose custom it was to call at the house and remain with the old lady while her son was in the city), rang the door bell, but received no answer. The house was closed, and no noise could be heard inside. She passed to the rear, and entered through a kitchen window. What a sight met her gaze!

BLOOD WAS EVERYWHERE,

on the walls, the ceiling, the furniture, the floor. The old man Willson lay near the door of his bed-chamber, dead. Two bullets were lodged in his body, and the breast-bone and nine ribs had been crushed in by the stamping of the murderer upon him. Upon the bed, in her bed, was Mrs. Willson, beaten almost out of human semblance. The right arm lay outside the blood-soaked coverlet. Her thin fingers were grasping a stout cane which had snapped in two when she defended herself. She had been beaten to death with a pair of iron tongs, which were found dripping with blood at the bedside. Her lower jaw was splintered, her eyes gouged, and her right arm broken in two places. The young woman was horrified, and ran to a shoemaker whose shop was within sight, and solicited his assistance. That person was Mr. McKeague, the new prisoner. When he came to the shop she found McKeague standing in the doorway, looking apparently towards Willson's house.

THE CRIME A MYSTERY.

Who committed the murders was naturally the first thought. Its object was plainly money; but why should robbers kill the old people if they were not known to them, as ordinary professional cracksmen would have done? A number of arrests were made of a horde of tramps and other suspicious persons seen in the neighbourhood, but there was no evidence forthcoming to warrant their detention. The heir of the old couple lived in the services of Pinkerton's detectives, and a clue was quickly followed up, which led to an arrest. At the time of the murder there was snow upon the ground. Tracks were found in the snow leading to the front gate. Exact plaster casts of these tracks were taken by the detectives. In the room where the crime was committed were found three rubber vest buttons of peculiar make. The name of a Paris maker was stamped on them. All were blood-stained. He had a piece of cloth attached, as if rent from somebody's clothes. These valuable pieces in the evidence were naturally taken charge of. The day before the murder, Willson had received a considerable sum of money through the sale of some property. All his money, his gold watch, a memorandum book, and other valuable papers were gone; but $570 in cash and $3,000 in village bonds were found in an old trunk undisturbed. They were probably overlooked.

THE SUSPICION FIXED.

Among the villagers who was fond of discussing the murder was the young Canadian clerk, McKeague. He repeated constantly, with varying details, a story to the effect that the night before the murder Willson had come to his store and said "that he expected company that night and wanted an extra nice lunch." The constant reiteration of this story in proper whisper that it might be heard where there was an object in his doing so. Finally he became loud talking. McKeague's suspicion fell off. His store was closed. It became known that McKeague had received a large sum of money, but that this debt was taken in the form of bills paid off by the murderer. Detectives watched McKeague. His clothes were examined and the three buttons found off buttons upon his clothes. The detectives identified the threads attached to them as being the same material as the vests. His pistol carried bullets of the same calibre as those in the old people. Despite his protestations of innocence circumstantial evidence was sufficient for his arrest. His father, a gentlemanly old man, came on from Thorold, Ont., interviewed his son, and proclaimed him guiltless. He then secured able counsel and employed detectives in the defence.

MCKEAGUE IN THE DOCK.

His trial was opened before Judge Anthony. The prisoner is a cleanly-shaved, pale-faced, rather good-looking man, and remarkably free from the hang-dog appearance usually ascribed to murderers. He was fashionably but inexpensively dressed. His coat was closely buttoned to the chin. A bright cameo pin relieved his dark scarf. His collar was altogether of the latest fashion, and his get-up unlike that of a man who has been in gaol for some time. His hair was worn short, and parted nearly in the middle. The whole day was wasted in challenging the jurors. Everybody who had conscientious objections to capital punishment, or were over 60 years old, or who had formed an opinion about the murder from reading the newspapers were allowed to stand aside. It was amusing to notice how the "predetermined conviction" racket was worked by the jurors who wanted to get away. From ten in the morning till five in the afternoon not a single juror had been selected. If somebody had put the newspaper reading test to the presiding judge it is possible he would have "excused" himself from attendance also.

EMPANELLING A JURY.

The McKeague trial continues to draw a crowded court, although not a particle of evidence has yet been submitted. Only four jurors having been sworn so far. Every person presented as a possible juror is as a rule willingly excused from further attendance. Nearly one hundred persons have been rejected. McKeague's counsel appears confident of a verdict of acquittal, and so do his aged Scotch father and mother, who are here from Thorold. His sister, aunt, and affianced, Belle Hagen, are in court every day. The press is devoting much attention to the trial, and one journal is publishing neat sketches of the principal witnesses, counsel, &c. All the evidence is circumstantial and is now centered around a single waistcoat button with a few threads attached. The defence confidently assert McKeague's innocence, and maintain that Pinkerton's Detective Agency employed by the prosecution to work the case up knowe that he is guiltless. For this latter reason the defence challenged all the jurors who have had dealings with these renowned detectives.

Major-General F. D. Middleton.

Major-General Middleton, who has accepted the command of the Canadian Militia, will proceed to Ottawa immediately upon his arrival in the country to assume his new duties. The General will be much missed at the Royal Military College, Sandhurst, where he has been Commandant and Secretary since September, 1874. In alluding to his departure from that establishment the Army and Navy Gazette says that he has earned the respect and gratitude of everybody, and that the thoroughness with which he has carried out the duties of his by no means sinecure appointment has done much to raise the general tone of the college. The Gazette goes on to say that it would have been impossible to have found a more worthy successor to General Luard, and if Major-General Middleton does not continue the good work commenced by Sir Edward Selby Smith and continued by General Luard, it will be due to a want of official encouragement on the part of the Canadian Government, and not to any lack of zeal on his part.

The General is already well known in Canada, where he first came at the time of the Trent affair as a Major in the 29th Regt. The headquarters of that corps were at Hamilton, but Major Middleton spent a great deal of his time in Montreal, where he is widely known and universally liked. After serving some ten years on the staff of General Windham he left for home at the time of the withdrawal of the Imperial troops, and soon afterwards was appointed Commandant of the Royal Military College. The General obtained his first commission as ensign on the 30th December, 1842, and saw his first active service in 1846, in the southern part of New Zealand, where he took part in the attack on Wanganui. He afterwards served in India during the Santhal rebellion and the never to be forgotten Sepoy Mutiny of 1857-58. He was orderly officer to General Franks in the action of Soltanpore, and subsequent affairs on the advance to Lucknow. At the siege and capture of that city he was A. D. C. to General Luard, and took part in the storming of Bank's House, and the Martiniere, where his gallant conduct gained him the Brevet of Major. The General subsequently served in nearly all the principal actions during the mutiny, and was time and again specially mentioned in home despatches and has received the order of Commander of the Bath. According to the new rules relative to compulsory retirement Major-General Middleton would have had to leave the army as a Colonel next November, but getting the command of the Canadian Militia and his Major-Generalship he can now serve on for some years. The General was recommended to Lord Clyde by Lieut.-General Sir E Lugard for the Victoria Cross for two acts of bravery of which the following is a brief outline: On April 15, 1858, in the engagement near Azemghur a troop of the military train charged a large body of rebels. Captain Middleton, staff officer, had been ordered by Sir Edward Lugard to take command of the party and gallantly he led it. In the melee, Lieutenant Hamilton, 3rd. Sikh Cavalry, fell from his horse mortally wounded. A body of Sepoys, tulwar in hand, rushed at him to cut him to pieces, Captain Middleton and Farrier Francis Murphy, in a desperate hand to hand fight, killed several of the enemy and drove off the rest and enabled some others, who afterwards came up, to carry off the wounded officer. On the same day and about the same time, Private Fowles of the Military Train was unhorsed and wounded. The rebels were swarming about him and were on the point of cutting him to pieces when Captain Middleton cooly dismounted placed Fowles on his horse and brought him into camp. More devoted and heroic conduct was never rewarded by the Victoria Cross. Yet, though Murphy received the decoration in question, Lord Clyde declined to recommend Captain Middleton on the ground that he was on the personal staff at the time. In writing about this the Army and Navy Gazette stated that this was incorrect, for Captain Middleton had been expressly placed in command of the party. But even had he been merely present as a staff officer, the Gazette fails to see how that fact would have diminished the credit due for his unselfish and heroic conduct.

Corporal Punishment.

"Do you believe in corporal punishment?" asked a visitor in a large grammar school out West.

"That depends," replied the lady-teacher, with a peculiar look, "on the size of the boy. If he is bigger than I am, I try moral suasion."

"What if the moral suasion doesn't persuade?"

"In that case, I have a method which never fails."

"What is that?"

"I hand the ferule to the refractory pupil and compel him to give me as many strokes with it as he thinks his own punishment deserves."

"How many times have you done that?"

"Only twice within six years. So I think the system a good one."

"Yes, I should think it was," and the visitor went away, thoughtful.

The idea is by no means new. Every boy and girl who has read Miss Alcott's "Little Men" will remember the case of Father Baer and Emil. It must be said, however, that such a system of punishment might safely be followed by a lady-teacher, when the result would not always be so pleasant if a gentleman should adopt it.

Accounted For.

Mrs. Plaindame, after looking long and thoughtfully at a plaster cast of Shakspeare, remarked:

"Poor man! how pale he was! He couldn't have been well when it was taken."

"No," replied Fogg, "he was dead."

"Ah! that accounts for it," said Mrs. P., drawing a sympathetic breath.—Buffalo Express.

How to Prevent Fires.

The following simple precautions suggested by the New York Independent, if strictly followed, would prevent a great many destructive fires. The rules might be posted in every store, dwelling, and factory with good results:

The leading causes of fires are kerosene oil, matches, and furnaces.

1. Always buy the best quality of oil.
2. Never make a sudden motion with a lamp, either in lifting it or setting it down.
3. Never place a lamp on the edge of a table or mantel.
4. Never fill a lamp after dark, even if you should have to go without a light.
5. See that the lamp wicks are always clean and that they work freely in the tube.
6. Never blow out a lamp from the top.
7. Never take a light to a closet where there are clothes. If necessary to go to the closet, place the light at a distance.
8. Use candles just as much as possible in going about the house and in bedrooms. They are cheaper, can't explode, and for very many purposes are just as good as lamps.
9. Matches should always be kept in earthen jars, or in tin.
10. They should never be left where rats or mice can get hold of them. There is nothing more to the taste of a rat than phosphorus. They will eat it if they can get at it. A bunch of matches is almost certain to be set fire if a rat gets at it.
11. Have good safes in every place where matches are to be used, and never let a match be left on the floor.
12. Never let a match go out of your hand after lighting it until you are sure the fire is out, and then it is better to put it in a stove or an earthen dish.
13. It is far better to use the safety matches, which can only be lighted upon the box which contains them.
14. Have your furnaces examined carefully in the fall, and at least once during the winter by a competent person. All of the pipes and flues should be carefully looked to.
15. If there are any closets in the house near chimneys or flues, which there ought not to be, put nothing of a combustible nature in them.
16. Never leave any wood near a furnace, range, or stove to dry.
17. Have your stove looked to frequently, to see that there are no holes for coal to drop out.
18. Never put any hot ashes or coal in a wooden receptacle.
19. Be sure that there are no curtains or shades that can be blown into a gaslight.
20. Never examine a gas meter after dark.

Fires, of course, arise from other causes than those we have stated. Smokers burn up much valuable property which is not in the shape of cigars. Bunches of oiled rags of the most inanimate nature in themselves still perform the most wonderful feats in the destruction of property. Tramps, with their old pipes, will creep into barns and haymows, and servants will be careless in thousands of ways, but if every person who owns property will give the subject attention, and see that those around him are posted, and see that reasonable rules are always obeyed, many thousands of dollars could be saved annually which are now burned out of existence.

Great Men's Diversions.

Greatness unbending from its dignified surroundings to refresh itself with the amusements of commoner folk envelopes itself, in so doing, with a peculiar charm. Many a man plays on the floor with his children, without any fear that such rompings may go to make history. The diversions of busy men are seldom what we should imagine them to be; for the reason that, in order to produce the desired effect; they must as far as possible produce a contrast to their daily toil. Beethoven, when in want of a change after mental labor, liked best of all to run round the largest square in his vicinity. Hartley Coleridge, in the same way, was fond of tearing wildly round a field. Richter's relaxation was a long walk on a rainy day. He took his family with him—all being clad in clothing that a thorough wetting would not spoil. Jean Paul averred that the electrical effect of such a rain-bath on the human system is one of the best therapeutics in the world; and we incline to agree with him. Victor Hugo does his locomotion by proxy; next to playing with his grand-children he loves to knock about Paris on the top of omnibuses.

Carlyle, on the other hand, liked travelling inside an omnibus, though why, nobody, apparently has discovered. Adam Smith's sole indulgence (beyond a taste for finely bound books) was a passion for pedestrianism. Never was there a more peripatetic philosopher. One Sunday morning in 1775, he went to his door in Kirkcaldy, to feel the fresh air; the peripatetic instinct came upon him unawares. He walked straight away to Burntisland, many miles from Kirkcaldy, and astonished the kirk going folk there with an apparition in dressing-gown and slippers. During this particular walk Smith excogitated the first chapter of the "Wealth of Nations."

Scott was a great pedestrian, lame though he was. Christopher North once walked seventy miles in one day for some loch fishing; Dickens could have emulated the feat; and Professor Blackie has boasted that he has not only walked seventy miles in one day, but slept by the roadside during the following night. This eccentric Scotch Professor has made such good use of his legs that there are few towns in England and none in Scotland to which he has not walked. Mr. Fawcett, though blind, takes the keenest delight in fishing, and casts a fly with the utmost skill. Mr. Bright is another votary of the rod. At the Reform Club, in winter, he may be found playing billiards with the zest of a "good cue." But his highest enjoyment lies in our poets. He reads himself to sleep every night with the work of one of our classical bards. It may be wondered whether, in some secret drawer, the orator preserves some little bundle of his own verses, prompted by such continuous reading in the harmonious thoughts of mighty men. Campbell declared that there was no inspiration to the writing of poetry so good as the reading of poetry.

Little Nell: "Mamma, what is color blind?" Mamma: "Inability to tell one color from another, my dear." Little Nell: "Then I dess the man that made my geography is color-blind." Mamma: "And why?" Little Nell: "Because he's got Greenland painted Yellow, and the Red Sea painter black."

The Royal Wedding.

At the marriage of the Princess Victoria of Hesse to Prince Louis of Battenburg, recently in Darmstadt, the streets were profusedly decorated with flags in honor of the event, and were thronged with sightseers. After the performance of the civil marriage, the bride was led to the palace chapel by her grandmother, the mother of Grand Duke Louis. They were followed by a procession of Royal guests, Queen Victoria leading, followed by the Prince and Princess Imperial of Germany, the Prince and Princess of Wales, Princess Beatrice, Prince William of Prussia, and Prince Alexander, of Bulgaria, the brother of the bridegroom. In the bridal possession the bride and the bridegroom walked between the Princesses of Battenberg. When the bride and bridegroom exchanged rings at the altar a salute of thirty-six guns was fired. Queen Victoria stood during the choral portion of the services. At the conclusion of the ceremony she embraced the couple. The bride wore the veil of her mother, the late Princess Alice. All the guests except queen Victoria attended the banquet in the evening, The only toast drunk was to the health of the newly wedded pair. The couple afterward started for Jugenheim amid the plaudits of throngs of people. The streets were beautifully illuminated in the evening. A performance of "Colomba" was given on Wednesday at the Opera House. The Princess Victoria and Prince Louis of Battenberg occupied the front centre places of the royal box, and grouped around them were other royal personages. The city was brilliantly illuminated and there were a torchlight procession and serenades. Princess Victoria was born at Windsor, on the 5th of April, 1863. She is the eldest daughter of the Grand Duke Ludwig IV. of Hesse-Darmstadt and the late Princess Alice, daughter of Queen Victoria. Prince Louis of Battenberg is a comely, graceful young fellow and a great favorite in royal German Circles. He is the oldest son of Prince Alexander of Hesse, the uncle of the Grand Duke. This young Prince was born May 24th, 1854, and became a naval officer in the British navy, besides being an officer in the Hessian Royal Artillery. He is of an ambitious nature, and took a decided position of activity in pushing his brother Alexander into place as Prince of Bulgaria He first met the Princess in Darmstadt, and, obtaining the aid of the Prince of Wales, pursued his suit and got the sanction of the head of the Hesse house. He then proceeded to Windsor, when the Queen of England approved the betrothal, thus adding another link to the Germain chain that encircles the British throne.

Blessed for Charity.

A little old woman, pale-faced and bowed in form, dressed in the habit of the order of St. Vincent de Paul, is always to be found pacing the wards or corridors of the chain of institutions which surround the block bounded by Sixty-eighth and Sixty-ninth streets, Lexington and Third Avenues, New York. This is Sister Irene, the foster mother of thousands of foundlings. Toddlers of all complexions cling to her skirts and nestle at her side, awaiting her benignant smile and loving greeting. Four fully appointed buildings, the Asylum, St. Ann's and St. John's Hospitals, and an imposing chapel, occupy the square purchased by the efforts of this woman, who began her work without a penny in her pocket. Sister Irene and Mrs. P. L. Thebaud begged the first ten dollars that was the nest-egg of the fund to save the foundlings. Last week $10 017 was paid as wages to the nurses who take care of the children in their homes. There are nearly two thousand children in the asylum, besides 1,700 nurses outside. The number left in the creche daily average forty-nine. "The great effort of my life," says Sister Irene, "is to restore the mothers; if they come here they are shielded, and, by kindness and good counsel, brought back to a virtuous way of living."

A MAN

WHO IS UNACQUAINTED WITH THE GEOGRAPHY OF THIS COUNTRY, WILL SEE BY EXAMINING THIS MAP, THAT THE

CHICAGO, ROCK ISLAND & PACIFIC R'Y,

Being the Great Central Line, affords to travelers, by reason of its unrivaled geographical position, the shortest and best route between the East, Northeast and Southeast, and the West, Northwest and Southwest.

It is literally and strictly true, that its connections are all of the principal lines of road between the Atlantic and the Pacific.

By its main line and branches it reaches Chicago, Joliet, Peoria, Ottawa, La Salle, Geneseo, Moline and Rock Island, in Illinois; Davenport, Muscatine, Washington, Keokuk, Knoxville, Oskaloosa, Fairfield, Des Moines, West Liberty, Iowa City, Atlantic, Avoca, Audubon, Harlan, Guthrie Center and Council Bluffs, in Iowa; Gallatin, Trenton, Cameron and Kansas City, in Missouri, and Leavenworth and Atchison in Kansas, and the hundreds of cities, villages and towns intermediate. The

"GREAT ROCK ISLAND ROUTE,"

As it is familiarly called, offers to travelers all the advantages and comforts incident to a smooth track, safe bridges, Union Depots at all connecting points, Fast Express Trains, composed of COMMODIOUS, WELL VENTILATED, WELL HEATED, FINELY UPHOLSTERED and ELEGANT DAY COACHES; a line of the MOST MAGNIFICENT HORTON RECLINING CHAIR CARS ever built; PULLMAN'S latest designed and handsomest PALACE SLEEPING CARS, and DINING CARS that are acknowledged by press and people to be the FINEST RUN UPON ANY ROAD IN THE COUNTRY, and in which superior meals are served to travelers at the low rate of SEVENTY-FIVE CENTS EACH.

THREE TRAINS each way between CHICAGO and the MISSOURI RIVER.

TWO TRAINS each way between CHICAGO and MINNEAPOLIS and ST. PAUL, via the famous

ALBERT LEA ROUTE.

A New and Direct Line, via Seneca and Kankakee, has recently been opened, between Newport News, Richmond, Cincinnati, Indianapolis and La Fayette, and Council Bluffs, St. Paul, Minneapolis and intermediate points.

All Through Passengers carried on Fast Express Trains.

LARDINE MACHINE OIL

Is Manufactured Solely by McCall Bro's. & Co. Toronto, and is the only popular Machine Oil to-day in use by all mill men and farmers. Try Lardine.

Always leave home with loving words, for they may be the last.

"Why! What's the matter?" Lady—(With face enveloped in roll of hot cloths)—"Oh! I'm crazy with that Neuralgia that continually troubles me." —"Well, how foolish! Why don't you go to Hill Bro's. and get bottle of Fluid Lightning? It cured me in less than one minute. I always keep a bottle in the house. It only costs 25 cents. A. & M. 2

Good manners are made of petty sacrifices.

FLUID LIGHTNING.

There are but few that have never suffered almost intolerable pain from Toothache, Neuralgia, or like acute pains. To them such an instant relief in Fluid Lightning is an untold blessing in time of trouble. No disgusting offensive medicines to be taken for days. On application of Fluid Lightning cures. Sold at Hill Bro's. A. & M. 1

A habit well worthy of culture, that of looking on the bright side of things.

A WIDE AWAKE DRUGGIST.

Mr. A. Turner is always wide awake in his business, and spares no pains to secure the best of every article in his line. He has secured the agency for the celebrated Dr. King's New Discovery for Consumption. The only certain cure known for Consumption, Coughs, Colds, Hoarseness, Asthma, Hay Fever, Bronchitis, or any affection of the throat and lungs. Sold on positive guarantee. Will give you a trial bottle free. Regular size $1.00. 3

No man can improve in any company, for which he has not respect enough to be under some degree of restraint.

THOUSANDS SAY SO.

Mr. T. W. Atkins, Girard, Kan., writes: "I never hesitate to recommend your Electric Bitters to my customers, they give entire satisfaction and are rapid sellers." Electric Bitters are the purest and best medicine known and will positively cure Kidney and Liver complaints. Purify the blood and regulate the bowels. No family can afford to be without them. They will save hundreds of dollars in doctor's bills every year. Sold at fifty cents a bottle by A. Turner & Co. 3

People seldom improve when they have no other model but themselves to copy after.

THE EFFECTS OF WHISKEY.

The effects of whiskey are always evil, and those who feed upon alcoholic stimulants, vainly endeavoring to cure coughs and consumption, but nurse a viper. Hagyard's Pectoral Balsam is a remedy that is always reliable for all throat bronchial and lung troubles, and never does harm to any one.

Best men are moulded out of faults.

CURE FOR DEAFNESS.

As numerous testimonials will show, there is no more reliable cure for deafness than Hagyard's Yellow Oil. It is also the best remedy for ear ache, sore throat, croup, rheumatism, and for pains and lameness generally. Use externally and internally.

IMPORTANT CHANGES.

There are two periods in the life of every female when the system undergoes great changes. First the change from childhood to womanhood; next, that of womanhood to old age. These are the critical changes of life, and the system should be nourished and regulated by that matchless tonic, Burdock Blood Bitters. It is invaluable in all diseases peculiar to females.

Beware the fury of patient men.

FRAUDULENT TRANSACTIONS.

There are many frauds perpetrated in medicine, and many advertised remedies worse than useless. Not so with Hagyard's Yellow Oil. It remains as ever the best internal and external medicine for all pain, soreness and injuries with which human flesh is afflicted.

Every man is the architect of his own fortune.

BUCKLEN'S ARNICA SALVE.

The best Salve in the world for cuts, bruises sores, ulcers, salt rheum, fever sores, tetter, chapped hands, chilblains, corns, and all skin eruptions, and positively cures piles or no pay required. It is guaranteed to give perfect satisfaction, or money refunded. Price 25 cents per box. For Sale by A. Turner & Co.

National Pills are sugar coated, mild but thorough, and are the best Stomach and Liver Pill in use.

THE SECRET OUT.

The secret of beauty has been at last revealed. Without good health, pure blood and a fair clear skin none can possess good looks. What is more repulsive than pimples, blotches and a sallow or pasty complexion? Burdock Blood Bitters reveal the fact that all can gain pure blood and freedom from the repulsive diseases of the skin that result from impurities.

WHAT IS LARDINE.

Ask any farmer, thresher or saw mill man, or in fact any man who runs machinery of any kind and he will tell you that it is the only machine Oil which will wear equal to Castor Oil, and won't gum or clog your machinery, For sale at Haskett Bro's, Markdale. 176-215

The greater the difficulty, the more the glory in surmounting it.

WHAT IN A NAME?

Scrofula is so called from the Latin scrofa, a pig, from the supposition that the disease came from eating swine's flesh. It is often inherited from parents, and leades to abscesses, ulcerous sores, debility, king's evil and consumption. The case of the Rev. Wm. Stout, of Wiarton, who suffered 23 years from scrofulous abscesses, is one of the most remarkable on record. Burdock Blood Bitters cured him after the best medical skil had failed.

M. G. Peterman, a farmer living in the suburbs, has discovered a way of manufacturing solidified whiskey, making it into pocket plugs like tobacco. He claims that he can also distil it in liquid form so it will be the equivalent of two and three years old whiskey as it comes from the still. He has refused $100,000 for the invention.

FLUID LIGHTNING.

Fluid Lightning is the only cure for Toothache, Headache, Earache, and Neuralgia. It does not take a day or an hour to cure it, but in less than a minute all pain is gone. Thousands have tested its merits within the last year. Fluid Lightning is also a positive cure for Rheumatism. The worst possible cases have been permanently cured in one week. Price 25 cents at Hill Bro's. A. & M. 3

Gen. Grant has lost all his fortune by speculation, but Senator Edmunds has introduced a bill to place him on the retired list of the army, with pay at the rate of $19,000 a year. He has asked the Senate to hurry up the bill, stating that the request was made for reasons which he presumed everybody understood. Probably the bill will be passed, and from a pecuniary standpoint Grant will be in a better position then if he could persuade the people to elect him president for life.

Like dew drops falling on a flower

To cultivate the mind.

Pride of The Lakes.

"ALGOMA," "ALBERTA," "ATHABASKA."

EVER since it was officially announced, and difinitely settled that Owen Sound was to be the starting point for the Canadian Pacific railway line of steel steamships, the inhabitants have taken a lively interest in their welfare and movements, and when the news came that the first one, the Algoma, had left Port Colborne it is safe to say that every citizen of our town was on the qui vive to see them, and not only to see them but settle once for all whether our harbor was of sufficient depth and capacity to admit them, and allow them to turn and do business therein. These points may now be considered placed at rest, for the three of them have been here, loaded, and departed on their first trip. The Algoma was the first to arrive on Saturday morning last about ten o'clock, and it was quite evident for the display of bunting, large crowds wending their way towards the dock, and expectant look on every countenance that something out of the ordinary run of things was about to happen, and by the time the magnificent palace steamship reaches the railway dock, standing room was at a premium. The crowd was one of the largest ever seen in Owen Sound, and the Algoma was welcomed by blowing of whistles and and ringing cheers, flags were displayed from the town hall, custom house, elevator and many private residences. As soon as the Algoma had been tied to the dock, an immense number went on board and were soon engaged in thoroughly inspecting every part of her, and the universal expression was that nothing like her had ever been seen on Canadian waters before, her graceful lines, beautiful proportions and elegant furniture and fittings, her machinery, the electric light, and in fact everything connected with her was pronounced without an equal on fresh water. There is no doubt that everything that money could supply has been provided without stint in preparing these magnificent steamers for the traffic in which they will be engaged between here and Port Arthur. The Algoma arrived on Saturday and was followed by the Alberta on Sunday evening, and the Athabaska on Tuesday evening, the three are as much alike as it would be possible to build them and the most practised eye could not tell one from the other if seen so that the name could not be read. Space precludes our giving a full description of the floating palaces, but those of our readers who perused the account of them which appeared in the Advertiser from the Globe of some weeks ago may rest assured that they are fully up to the description there given, and if possible surpass it, as they were not furnished at the time the Globe reporter visited them. These steamers are not built on the ginger bread style by any means, but are intended for practical, solid business, and the first trip out on Sunday morning the Algoma had on board over eleven hundred passengers most of them emigrants from England, Scotland and Sweden. The Alberta after taking on nearly a thousand tons of freight and about four hundred passengers left on her first trip Tuesday evening, and the Athabaska leaves this afternoon with a full load of freight and a large number of passengers. The rush of business round the dock has now commenced, and the traffic over the road will be taxed to the utmost to keep the palace fleet loaded. The three boats are commanded as follows, the Algoma Capt. Moore, late of the Sarnia line, the Alberta, Capt. Anderson, late of Campana, and the Athabaska by Capt. Foote, a townsman of our own, and who last season sailed the Pacific, all first class men, and as they each have now one of the finest steamers ever run on fresh water, we wish each and all of them a prosperous and successful career.—O. S. Advertiser.

THE SECRET OUT.

The secret of beauty has been at last revealed. Without good health, pure blood and a fair clear skin none can possess good looks. What is more repulsive than pimples, blotches and a sallow or pasty complexion? Burdock Blood Bitters reveal the fact that all can gain pure blood and freedom from the repulsive diseases of the skin that result from impurities.

Gen. Grant's Finances.

The recent financial crash of the banking firm of Grant and Ward, in New York, will probably prove a a most serious blow to the whole Grant family. The failure possesses a good deal of its interest to the public in knowledge of that fact. The leading member of the firm is a son of General Grant, and it is said that the ex-President himself was a kind of sleeping partner in the concern. So far as is yet learned, the General and a younger son had all their available funds invested in its business affairs, and all is gone. Ulysses Grant, jr., is reported to say that he supposed himself worth a million and three-quarters before that crash came and had no intimation whatever of the failure until it was made public. He married a rich wife and her fortune is included in the loss, as well as three-quarters of a million of the funds of the father-in-law. Politically this unexpected turn in affairs may have its effect. There are a great many politicians in the Republican party who still desire to cling to Gen. Grant's fortunes, and whatever hopes they may have had of getting him again nominated for President are about dissipated now. It would be out of the question to nominate him while under this financial cloud, much as public sympathy may be extended to him in his present misfortunes.

Prohibitory Clauses of the Scott Act.

Following is the substance of the prohibitory clauses of the Scott Act:—

Intoxicating liquors can be sold only by druggists or other vendors licensed by the Government, and their number must not exceed one in a township or parish, two in a town, and one for every four thousand inhabitants in a city.

Wine can be sold only for sacramental purposes, on certificate of a clergyman, stating that the wine is required for that purpose.

For medicinal porposes intoxicating liquor can only be sold on certificate from a medical man.

For art, trade, manufactures, etc., a certificate from two justices of the peace and the affirmation of the applicant are required; and when selling for any of the above purposes the druggist must file certificate and affirmation, and register name of purchaser and quantity sold.

In holesale quantities not less than ten and in the case of beer not less than eight, gallons can be sold at a time, and then only a druggists or other licensed vendors, or to persons who will take it out of the county, or beyond the limits of any other counties where the Scott Act is in force.

If passed in any county, its towns, villages, and every division or municipality, except cities, is included.

Lost on Lake Superior.

CHICAGO, May 17.—The propeller J. Seaverns, which left Chicago last week Thursday for Port Arthur, has gone to the bottom of Lake Superior and may be prove a total loss. All of her passengers and crew escaped. The total loss is $32,934. The boat was commanded by Capt. W. Pritchard, and had a crew of fourteen men. She had a cargo of supplies for the Canadian Pacific railway and a number of passengers. The Seaverns was formerly a steam barge of 173 tons burden and was sold last winter to Walter Ross, a Canadian.

Centennial Day and Methodist Union.

Our readers are aware that according to Act of Parliament, the union of the various Methodist churches in Canada takes effect on Sunday, June the 1st. This is one of the most important events, we think, which ever took place in the History of Canadian Methodism. It is proper that it should be duly observed and celebrated. The General Superintendents will doubtless announce the arrangements that have been made for this purpose. The General Conference recommended that, in connection with this event, should also be combined the Centennial celebration of the organization of Methodism as a distinct Church on this continent. It is just a century ago this year since the first Methodist Conference was organized in America.

A STARTLING DISCOVERY.

Physicians are often startled by remarkable discoveries. The fact that Dr. King's New Discovery for Consumption and all Throat and Lung diseases is daily curing patients that they have given up to die, is startling them to realize their sense of duty, and examine into the merits of this wonderful discovery; resulting in hundreds of our best Physicians using it in their practice. Trial bottles free at A. Turner, & Co's. Drug Store. Regular Size $1.00. 4

Important to Toronto and Wingham.

WINGHAM, May 16.—Mr. Meyer, mayor of Wingham, has received a communication from the President of the Ontario and Quebec railway stating that he and the manager of the railway will shortly pay a visit to Wingham, with the view of inspecting the country through which the proposed extension of four miles from the Toronto, Grey and Bruce railway may pass through in being built to Wingham. It is important to the town of Wingham and vicinity as well as to the city of Toronto that immediate action should be taken, as now all parties are in the humor for the work.

Miss Lapham's Japanese Silk

A PARTLY TRUE STORY.

BY H. H.

Great buetle and stir pervaded Miss Jones's dressmaking room. Four new gowns were to go home that afternoon, all to be worn at one party. Such a thing had never before happened since Milly Jones, brave little thing that she was, had undertaken to keep father, mother, sister, and two brothers in food and clothes by the work of her two slender hands. Her father was a paralytic, her mother not overstrong, her sister only fifteen, and the boys ten and twelve.

It was a big load for Milly to shoulder, but she took it up as gayly as if it had been play, and had been carrying it now for four years, without a day's rest, or a night's either, for that matter, since there never was a night that she did not sew till twelve o'clock, and sometimes long after. All she knew of the dressmaking art she had learned on the sly, or on the wing, as it were, in the great Madame Gullall's establishment, where she had toiled and drudged for five years, sometimes going shopping, sometimes sewing on skirts of gowns, sometimes holding the pincushion for madame while she fitted.

This last was her opportunity, and not a second of it did she lose. No seam, no pleat, no trick of the madame's deft fingers, escaped Milly's eye. She had not been long in the place before the dream took distinct shape in her mind. It was not such a very difficult thing, Milly perceived, to fit a gown. She could even improve on some of the madame's methods, she dared to think. And she was not mistaken, for the madame was at best but a trained work-woman, and Milly had a dash of genius in her nimble brain. So she plotted and planned, and studied and observed, all the while saving every penny that she could.

She confided her project to her mother, who, luckily, did not frown on it, and together they schemed and economized, until at last they had money enough in the savings-bank to keep the family in food and pay the rent for one year. Until that was assured Milly would not make her venture.

"In one year I can get under way, I know," she said. "Plenty of madame's customers will give me their old gowns to alter over, because I will do it so cheap. I've many a time heard them say that it was no economy to have madame alter them, for she charged as much as for a new gown. And that way I'll gradually work in till they'll give me their new gowns too. If I had the French patterns I'd very soon fit as well as madame. If I had had her experience, I believe I'd fit better. I've seen her make awful blunders sometimes."

So, when the money for one year's living was put away, Milly electrified Madame Gullall one day by giving notice that she would leave at the end of the month. The madame was displeased. All her customers liked Milly; she herself liked her. She had no one in her whole establishment whose eye was as quick for a shade of color as Milly's. Many a time, when other shoppers had reported a sample as unmatchable, Milly had gone out, and in an hour returned with the right thing. And more than once, when some accident had happened to a gown, and a dilemma had arisen, Milly's ingenuity had come to the rescue, and devised an expedient which had saved the madame's credit. No; Milly must not go. She offered to double her wages. It was a temptation, but Milly resisted.

"It might be long before we would have a whole year's living ahead again," she thought; "and I'm getting old" (she was nineteen). "If I'm ever going to begin, now's my time."

So, politely thanking Madame Gullall, she declined her offer, and departed.

It was surprising how work poured in on her as soon as it was understood among a few of Madame Gullall's customers that Milly had "set up for herself." No woman living who cares for dress can resist the temptation of having a pretty gown at half price.

Milly was a tireless creature, went to her customers at their own houses to fit them, carried samples, ripped, sponged, and pressed old gowns, and brought them back as good as new, or better. She smiled to herself sometimes—knowing well how much more work she gave for the money than the fine ladies had ever got before—to find them inclined to drive close bargains with her. But she was working for an end; she could afford to hide her time.

"If I live and have my health, you'll see me ask twenty-five dollars for making a gown, the same as the rest of them," she said to her mother. "It's worth it, too. I just wish the ladies would try making one their own selves, from beginning to end, and see if they don't think differently after they've done it!"

Before the end of the first year Milly had a sewing-woman of her own. In six months more she had two, and at the time of our story had four. More than that Milly could not manage; in fact, more than six human beings could not have breathed in the little basement room where Milly's work must still be done. It was a dark, dismal, cramped place; but Milly did not yet, prosperous as, judging by her own modest criterion, she had become, dare risk a bigger rent. She knew what she wanted—a sunny, airy house far up-town. Many a Sunday afternoon she spent walking, with longing eyes, up and down the streets in which she would like, and hoped some day, to live. But before she could do that the boys must have their schooling, and get to work at a trade. Then, with only their father and mother to keep, Milly thought she and her sister would feel as if they could afford to live more as they would like. And so they worked bravely, cheerily on.

It seems to me that there is nothing in all the world which is reckoned by so false standards as courage. To set off on an exploring expedition to the north pole or into the heart of Africa, with rich men's money and names blazoning the affair all over the earth, with the lure of promised fame and glory beckoning one on, is not, to my mind, half so heroic a thing as to live in a dingy house in a scarcely respectable street, trudge back and forth in all weathers to fetch and carry work, sit in a dark basement sewing ten hours at a stretch, day in and day out, year in and year out, and keep cheerful through it all. If only one person here and there did it, the world would see clearer how much courage and fortitude it takes. But there are so many hundreds, so many thousands, doing it all around us all the time, that we do not realize what it is or what it means. When we do realize this, a better time will dawn for work-people, and the world will wake up to a shame-stricken consciousness of some of its unconscious cruelties.

No such thoughts as these bothered Milly's brain, however. She went about her work, was sorry when it fell off, and elated when it poured in, no more questioning whether it were just for her to have to work so hard than sparrows question about flying in search of food.

The four gowns which were to go home this night were a great triumph for Milly. Two of them were for rich and fashionable young ladies for whom she had never before made new gowns the Misses Lapham, who lived with their uncle in a superb home near the Park. They had been among Madame Gullall's best customers, as Milly very well knew. It would be enough to keep Milly's whole family for a year if she could earn all that these two girls had been in the habit of paying to madame. But that she did not hope for.

One of the dresses was of a Japanese silk, a sort of [illegible]ade. Milley wondered where it had been bought. She had never seen anything like it. It had gold and browns and purples so shot and interwoven that the color was like a beech-tree in the autumn—a beech-tree with its leaves all turned by frost, and shaking in the wind. Many a time Milly had paused in working, and held up a bit of it to the light, for the pure pleasure of seeing the colors change. With it had come a piece of very old gold brocade, which was made into an over-dress, with long sleeves hanging from the shoulder; and when Miss Florence Lapham put it on, she looked, with her black eyes and hair, like a Japanese lady of degree. Miss Florence was exceedingly difficult to please always, and with this particular dress it seemed as if she never would be suited. Even gentle Milly's patience was nearly worn out waiting while she stood before the long dressing-glass, turning and turning and turning again, and scrutinizing every fold and loop. At last she exclaimed:

"I never can tell how anything looks on myself. If I could only see it on somebody else, I could tell in one minute if it was as I want it."

"I might send Jenny up with it, Miss Florence," said Milly, hesitatingly. "If you would be willing to let her put it on. She is just about your size. I've often pinned a pattern for you on her, and I draped this skirt on her."

"Who is Jenny?" said Miss Lapham, sharply.

"One of my girls," answered Milly, a little frightened. "But she's just as neat and nice as any lady. Indeed, Miss Florence, I don't think you need mind letting her put it on."

"Is she as tall as I am?" asked Miss Lapham, wonderingly; she had few acquaintances tall as herself.

"Not quite," said Milly; "but I've got a piece of wood I have her stand on, and that makes her just the right height. You could tell exactly how the dress looks if you saw it on her."

"Very well. You can bring her up with you to-morrow, when you fetch the dress home," said Miss Lapham, little dreaming what destinies lay in her words. "Come early, so there will be time for you to alter it if it isn't right. I don't believe that the loopings at the back are as I want them, but I can't possibly tell with the hand glass. Bring the piece of wood along too, so as to have it exact."

Milly exclaimed: "Oh, Miss Florence, I can't bring that! Won't a footstool do?" and she glanced around the room, full of every sort of luxurious fitting and appointment.

"No," said Miss Lapham; "I want her to be the exact height you fitted it on. You can have one of your brothers bring the piece of wood."

"So I can," said the good-natured Milly. "I never thought of that. Robby will be only too delighted to come."

This conversation had been two days before the day of the party. When Milly reported it at home, to her great surprise, Jenny, flushing hotly, said that she could not go up to try on Miss Lapham's gown.

"Why not?" said Milly.

Jenny, still scarlet, made no answer.

Milly continued: "You'll get me into a dreadful scrape, Jenny, if you don't go; for Miss Florence is counting on it; and if she is displeased she'll never give me another bit of work. What earthly difference does it make to you, Jenny, whether you try the gown on there or here?"

Jenny opened her lips as if to speak, but changing her mind, remained silent for some minutes, looking down on her work, and rapping absently with her thimble on the window-pane. Then suddenly looking up, she said:

"I'll go, Milly, because you've always been so good to me, but I don't want to go a bit. I wouldn't do it for anybody but you."

"I didn't think you'd be such a goose as to care," laughed Milly, "or I wouldn't have offered to do it. I wouldn't mind it a bit myself, and I don't see why you need."

If Milly had known all Jenny knew, she would have understood very well; but she did not know all Jenny did. Neither did she know all that there was to be known about the beautiful Japanese silks of which Miss Lapham's gown was made. Those silks had a story which nobody but Miss Florence Lapham and Mr. George Baylies, her cousin, knew. He had given the silks to her when he came home from his last voyage—the voyage from which nobody expected he would come back alive, poor fellow. He seemed at death's door when he started. But the sea cured him: the sea, and time to think; for the thing that ailed George Baylies was only in part what the doctors called it—nervous prostration from overwork. He had had a sharp hurt, and lost faith in a girl he loved, and thought he did not care to live any longer; but before he got fairly around Cape Horn he discovered that he was mistaken; that he decidedly preferred to live: and as soon as he discovered that he got well instanter, and when he stepped on shore at San Francisco, his father and mother and Florence Lapham, who had gone overland to meet him, and had been nearly dead with anxiety because the ship was two weeks overdue, hardly could believe their eyes at the sight of George, hale, hearty, plump, and jolly.

They all said it was a miracle, but it was not. It was the farthest possible from a miracle. It was the work of a law as plain as the multiplication table; but that is neither here nor there in this story, except that being, as I say, cured, and in a healthy frame of mind, when he came to unpack treasures he had had stored away in San Francisco for two years, keeping them for somebody to whom he could now never give them, he decided to make presents of them all to his cousins, and the very first things he gave away were these Japanese silks to Florence. He and Florence had always been so fond of each other that everybody expected them to be married, until George went to college, and, it was said, had become entangled with a daughter of a boarding-house keeper in the country town where the college was situated—a most unfortunate affair, which had been wound up, nobody knew exactly how, just before George's health broke down. But now he was all right again, and to be seen here, there, and everywhere with his handsome cousin Florence, and all would undoubtedly turn out in the end as everybody had prophesied four years ago. George had come back to New York, and this very party at which Miss Florence would wear the Japanese silks was given in honor of his return. What Florence Lapham thought about it all, what was in her mind as she planned and devised the toilette, nobody knew but Miss Florence herself, and she never told, for the best of reasons, as will be seen.

It was a little past four when the procession set out from Milly's door, Milly and Jenny each bearing a big box, and Robby trudging by their side with the block of wood. As they got into the horse-car everybody looked at them, and wondered what that little boy could be carrying that big block of wood for. But Robby did not mind. He was full of anticipations of seeing the mocking-bird which Milly had told him was in a cage in Miss Florence's room, and often sang while she was there.

They soon reached the house, and were shown upstairs, where Florence was impatiently awaiting them. "Be quick! be quick!" she said. "It is long past four o'clock."

In a very few minutes the gown was out of the box, and in a few minutes more Jenny had laid aside her shabby clothes, put on the rich dress, with one of Miss Florence's own embroidered petticoats under it, and stepped up on the block of wood which made her precisely Miss Lapham's height.

The dress was faultless. Walking round and round Jinny, turning her from side to side as if she was a wooden lay figure, Miss Lapham scrutinized every part of the costume, and had nothing but approbation to give.

"Really, Milly," she exclaimed, "it is lovely. Madame Gullall never made anything prettier. You shall make all my new dresses this spring."

"Thank you, Miss Florence," said Milly, warmly. "I'll do my very best to have them all perfect."

"What a shame she isn't as tall as I am, so I could see her walk a few steps in it!" said Miss Lapham, her eye resting on Jenny with no more consciousness of her being a living human being than she would have had if she had said of a wooden frame, "What a pity it can't walk across the floor!"

Jenny colored, but remained silent. Milly recollected afterward that Jenny had not once opened her lips in Miss Lapham's presence.

"Couldn't she hold the dress up in front so that she could walk in it and I could see the sweep of the train?" said Miss Lapham.

"Try, Jenny," said Milly. And Jenny stepped down from her wooden block, and lifting the front of the skirt in both hands, walked toward the door.

"There isn't room in here," exclaimed Miss Lapham. "I want to see the gown at a little distance. Come across into our sitting-room;" and she threw open her bedroom door, and led the way across the broad hall.

The Misses Lapham were luxurious young ladies—as there was no reason why they should not be—and had on the same floor with their bedrooms a large and beautifully furnished sitting-room, to which their own intimate friends were in the habit of coming at all times.

Closing the door and seating herself, Miss Lapham said to the lay figure, "Now walk slowly up and down the room."

Jenny obeyed. Spite of the holding up of the skirt in front, the effect of the train was good, and the long hanging sleeves showed well.

Miss Lapham was delighted, and gazed almost dreamily at the slow-moving figure. For the first time she noticed Jenny's face.

"That girl is very pretty," she said, in an under-tone, to Milly.

"She's as good as she is"—"pretty," Milly was about to reply, but she did not finish her sentence.

"Hullo, Florry!" came in loud, boisterous tones from Miss Lapham's brother Tom, bursting open the door with a vehemence which sent it against the wall. "Here's George."

Miss Lapham shrieked in comical dismay, and sprang to catch the door as it swung back. "Go away! You can't come in here."

It was too late. George Baylies was close behind Tom.

At that very second, Jenny, at the farther end of the room, had turned to walk back. In the next second had come from George Baylies's lips a cry which none who heard it ever forgot.

"Jenny! oh, Jenny!" And in another second Jenny, with a strange stare in her eyes, had fallen, "sunk," as Milly said afterward, describing the scene to her mother—"sunk right down till there wasn't anything but a pile on the floor, just a pile of the silk and things, and Jenny's face white as death in among it."

Not the most practical literateur could ever have described the scene from first to last so well as Milly did—honest, hearty little Milly, who had a few times in her life been to the theatre, and who had read hundreds of romances in the story papers of the day.

"I never saw anything so perfectly beautiful—never!" she said. "There was Jenny in a dead faint on the floor, and Miss Florence's new dress all mussed up under her, and that splendid-looking man down on his knees lifting up Jenny's head and calling to her, and calling to everybody. 'Oh, get water,' and 'Bring salts,' and 'Can't somebody do something for her?' and Miss Florence for the first minute standing stock-still, and looking first at Jenny and then at the gentleman, just her haughtiest way; and then she got softer, and she said, 'Who is it, George? just as loving; and he looked up at her, and says he, 'Oh, Florry, it's Jenny!' as if that let her know any better. And right into the midst of it Robby came running in at the door, calling to me, 'Milly! Milly! come, hear the mocking-bird sing; he's singing splendid.' If ever I wished a child in the sea, I wished Robby Jones there that minute. Oh, there never was anything in the theatre half so nice, nor in the best story ever I read. It was just splendid. The gentleman he dashed the water over her, right on to the gold brocade, just as if it wasn't anything but a cotton night-gown. I saw Miss Florence try on the sly to wipe a little off with her handkerchief; but it wasn't any use. I made up my mind the gown was done for as soon as I saw them give him the hartshorn bottle. 'Twas a shame, too—such a brocade!"

Of course the story ends here, but as stories always have to be finished after they are done, it is in order to relate, in as few words as possible, that a carriage was called, and that Milly Jones and Robby Jones and Mr. George Baylies all rolled away in it, Jenny still white and trembling, but with heavenly happiness in her downcast eyes, and George Baylies gazing at her, and holding her hand in his, and talking to her, and not minding Milly and Robby any more, as Milly told her mother, "than if we'd been deaf, dumb, and blind." And when they reached Milly's house, and Milly said, "Now, Jenny, you must come in and stay till you feel better," Mr. Baylies had lifted his hat to Milly, just as if she "had been a queen," she said, and spoke in such a cordly way:

"Thank you, Miss Milly, but Jennie will be better at home. I shall go home with her, and not leave her till she is well again. Where shall I tell the man to drive, Jenny?"

How poor Jenny shrank and hesitated to give the name and number of the miserable home where she and her mother were fighting their poverty! But it was of no use now. She had met her rightful master, and never again would a false scruple come between them. For it had been nothing else which had separated them three years before—a conscientious determination on Jenny's part, when she and her mother suddenly found themselves penniless, not to be a burden on her lover, who she well knew was not rich. "He must not begin life with two to support," said Jenny; and she wrote him a letter so worded that he could not but infer that her feelings had changed toward him.

Then she and her mother had disappeared, leaving in the little village where they had lived no trace by which they could be followed: a brave, foolish thing such as women are forever doing, and many a time since Jenny's heart had been sick with misgiving lest it had been wrong. But she thought George would have written if he had cared; so he had written a letter, which would have changed everything, perhaps, if Jenny had got it, but she never did. It went nobody knows where, and the hopes and the happiness of two hearts with it; and George broke down, and went on the voyage; and Jenny kept up, and went to sewing at Milly Jones's; and the Japanese silk and brocade went to Miss Florence Lapham, on their roundabout way to Jenny at last; and it was because Jenny knew that the Laphams were cousins of George Baylies that she was on the point of refusing to go to the house to try on Miss Florence's gown for her; and if she had—oh, if she had, what then? Who can tell? The Japanese silk would never have been her wedding-gown, which, as things turned out, it really was. It had not been ruined, after all, and in another box of George's was more of the gold brocade; and when Florence Lapham, having heard the story, gracefully made the best of the situation, saying to her cousin, "I really think your pretty Jenny ought to have that gown, George; don't you—would she mind, do you think, my sending it to her?"—George had exclaimed: "No, indeed! and I'll make her be married in it. That's the thing to do. I'd never have found her except for that gown."

Jenny remembered how she herself had planned and made the flowing sleeves to the gold brocade, and how, as she stood on the wooden block being turned round and round for Miss Florence's pleasure, her heart had been fuller and fuller of the memory of George Baylies, till she looked up and saw him, or his ghost, coming toward her, and how when she came to herself, one of her first thoughts was, "Oh, dear! I have ruined Miss Florence's gown!"—Jenny was superstitiously glad of the gown, and held it in such tender regard that she would never have it altered. She wore it for years and years, as one may a gown that is of true artistic fashion. And now it is packed away, to be handed down in the Baylies family, and it will be Jenny's granddaughter that, some day in 1900, will be dancing in Miss Lapham's Japanese silk.

The Land Owners of England.

The following fresh statistics in regard to the ownership of land in Great Britain, will prove interesting reading: Twenty-eight dukes in the United Kingdom possess 158 separate estates, comprising nearly 4,000,000 acres. The other members of the peerage, 475 in number, hold 1436 separate estates, embracing about 10,000,000 acres. Of 33,000,000 acres in England and Wales, more than 17,000,000 are owned by a body of men which probably does not exceed £500. According to Hon. Geo. Brodrick, Warden of Morton College, Oxford, nearly half the enclosed land of England and Wales, is owned by about 2250 persons.

The largest landed proprietor among the peers, is the Duke of Sutherland, who owns more than one million acres. His rent roll, however is not so large as that of some peers with much less property, his income from land amounting to only $656,772, while that of the Marquis of Bute, who owns only 116,000 acres, is considerably more than $1,000,000.

The Duke of Buccleuch comes second to the Duke of Sunderland in number of acres, and second to the Marquis of Bute in size of income. His land comprises 459,550 acres, and his rent roll is about $1,100,000. The Duke of Northumberland's rent roll ranks next, being $880,000, and next to him comes the Duke of Devonshire, with about $25,000 less. The Earl of Derby and Earl of Fitzwilliam, receive rents amounting annually to about $700,000. Altogether there are ten peers who each receive over $500,000 a year from land.

A New Motive Power.

It is said that steam is now to be supplanted in much of the mechanical toil of the world, by the vapor of bisulphide of carbon. This gas has the advantage of vastly greater power than steam, but in the qualities already named as being possessed by steam, it has been, in the main, considered deficient. Recent experiments, however, are said to show that all difficulties have been overcome. Not only is the motive force of this gas greater than that of steam, but it is claimed that it can be controlled and safely applied; that the machinery used in the application can be protected from its chemical attacks, and that it can be produced so cheaply, that unless unforeseen difficulties develop, it will soon displace steam in many large factories. Mr. Keeley is believed to be working on a similar plan in his prolonged endeavor to discover some form of stored-up natural power which will free mankind from the necessity of labor. A few centuries ago it was perpetual youth that dreamers toiled after; now it is only perpetually moving machines.

Their Occupation Gone.

"My occupation's gone" is the sad exclamation of the host of slashers who once exercised themselves upon the pedals of the people. MOVING IDYLS.

They were moving, not the ordinary and regular routine of May 1, when distressed families flock from one cramped and inconvenient dwelling into another of the same type, but this was a going and the mother's face was serious, for there was one of the little flock missing, not lost, but gone before into the new home, in the city whose walls lie four-square.

Thus it happened that one little room was left to the last, and as a rough workman laid his hand on the door, and pushed it open, the mother cried out as if he had struck her a blow:

'Oh, not there! Not there! I will move those things myself. You cannot touch them!"

"That was baby Grace's room and she died in that little bed," said one of the older children.

The rough workman stayed his foot on the threshold. Then he touched his hat, and his voice was husky as he said:

"If ye please, ma'am, I'll handle them things gently. I've a little one of my own in glory—the heavens be her bed—and it's myself will see them not a bit damaged, and I'll settle it beyond with you."

It was "the one touch of natnre" that "makes the whole world kin."

THE HELPING HAND.

Men are generally conspicuous by their absence during moving time, and shrewd business men have actually been known to have sudden calls by bogus telegrams to distant parts of the country, not getting home till the new house had been thoroughly warmed for their comfort, or discomfort as they sometimes find. So it usually happens that the man of the house at moving time is a woman who drives sharp bargains with the draymen and tackhammers and initiates her family into boarding off barrel-head tables. But the woman is not usually an object of pity, because John has given her his mantle of authority to back her and his pocket-book is at her dispcsal, and she rather glories in a little brief authority. But there is a class of women to be pitied—women who are widows, who must do battle single-handed against insolence and want and a host of evils; whose little children cannot run and "tell papa," as happier children can, when anyone abuses them, who are dependent for every comfort on the one slender, fragile, black-robed figure, who stands between them and distress.

Such a woman moved last week from one plain house with a moderate rent into another that was plainer and more moderate. When the first night found the new family in its strange quarters all was confusion and disorder. The stoves were down, and there was no one but the tired mother to put them up; the beds were not made, there was no supper, and the children, who had exhausted their curiosity over the new place, were hungry and sleepy. Then they all crowded around the poor mother and raised a dismal cry.

"We want to go home! we want to go home!"

And as the mother looked at them she wrung her hands and sobbed.

"Poor children! in all the wide world you have no other home than this."

But that mother heard, as in the whispers of a secret intelligence higher than that of earth, these words that thrilled her soul with new life.

"The foxes have holes and the birds of the air have nests, but the son of man has not where to lay his head."

She told the story of the Babe of Bethlehem to her little ones as she undressed them and put them to bed. When they wakened in the morning, hungry but rested, they saw the table set and the room in order. Mother had done it all as they slept, but who had helped her? Ah! who? The children only knew that it was mother, and here was home.

DIALOGUE A LA SAISON.

"Are you going to help me put down the carpets, John?"

"S'pose so; where's tack hammer?"

"It's in the barrel of dishes—no, it isn't—yes, it is—oh, I know now; I put it in the band-box with your new Sunday hat."

"Just like a woman; never knows where anything is; hat ruined, like enough; where is the handle of the hammer?"

"Oh, I packed that up with the china set; you'll find it, dear, at the bottom of the box."

"Now, who's going to stretch this carpet, hey?"

"Me, dear."

"Well, stand there. Gracious, I can't pul a hundred pounds of dry goods along with the carpet. Oh, dear, I'm going to have a fit, I believe."

"I'll make you a cup of tea, dear. You can drink it out of your shaving-mug. It'll be just like a picnic."

But when she got back with the tea, John was missing.

"Poor fellow! It was too much for him! he's gone to get the air. He looked pale."

John—at a counter covered with eatables, salads and things: "Two fingers of old crow, and a dash of bitters to begin with. I'm nearly starved! A hot beefsteak will help me out. I tell you, boys, moving is tough work."

Life has its compensations. John's wife sits on a roll of carpet and drinks her tea. "Poor boy! I wish he could have waited for it; it's so refreshing. He'll be half starved by supper time! I know he will."

Not much, little woman.

How a Herd of Cattle Were Saved.

"One of the bravest things I saw in my travels," said a passenger from the West, "was a cowboy stopping a cattle stampede. A herd of about six or eight hundred had got frightened at something, and broke away pell-mell, with their tails in the air, and the bulls at the head of the procession. But the cowboy did not get excited at all when he saw the herd were going straight for a high bluff, where they would certainly tumble down into the canyon and be killed. You know that when a herd like that gets to going, they can't stop, no matter whether they rush to death or not. Those in the rear crowd those ahead, and away they go.

'I wouldn't have given a dollar a head for that herd; but the cowboy spurred up his mustang, made a little detour, came in right in front of the herd, cut across their path at a right angle, and then galloped leisurely on to the edge of the bluff, halted and looked around at that wild mass of beef coming right toward him. He was as cool as a cucumber, though I expected to see him killed, and was so excited I could not speak. Well, sir, when the leaders had got within a quarter of a mile of him, I saw them try to slack up, though they could not do it very quick. But the whole herd seemed to want to stop, and when the cows and steers in the rear got about where the cowboy had cut across their path, I was surprised to see them stop and commence to nibble grass. Then the whole herd stopped, wheeled, staggered back, and went fighting for a chance to eat where the rear guard was.

"You see, that cowboy had opened a big bag of salt he had brought out from the ranch to give the cattle, galloped across the herd's course, and emptied the bag. Every critter sniffed the salt, and of course, that broke up the stampede. But I tell you it was a queer sight to see that chap out there on the edge of that bluff, quietly rolling a cigarette, when it seemed as if he'd be rolling under two hundred tons of beef in about a minute and a half."—"Plain Talk" in Chicago Herald.

Women as Photographers.

"I took up photography from choice many years ago," said the fair artist, a tall, fair woman, attending to the details of her work as she chatted. "I worked for my employer nine years, becoming practically the head of the business. Then I told him I was going to start a gallery of my own. He looked shocked but recovered himself shortly and made me a proposal of marriage. Nine years of him was quite enough. I was idle for a year and then bought this place. A man can never realize how nice it is for a woman to be absolute mistress of her own affairs. I keep my own books and attend personally to everything. My greatest successes have been with nervous and exciteable subjects. Last week a lady brought her son and daughter to me. She had tried several of the leading photographers, and none of them had succeeded in making even a passable picture. I appointed a morning for the sitting, and it took just five hours to photograph those two children. The girl had a twitching eye, and at first she could not keep still two consecutive minutes to save her. I looked at that twitching eye with such a professional gentleness, and treated her with such a vast amount of patience, that in the end she gave up completely, sat still and was photographed with thorough success. I had just as much of a struggle with the boy. But I succeeded at last. I have really more work than I can attend to, and my success is mainly due to the fact that I am a woman. Every woman has little points about her face and figure which she knows all women observe, but which, she has learned by experience, men never notice. When women are chatting together they refer to any unfortunate blemish in quite an ordinary way, but they never mention them to men, for fear of drawing attention to the defect. They even dread men photographers. They take a woman into their confidence at once, and the two chat about the effect of a cast in the eye, a crooked nose, a big ear, large teeth, or a scrawny neck, as though they had been cronies for life. This renders a satisfactory photograph easier to accomplish."

A Cigar Factory.

A journalist writes a letter from Seville describing the government cigar factory of Spain, seven hundred feet long and almost as wide, very dirty, and in the vestibule two hundred and fifty young girls making cigarettes, all talking as loud as they want to; one hundred girls in the next room doing the same, and on the next floor three thousand women as close as sardines in a box, in a single room, making cigars, some having their babies with them not a month old, and dogs lying on the tobacco stems. The women were divided up into sevens at each table, three on each side, and the mistress at the top. Around each table were shelves against stone pillars, on which lay children's shoes, socks and clothes. There were stone jars of water here and there for drinking, and the air was stifling, and the buzz of conversation only broken by the wail of the babies. The flooring was dilapidated, and it was possible for an incautious visitor to fall through. Two other side apartments one hundred feet long were both packed with laborers. The factory consumes about ten thousand pounds of tobacco a day, and employs over five thousand persons, who receive fifty cents a day for twelve hours' work. The matron at each table gets her pay from the women she commands. The girls and the superintendents had very little manners.

The Work of a Single Hair.

In the base of the Capitol at Washington is the enginery by which the House, the Senate, and the committee rooms are warmed and ventilated, and the gas lighted by electricity. It is altogether a big apparatus, consisting of three immense fans, four engines, and eight boilers, with the necessary appliances for regulating the temperature and moisture of the air supplied to the nation's legislators. The instrument which tells whether the air is too moist or too dry, is operated by a single human hair.

A perfectly dry air is put at 0; saturated air, that is air carrying all the moisture it will hold, is put at 100. A dial with a hand like that of a clock, represents the different degrees from 0 to 100. The human hair absorbs moisture like a rope, and like a rope it becomes shorter when wet. The difference in length between a hair six inches long when wet, and the same hair when dry, is made to represent the hundred degrees of moisture on the dial; and the hand, or pointer, moves backward or forward as the moisture in the air varies. If it becomes too dry more steam is thrown in; if too moist, less steam is allowed to escape, and thus the atmosphere for the nation's statesmen is regulated and kept at the healthful point, which is about 50°.

Lime-Kiln Club Mottoes.

As the meeting opened, the president announced that the following spring mottoes would be hung on the walls during the coming week:

"Pay cash."

"Deal on the squar'."

"Sell your dog."

"No man can sit on de fence an' plant onions."

"Time wasted am shillin's los' out of a hole in de pocket."

"If it am pollyticks 'gainst taters, take de taters."

"An hour wid a saw buck am moah valuable dan an hour wid a statesman."

"De man in debt am a swimmer wid his butes on."

Australian Defences.

The area of South Australia is so great, and its population and resources comparatively still so undeveloped, that no attempt to defend the country districts or the numerous small towns on the sea-board can at present be contemplated. The heart of the country beats in Adelaide, which is at once the seat of Government and the repository of the national wealth. It is estimated that once in the hands of an enemy the sum of £5,000,000 sterling could be levied from it in a few hours, by placing Governments banks, and private individuals, alike, under rigorous contribution. The whole duty of local defences have been thown upon the colonists themselves. Under no obligation to the Imperial Government to protect themselves, bound by no tie of federation to inter colonial uniformity of action, and imbued with a touching belief in the ubiquity and omnipotence of the British fleet, the different Australian Governments drifted on vaguely for several years. This state of apathy was rudely dispelled by the Russo-Turkish scare of 1877, when the Antipodeans suddenly awoke to their defenceless condition. Soldiering is very popular in South Australia. There is a steady and ever-increasing flow of recruits into the ranks of the Militia, so that, notwithstanding a severe medical examination, the inevitable waste is amply provided for. About 30 per cent. of the time expired men rejoin for a second term of three years, for which they receive £1 bounty. Many more enrol in the Reserve, where they annually attend twelve drills and fire through their classes to keep up the knowledge acquired with the colors. Between Militia and Volunteers about three thousand men have passed through the ranks, and are now more or less trained to the use of arms; they form a considerable, though unenrolled, reserve upon whom it would be safe to rely in case of emergency. The rising generation are also being steadily drilled at the State (anglice School Board) schools throughtout the Colony. All teachers have to pass in company drill before appointment, and so well do they train their boys that more than once six or seven hundred lads, collected from various schools, have been marched on to the parade ground and have gone through a long battalion drill with great success. Throughout the force the physique is excellent. The infantry in height, build and age, are decidedly superior to the line regiments of the present day, and the Artillery can hold their own with their brethren at home.

Of the remarkable loyalty and affection for the Old Country which prevades not only the South Australians, but all the Australasian troops, we will give one instance. Within four hours of the arrival in Adelaide of the news of our defeat at Majuba Hill three hundred men from the small defence force, we have been describing, had volunteered for active service in the Transvaal, "to help our chaps against the Boers." The offer had already been telegraphed home when the other colonies hearing of it, instantly began to follow suit, and in twenty-four hourse 2,000 sturdy Australians had placed themselves at the service of the Home Government, eager to help to avenge the honor of the British flag. It is greatly to be hoped that the colonies will lose no time in federsting for military and naval purposes.

At present each member of the Australasian group works independently, without concert with her neighbors—a state of things which in time of peace is expensive, and in time of war might become dangerous. Even more pressing is the necessity for establishing a colonial government manufactory of small-arm amunition in some central locality, whence the magazines could be replenished without need of constant application to the British authorities.

Out of the population, which we may roughly estimate at 2,900,000, there are more than 16,000 men who voluntarily undertake military duties. The capital sums spent, or about to be spent, on permanent fortifications since 1877 (without reckoning naval defences) amount to a million sterling; while the estimated annual military expenditure is calculated at £272,000. In the face of these figures no one can accuse the Australian colonists of too exclusively relying on Imperial protection in case of war.

The Unexpected Vistor.

The uninvited visitor drops upon us at most inconvenient times and seasons, quite as a matter of course, like a poor relation, and proceeds to make herself thoroughly at home without more ado. Naturally we do not expect any great amount of diffidence on the part of a person who is bold enough to intrude upon the privacy of another without special request, and we are therefore but little surprised when we find her investigating the upper storey of the house, or devising means for invading the rooms that have been closed to her, or interviewing the servants; when she demands eatables not upon the table, and tells us about the luxurious surroundings of her last hostess: when knowing the breakfast hour, she wilfully lies in bed till that meal is spoiled, till all the delicacies prepared for her delectation have lost their relish and become indigestible; when she is impatient if something is not being done for her entertainment; when she complains of the temperature of the dining room in warm weather, and the torment of the flies, the persistence of the mosquitoes, without seeming to realize that they are annoyances to which she has voluntarily subjected herself; or when she is curious about our work. At the same time that she aggravates us with her peculiarities, her audacities interest and amuse us; we find ourselves wondering what she will do or say next, and if she has exhausted her impertinences. And her peculiarities afford a constant theme for mirthful thought long after she has left us.

How to Handle Bees.

A scientific paper announces that in its next issue will appear an elaborate article, entitled, "How to Handle Bees." Now a bee is not a difficult thing to handle. He is as easily picked up as a strawberry, and is reasonably light and compressible. To handle him is therefore a mere song. Any man can do it. In fact, the more ignorant of bees a man is, the more easily he can handle one. The main difficulty seems to lie in quietirg the man down after he has handled a small but frolicsome bee. There have been men known to race around a ten-acre lot, and eventually lose their salvation, after handling one bee for the tenth part of a second. The scientift journal means well, no doubt; but what the country really needs is an article on how to avoid handling bees.

English Preachers.

Canon Liddon and the Bishop of Peterborough stand out as unquestionably the two finest preachers of the Established Church. There is a story of a private soldier having gone to St. Paul's on an afternoon when Dr. Liddon was to preach. The printed paper with the hymn was handed to him, but not understanding that it was offered gratis he refused it with a shake of the head, saying: "You don't suppose I should be here if I had got any money?" Most of the people who go to hear the eloquent Canon are different from this soldier, for they would pay—and very liberally—to get seats near the pulpit. On the afternoons of the Sundays when Dr. Liddon is in residence, the cathedral presents an extraordinary sight with its huge nave aisles densely thronged. So far as the preacher's voice will reach, people stand, straining eyes and ears, and fortunately Dr. Liddon's voice resounds well under the dome, though now and then it becomes indistinct through the preacher's speaking too fast in his excitement. Two other things occasionally mar Dr. Liddon's delivery. Shortness of sight makes him often stoop to consult Bible or notes, and again he bows the head in a marked manner when he utters the holy name, but when he thus bends he goes on speaking, so that his words fall on the pulpit cushion and are deadened, which produces upon people who are at some little distance off the effect of continual stoppages and gaps in the sermon. No other defects besides these, however, can be noted in orations which for beauty of language, elevation of thought, and lucidity in reasoning could not be surpassed. We have heard Dr. Liddon many times at Oxford and in London, and have observed that the impression produced by his eloquence was always the same, no matter who might be listening to him. We remember in particular, a sermon of his on the text, "The kingdom of God cometh not with observation." It was absolutely magnificent to hear him prophesy the gradual progress of the world toward a higher state. Every man, from the greatest to the least, was made to feel his share of the responsibility in advancing or retarding the evolution of mankind, and while the consequences of evil were pointed out as extending to incalculable lengths, there was a sublime hopefulness in the promise that the smallest good offering brought to the Creator would be multiplied by him as the "five loaves were multiplied."

WHAT MEN HAVE SAID ABOUT WOMEN.

The man who can govern a woman can govern a nation.—[Balzac.

The mistake of many women is to return sentiment for gallantry.—[Jouy.

It is easier to make all Europe agree than two women.—[Louis XIV.

God created the coquette as soon as He had made the fool.—[Victor Hugo.

A woman who has surrendered her lips has surrendered everything.—[Viard.

Of all heavy bodies, the heaviest is the woman we have ceased to love.—[Lemontey.

Woman is a charming creature, who changes her heart as easily as her gloves.—[Balzac.

Who takes an eel by the tail or a woman at her word, soon finds he holds nothing.—[Proverb.

How many women would laugh at the funerals of their husbands if it were not the custom to weep?

Women deceived by men want to marry them; it is a kind of revenge as good as any other.—[Beaumanoir.

An asp would render its sting more venomous by dipping it into the heart of a coquette.—[Poinsolet.

Rascal! That word on the lips of a woman, addressed to a too daring man, often means—angels.

We meet in society many attractive women whom we would fear to make our wives.—[D'Harleville.

A woman who pretends to laugh at love is like the child who sings at night when he is afraid.—[J. J. Rosseau.

Women swallow at one mouthful the lie that flatters and drink drop by drop a truth that is bitter.—[Diderot.

She is the most virtuous woman whom nature has made the most voluptuous and reason the coldest.—[La Beaumelle.

The Russian and the Horse.

Paul's horses were admonished and chastised if they forgot the respect due to their owner. Once he convened an extempore court of justice on the streets to try a horse which had just stumbled with him; the brute—the ridden one—was sentenced to receive 50 lashes, and after the castigation it was rebuked by the riding one: "That, Sir, is for having stumbled with the Emperor." While flourishing his cane in one of his uncontrollable fits of anger, he accidentally struck the branch of a lustre, and broke it. Indignant at the lustre interposing itself as an obstacle in its way, he attacked it in right earnest, and beat it to powder.

Of English Origin.

The practice of whittling is considered so distinctive of a genuine American that any attempt to claim for it an English origin would require ample corroboration. In a little work published in London in 1794, entitled "The Sentimental Exhibition; or, Portraits and Sketches of the Times," we find the following statement: "Monsieur Grosse or some other Frenchman remarks that when we English have no other employment we are sure to do mischief, and therefore when a parcel of Sailors go into an Alehouse at Wapping, the Landlord delivers to each of them a stick and a knife to amuse themselves with while the Flip is preparing, that they may not destroy his furniture."

More Than He Could Manage.

"I say," said a busy drayman to a tramp who was holding himself up with a wall, "can't you come and help me load this dray?"

"Naw," said the loafer, "Hain't got time."

'Haven't got time? What in thunder are you doing?"

"Nuthin'."

"Then you ought to have time to spare, if you're doing nothing."

"That's what you're wrong," replied the tramp. "There's more of it than I kin 'tend to."

QUAINT AND CURIOUS.

Lake Chaubunagungamaug (Maine papers please copy) hasn't been so full in five years as it is now. The lake (not the name) forms a part of the boundary line between Massachusetts and Connecticut, and is in the town of Webster.

Public story tellers earn a good livelihood in Japan. In Tokio alone over 600 of these street improvisators ply their trade, provided with a small table, a fan, and paper-rapper to illustrate and emphasize the points of their tales.

Travelers rave about the soft purple light which fills Italian skies and gives a peculiar beauty to Italian mountains. This light has now been discovered on the mountains of Southern California, and tourists are so informed by the railroad companies interested.

The craze for painting horses all sorts of fancy colors in Atlanta has received a setback. A demented citizen had a painter imitate the pattern and colors of a crazy quilt on his house. After the first coat was finished the citizens rose as a man and compelled him to whitewash it over on pain of death. This was more than even a Georgia populace could stand.

There is a man in Berrien Co., Ga., who has not slept in a house since the war. He carries his entire wardrobe with him wherever he goes, as well as his pantry and kitchen utensils, and spends the night wherever dark may overtake him. He is a veritable curiosity. He never reads newspapers, claiming that to read the Bible as it should be read occupies all of his time. Several days since he inquired of the editor of a paper if Germany and France were still at war referring to the war of 1870.

The soda deposits discovered in Wyoming are unique. One series is on the old Laramie Plains, fourteen miles from Laramie City, where there is a chain of so-called lakes five to twenty-five acres in area, averaging fifteen feet in depth. These deposits are sulphate of soda. It cuts out in chunks like ice. When wells are dug the water is so impregnated with soda that they are filled up in a few days. In the Sweetwater Valley, near Independence Rock, are thirty-four deposits varying in size from three and four acres up to thirty-two acres. A few of these are simply bodies of water highly charged with sulphate of soda.

The First Cotton Bale.

This is the way the first bale is made: A number of planters within a radius of from five to ten miles meet and agree on one of their number who shall father the first bale. Then, as the bolls open on their respective plantations, each gathers the staple, and when he has a small bag full carries it to the member selected. The "father" then weighs the cotton and enters it in a book to the credit of the contributor. This process is continued from day to day until sufficient cotton has been obtained to make a merchantable bale. It is then ginned, baled and forwarded to the market offering the highest premium. On the arrival of the first bale in the market selected, it bears the certificate that it was raised by the member of the league who had been selected as the father. Then it is decorated with flags and flowers and paraded about the city. The premium offered is paid to its father, and the bale is sold at public auction and invariably brings a fancy price. This amount is also one of the perquisites of the father. Then that honest husbandman returns home and divides the profits with the members of the league in proportion to the cotton contributed.

The Talking Talent of the English.

I found an abundance of good talkers in England. From Lord Salisbury on the platform in "Parliament out of Session" down to the humblest political reformer haranguing a motley crowd on the sand hill at Newcastle-upon-Tyne, or the earnest young women of the Salvation Army warning a London throng of the coming of the coming of the day of judgment, the public speakers of the Kingdom seemed to me to be fluent, direct, effective, and perfectly at home on the stump. There is, of course, a class of highly cultured, very studious and scholarly men, specimens of which have visited this country as lecturers, whose homes have for a lifetime been in the study, whose long habit of non-intercourse with the masses, and pursuit of authorship seems to have completely unfitted them for public speaking, and who are when they attempt it, but awkward, shy, stammering specimens of tediousness.

A Good Idea.

A New Orleans dressmaker, who employes a large force of workwomen, has behind her house a large, old-fashioned garden, in which her workwomen dig, plant, grow flowers and otherwise amuse themselves during their mid-day rest. Every day at 12 o'clock the girls all hurry through their lunch in order to spend the most of their hour at their beautiful and fascinating recreation. Mme. H. does not require her workwomen to keep garden, but she tells them the garden is there, and they may cultivate in it anything they choose; of course, the fruits of their toil being for themselves. The lady argues that the change of work is most grateful to her seamstresses; that they work better and are better natured, and are improved in health since her garden project. She herself, by the way, is very proud of her own patch in the "community garden." Mme. H.'s wisdom may at least give a suggestion to other employers.

Just for Fun.

It was a Toronto street car. A woman was running after it with frantic haste, jumping up and down at every step, waving her parasol in the air, and shrieking "Car! Car!" at the top of her voice. To her said the conducter slowly, as he reached for the bell:

"D-o y-o-u w-a-n-t t-o r-i-d-e?"

"Oh, no," gasped the woman, as she swung herself on the platform, "I want to walk. I want to follow this car to the end of the route! I want to make a spectacle of myself for the amusement of the passengers who do ride!"

A Detroit river fisherman says that the pike of the Straits is a very destructive fish. One that was recently speared had swallowed another pike and that pike had swallowed a perch. The trouble with the whole business is about swallowing the story.

The Standard.

MARKDALE MAY. 22, 1884.

SIDEWALKS.

We have enquired of the police trustees why there is such a delay in repairing the sidewalks this year, many places being in a dangerous condition; the answer was, a want of funds, last year's trustees having left a deficit instead of a surplus, as should be. We hope our present trustees will levy sufficient so that a balance will be in the treasury to put our walks in a safe condition as soon as the snow is off another year. We would also suggest that those who make substantial and desirable improvements should be encouraged by extending sidewalks in their direction. In this respect Messrs. Turner and Walker are this season making improvements in fence building, tree planting, etc., on Brown Street, and we are of opinion that the sidewalk should be extended, at least past Dr. Sproule's residence. We do not wish to dictate to the police, but hope the suggestions we may give from time to time may be received in the spirit they are given.

Personals.

F. MacRae, Esq., gave us a call last week.

Wm. Clark has removed from Flesherton to Markdale.

W. L. Young returned last week.

George Littlejohns is home from Owen Sound Business College.

Rev. W. Casson visited Parry Sound last week, preaching in that place on Sunday. He returned on Monday evening.

Mr. Kirvan's family moved to Dundalk this week.

Mr. J. M. Ansley and daughter, of Parry Sound, are this week at Dr. Sproule's.

Mr. and Mrs. Geo. Rutherford, of Owen Sound, visited friends in Markdale this week.

Allan McDougall. Will. Lyons, and Albert Fleming left for Port Arthur this week.

STRUCK BY LIGHTNING—A NARROW ESCAPE

During the heavy thunderstorm last Thursday evening, the residence of Mr. Wm. Blackburn, Sr., of the 3rd line, Artemesia, was struck by lightning, injuring one person and doing considerable damage to the building. A brick chimney was struck and about ten feet of brickwork shattered to atoms, some of the bricks being thrown quite a distance from the building. From the chimney the electric current passed down the stovepipes, which were knocked down and scattered through the rooms, some of which were blown open, others were twisted in all imaginable shapes. Mr. Blackburn, who happened to be sitting in the line of the current, was struck on his right leg and foot, the boot being torn in shreds from his foot, his woollen sock was cut open up the side, and toe and heel cut off, as though done with a pair of scissors. The foot immediately turned black as charcoal, and was extremely painful for some hours. Mr. Blackburn was stunned for some time, but not otherwise injured. The current at this point where he was struck, pierced the floor, in several places tearing it from the joist and bursting and splintering several of the joist in the cellar, then struck the hard earth in the cellar, tearing up quite a large hole in the bottom. Several lights were broken out of the windows, window blinds torn to shreds and blown down. Fortunately nothing was set on fire. Mrs. Blackburn, who was seated close to her husband at the time of the shock, escaped uninjured. We learn since that Mr. Blackburn is rapidly recovering. What seems strange is that in that locality, within about a mile, three dwellings have been struck and damaged by lightning, and in one instance a young lady killed nearly a year ago.

J. W. Wilson, of the Flesherton sash and door factory, has been very unfortunate in running machinery. Some months ago had part of his thumb taken off. On Monday of this week had his hand caught in the shaper and two fingers severely cut, the little finger severed about half off.

LOSS BY FIRE.

Thos. Moren, of Glenelg, Loses all his Out Buildings, Horses and Implements.

On Thursday last Mr. Thos. Moren's barn was struck by lightning, and consumed by fire together with adjoining shed, stable, implement and carriage house, also a fine span of horses, a pair of yearling colts, a yoke of oxen, 5 calves, 5 pigs, a new cutter, buggie, sulky rake, and all other implements which were within the various buildings, also about 50 bushels grain and a quantity of hay, there was no possibility of saying anything, the fire occurred about one o'clock p. m. The loss is over $2,000 with $600 insurance. Mr. Moren has been a resident of Glenelg for 21 years, is an industrious, honest and highly respected man and has the sympathy of the community in his present loss.

A VICTIM OF MISPLACED CONFIDENCE.

The individual who places trust in many of the claims of advertised remedies is often sadly disappointed, but the array of facts regarding the honest virtues of Burdock Blood Bitters are indisputable. It positively cures diseases of the blood, liver and kidneys. Investigate the proofs and testimonials.

Dundalk.

From our own correspondent.

The programme of the weather for some time past has been, rain, then just a glimmer of sunshine, heavy frosts, followed by more rain. The agriculturalists are becoming very much discouraged, fearing a repetition of last season's unfavorable weather, and a continuance of "Hard times."

Our School Trustees have endeavored to relieve the crowded state of the junior department of the school, by engaging a monitor, and renting a room until the new building can be erected.

An excursion from Proton, Dundalk and Corbetton, to Toronto and return, under the auspices of the C. M. Church here, is being arranged for, and a pleasant time is expected. It will take place sometime during the first week in June.

The Miss Kirvans, formerly of Markdale, have opened a dressmaking establishment here.

The Band intend giving a concert here on the 27th inst., before the notorious "Paddy Miles" departs for fresh pastures.

Mr. L. A. Oldfield has purchased the drug business of Dr. McWilliam, who will confine his attention exclusively to his large practice.

BUCKLEN'S ARNICA SALVE.

The best Salve in the world for cuts, bruises sores, ulcers, salt rheum, fever sores, tetter, chapped hands, chilblains, corns, and all skin eruptions, and positively cures piles or no pay required. It is guaranteed to give perfect satisfaction, or money refunded. Price 25 cents per box. For Sale by A. Turner & Co.

Priceville.

From our own correspondent.

The Priceville fair was poorly attended. The number of cattle offered for sale was small and quality poor. There were several buyers present, prepared to pay good prices for desirable stock. Now, fellow farmers, the future wealth and prosperity of our township and county depends on the number and quality of our stock. Let us begin right, by getting the right kind of stock. Remember it costs but very little more to raise a good grade Durham, that will sell for $70 or $80, than to raise a scrub that is hard to sell for 25 or $30.

Dr. Ghent's successor in the mercantile business is daily expected in the village.

The ladies of our village are anxious to see the appearance of our village improved this summer. Let our men and boys get to work and help. A little fencing, and a few wheelbarrow loads of earth, with a little elbow grease, would make a great difference in the appearance of our front and other yards.

Dr. Hickson, of Strathroy, has taken up his abode as a practising physician in this village.

A new time table came into force on the railway last Monday morning, there are now four trains a day each way, a steamship express having been added. A passenger can now leave Markdale at 12 o'clock noon, and go to Toronto, remain an hour and a half and return the same evening, or go in the morning express and and remain six and a quarter hours and return the same evening, and can go to Owen Sound and do business for three hours and return at 5 30 p. m.

The Ladies of the Methodist church will hold their annual bazaar and concert on the 24th of May. The bazaar will be held in one of Hill Bro's. shops opposite the Markdale House, and will be well stocked with new, fancy and usefull articles, while the concert will be held in the Methodist Church, commencing at 7.30 p. m. A rich and varied program is being prepared in which the best local together with selected outside talent will take part. Admission 25 cents.

Our Subscribers who have not yet paid their subscription for '84 will please hand it in at their earliest convenience, or if it is not convenient we hope they will make an effort to let us have it. We are often put to great inconvenience on account of the large percentage who are not prompt in renewing, there is no doubt if the amount were much larger, a greater effort would be made to have it paid. Will our patrons please make an effort now in the matter and we will use our best endeavors to still improve the Standard.

Should any of our subscribers, either in the village or elsewhere miss a copy of the paper, or should it not come regular, they will do us a favor by reporting the fact at their earliest convenience so that we may endeavor to find the cause, and have it removed.

Railway Weather Probabilities.—The morning train on the Toronto, Grey & Bruce Railway now carries weather signals for the benefit of the farming community. The signals consist of discs arranged to display a sun, moon, or star. The sun is to indicate fine weather, the moon to indicate local showers, and the star wet. They will be carried on all morning mail trains leaving Toronto, so that all those who see the morning express trains will have the forecast so far as rain is concerned. The signals are hung outside the mail car.

The Queens Birthday.—Owing to the 24th coming on Saturday many of the towns and cities have decided to have their holiday and celebration on the following Monday: this arrangement met with a certain amount of opposition, and after general arrangements were made the following announcement was made:

"QUEEN'S BIRTHDAY POSTPONED.

Ottawa, May 16.—The Governor-General has received a telegram from the Colonial office stating that it is her Majesty's wish that the celebration of her birthday should be deferred for one month at least. Her Majesty has been pleased to appoint the 28th June for the United Kingdom." If these instructions are followed, a complete fizzle will be the outcome as there will be only three days between the 28th June and Dominion day. The latter will doubtless be celebrated in a right royal manner. Markdale however will have her celebration on Saturday, the 24th, regardless of official propositions.

IMPORTANT CHANGES.

There are two periods in the life of every female when the system undergoes great changes. First the change from childhood to womanhood; next, that of womanhood to old age. These are the critical changes of life, and the system should be nourished and regulated by that matchless tonic, Burdock Blood Bitters. It is invaluable in all diseases peculiar to females.

HUMORS OF DUELLING.

Some Amusing Episodes on the Field of Honor—Abraham Lincoln's Wit.

A Philosophical Mathematical Tutor—Adventures of Croquard.

Incomparably witty, as well as sarcastic, was Abraham Lincoln's remark, when—after accepting a challenge and agreeing to fight, he was shown the spot selected for the hostile meeting (which was on the Missouri side of the Illinois river)—he said that the site was singularly appropriate, as it was within convenient distance of the penitentiary. It is well, by the way, that the gentleman selected by Mr. Lincoln for his attendant in his threatened duel was a man of infinite jest; for he arranged that the combat should be fought with dragoon swords, which put a ridiculous termination to the affair, as Mr. Lincoln's adversary (Gen. Shields) was a much shorter man than himself. We can just see the immortal Father Abraham going for the eminent Missourian with a dragoon sabre. The cascades of Lincoln's wit continued to effervesce, however, even after the dragoon sabres had been anointed with the oil of peace, for the illustrious Railsplitter then proposed to Shields that they play a game of "old sledge" to see which should pay the expense of the trip—and Shields "pungled."

In 1414 Henry V. of England sent the dauphin of France a challenge; and in reply the latter presented Henry with some tennis-balls, with a message to the effect that the latter had better confine himself to the use of something less mischievous and more appropriate than the playthings of war.

The Washington (D.C.) Sunday Herald, not a long time since, related the following anecdote of a well-known Virginian: "Hill Carter, of Virginia, a lineal descendant of King Carter, of Shirley, on the Lower James river, was for many years an officer of the navy of the United States; but resigning he found his estate in a dilapidated condition. From his training in the navy he had become a rigid disciplinarian, thoroughly systematic and practical. He first directed his overseer to pull down the old fences and pile together all the crooked and dried rails and fire them. All of the old rickety cabins and other outhouses were next burned. Then all of the old waggons, carts, plows, hoes, axes, rakes, baskets, spinning-wheels, and looms were piled together and burned. The next order was to gather up every old horse and mule that could not work, and all non-producing mares, cows, sheep, and hogs, and old dogs that could not hunt, and place them in a lot. When this was done the animals were killed, placed in one vast heap and burned. On his several plantations were seventy-five or a hundred old negroes, male and females, that had not performed any labor for many years. Some were cripples and some almost past walking from old age. To support so large a number of non-producers did not comport with Mr. Carter's idea of discipline and economy. So he told the overseer to gather together in a certain lot all of these old negroes; but when the overseer went out to execute the order the old darkies, knowing how the old fences, cabins, farming implements, and the old stock had been served, had gone by the break of day to the fields and were all ready for work. The ex-naval officer proved himself a model and successful planter. Hill Carter was of an irritable nature, and by virtue of his education dictatorial. On one occasion, while riding over one of his plantations, the overseer had displeased him, and he undertook to horsewhip him. The overseer being the stoutest of the two, took the whip from him and lashed him severely. He then challenged the overseer to mortal combat, but the overseer declined to fight, for the reason, he said, that if he was maimed or killed it would leave his wife and children without support. Mr. Carter said he would settle on his wife and children a competency if he would fight him. The overseer accepted the proposition, and—the property settlement made—the parties met, the terms of the duel agreed on, the pistols loaded, and they were just taking position when the sheriff of the county arrived on the field and arrested the parties. Mr. Carter never changed his property gift to the overseer's family, nor did he dismiss him from his employ. He said he would let him keep the property because he might again want to fight him."

A certain mathematical tutor at Cambridge who had been confidently made the recipient of information to the effect that a pupil had about completed preparations for a hostile meeting, sought out the latter and inquired: "What is this all about—why do you fight?" "Because he gave me the lie," frankly and promptly replied the young man. "He said you lied, eh?—well, let him prove it; if he proves it, then you did lie, of course; but if he does not prove it, why, then, it is he who lied. Why should you shoot one another?" In the gallery of Dusenne, one time, a crack shot was affording a good deal of entertainment to himself and others by shattering one after another the puppets set up to be fired at. There was one man present, however, who could not laugh. That man was the proprietor of the puppets. At last they were all down but one—that was Napoleon. The marksman took quick aim, and down went the first consul. The proprietor gave a wild scream, and exclaimed: "You cannot fire as well upon the ground!" 'Come out and see!" "Bang!" and down fell the proprietor. "He could fire as well," groaned the prostrate one.

M. Olivier, bishop of Evreux, and Monsignor Affre, archbishop of Paris, met one day, and the latter dwelt at length upon the imperfections and inconsistencies of the law against duelling; when Bishop Oliver asked: Suppose, Monsignor Affre, some one of standing should slap you in the face—what would you do?" Thee archbishop was slightly thrown from his equilibrium, but replied: "I know what I ought to do, but I don't know, really, what I should do."

Croquard was not unlike St. Foix, in many respects, although not so gallant and proficient in the use of the sword, and was always without a sous. One day, at the instance of the Count de Chambord, he called upon a contractor and challenged him, at which the latter picked Croquard up and held him under a pump and pumped water on him until he was completely drenched. He once challenged a linen draper, whose wife informed Croquard that her husband was ill and would not recover before six months. In precisely six months from the day of his first visit Croquard again called, and was again met at the door by the wife of the linen draper, who invited the nomade duellist to breakfast. He declined, although hungry, saying that he wanted to fight more than he wanted to eat. "Won't monsieur try a glass of Madeira?" inquired the diplomatic woman, with well-effected affability. "Madeira!" ejaculated Croquard, with a smack of his lips like the crack of a whip, "Oui, oui, my dear madame; and your good husband shall remain ill for another six months." Croquard once got enraged with an actor named Mouton, and was about to challenge the Thespian, when he remembered that he owed him 5 francs. "How unlucky, mon Dieu!" he cried, after having unsuccessfully attempted to borrow that amount from others present, "that I should owe a man money whom I want to fight."

Saint-Beuve once fought a duel holding an umbrella—during the preliminaries of which he said that he had no objection to being killed, but that he was determined not to get wet. When the Duke of Wellington wanted the 10th regiment kept at Dublin, he admitted that lots of duels would grow out of such action, "but that's of no consequence," he added. Some years ago two inexperienced shooters met in the woods near Paris, and at the first discharge of their pistols a cry went up at a point only a few yards away, and it was quickly discovered that a well known attorney had been hit. "If it is only a lawyer," cried one of the combatants, "let us fire again."

During the progress of the duel between Senator William M. Gwin and Representative J. W. McCorkle, in 1883, a poor donkey nearly half a mile away, was shot dead—and the donkey was not even a spectator. Sterne once fought a duel about a goose, and Raleigh one concerning a tavern bill. An Irishman once challenged an Englishman because the latter declared that anchovies did not grow on trees. A member of Louis the Eighteenth's bodyguard challenged three men in one day—one because he had stared at him, another because he had looked at him askew, and the third on account of his passing him by without looking at him at all. A Liverpool sea captain was once challenged, and named harpoons as weapons. A Frenchman who had been called out named twenty four loaves of "siege bread"—"We shall eat against each other," he said, "until one of us shall die, for one of us is sure to die." Many who have received challenges have accepted and named horsewhips or cowhides. Two Tennessee editors, who had long quarelled, repaired to the field but settled their difficulty after firing one shot by agreeing to merge their papers into one concern and enter into partnership with each other, which they carried into effect after their return.

One of the most remarkable duels (or series of duels) of any age was the affair between two French officers named Fournier and Dupont. This duel was commenced in 1794 and lasted nineteen years. Fournier had challenged and killed a young man named Blum, at Strasburg, under distressing circumstances, and Gen. Moreau, the commandant, who had issued cards for a soiree, which was to take place upon the evening of the day of Blum's funeral, had hinted to his chief of staff (Dupont) just before the commencement of the arrival of guests that the presence of Fournier might mar the character of the festivities. So, when Fournier appeared he was denied admission by Dupont, who was at once challenged, and fought (with swords) and wounded Fournier. In a month or two they fought again, and Dupont was wounded. Immediately upon the recovery of the latter the combatants again met, and both received severe and dangerous wounds. Before retiring from the field, however, they had an agreement drawn up and sworn to that, whenever afterwards they came within one hundred miles of each other, each should travel fifty miles toward is the other, and renew and continue the fight until at least one of them was placed hors de combat. In the meantime they corresponded with each other, met and fought many times during ten or twelve years, always shaking hands, and sometimes dining together after their fights. At length both became general officers; and during the year 1813 were ordered to Switzerland. Dupont arrived at the post at night, put up at the best inn, and learned shortly after his arrival that Fournier occupied an adjoining apartment. In a few moments they were at it again, sword in hand, and the fight was temporarily ended by Dupont running his steel through his antagonist's neck and pinning Fournier against the wall. While in this situation Fournier challenged Dupont for a meeting upon the following day. "Early in the morning, with pistols, in the woods near Neuilly!" cried Dupont, greatly to the astonishment of Fournier, who was a distinguished shot. 'Good!" replied the latter. "Hear me," added Dupont, "I am about to engage in matrimony, and have concluded that this matter of ours must first be permanently settled; so I propose that we each arm ourselves with a pair of loaded pistols, go into the woods together, then separate and walk off in opposite directions one hundred paces, then turn and fire at will." The proposition was accepted by Fournier and the combatants met upon the following morning, went to the woods together, separated, paced off a hundred steps, turned and commenced to advance hastily. Dupont, while on his hands and knees, got sight of Fournier behind a tree, and at once took up a like position. He then stuck out a flap of his coat as if in a kneeling position, and in an instant a bullet went through it from Fournier. Then Dupont hung his cap on the muzzle end of one of his pistols and by degrees stuck it out to one side until at length Frontier blazed away, Dupont then stepped out from behind the tree and advanced upon his astonished antagonist with drawn weapons and said: "General your life is in my hands but I do not care to take it. I want this matter, however, to end right here; and in the case of a fresh disturbance I want you never to lose sight of the fact that the weapons must be pistols—your favourite weapons—and that I am entitled to the first two shots—distance, three feet." The incident took place nineteen years after the first meeting between the two officers, during which period they had fought each other seventeen time. No fresh disturbance, it may be added, in conclusion, ever broke out between them, which was very natural when it is remembered that Dupont was entitled to the first two shots.

In 1858 M. de Pene, a Parisian journalist, was challenged by a whole regiment. Dumas fought with Gailliardet, near Paris, over a controversy concerning the authorship of "La Tour de Fesle." Marchal Ney once challenged every man in a theater. In his fatal duel with Lieutant Cecil Stackpole, after firing, said, shaking his head and smiling: "By George! I have missed him."

Lord Rowton, it is said, finds his work of producing the memoirs of Lord Beaconsfield very difficult. The papers are enormous in number, and absolutely without order or arrangement. Lord Beaconsfield seems to have kept everything in the shape of letters, disposing of them by the easy process of thrusting them into a large box.

The finest rubies are found in Ava, Siam, and Peru; others are found in India, Ceylon, Australia, Borneo, Sumatra. The Burmese mines have long been famous; the working of them is a royal monopoly, and the King has among other titles that of Lord of the Rubies. The Brazilian ruby is declared to be a pink topaz, inferior to the true ruby, yellow in its natural state, and colored artificially.

Vigilance committees are being formed in some of the Dundee, Scotland, churches. The members of committee scatter themselves over the church and note absentees and strangers. Any member out of his place for two Sabbaths is reported to the minister, who immediately adopts means to know the reason why. In like manner strangers attending for two Sabbaths are seen after with the view of attaching them to the congregation.

A recently published report states that out of every thousand recruits for the Russian army examined in 1882, 57.5 per cent. were rejected for physical disability, 460 of these were thrown out as being "too narrow chested," 50 for consumption, and 10 for poverty of the blood. Investigation showed that over 50 per cent. of the men of St. Petersburg between 20 and 22 were "weak and sickly."

In Lancashire, England, they keep up to the traditions of centuries on Easter Monday. In Preston, for instance, the whole population make a pilgrimage to the park outside the town, each with a hard boiled egg stained some color. Everybody, young and old, makes for the summit of a hill, down which the great aim is to roll the egg without getting smashed. To see crowds of well-dressed people rolling eggs against one another is a most amusing spectacle.

A general impression exists that slow-grown timber is the strongest, but this opinion does not, it is said, stand the test of experiment. There is in London a Government establishment for testing the quality and strength of all woods and metals used for Government purposes, the chronicles of which are said to be very interesting. Among other things that have been proved there, is the fact that fast-grown timber—oak at least—is the strongest, and bears the greatest degree of tension.

There have been winters in England milder than this last, exceptional as that has been. In 1882 so mild was the season that the trees were covered with leaves, and birds built their nests and hatched their young in the month of February. In 1838 the gardens were bright with flowers in January. Neither ice nor snow was visible in 1659, no fires were lit in 1692, and the softness of the weather in 1791, 1807, and 1822 was phenomenal. In 1829 white blossoms were to be seen on the trees in March, and on the vines in April.

The wearing of the primrose as the representative of Lord Beaconsfield is but one more of the many flowery symbols with which the history of England blossoms—the broom plant of the first Plantagenet; the red and white roses of Lancaster and York; the Scotch thistle which betrayed the naked footfall of the invading Dane, and so saved Scotland; the leek of the Welshman, symbolic of harvest time, when each laborer brought his share of the common dinner—a solitary leek—in his hat for the want of pockets; the rose of England and the shamrock of Ireland, emblematic of the Trinity.

The first Congregational church in Washington, which Frederick Douglass once called the only Christian church in that city, because it gave equality of admission to colored people, is disturbed by an attempt to discourage the attendance of negroes. Some of the members tried to pass a resolution advising that the colored members should attach themselves to another organization. This was overwhelmingly defeated. Now a battle is in progress over a proposition to fit up and newly carpet the Sabbath school room of the church if the colored school, which meets there in the afternoon, could be put in other quarters.

The great ladies of the Faubourg St. Germain, in Paris, the favorite quarter of the old aristocracy, usually so modest and retiring, and so averse to anything that savors of common and vulgar publicity, have suddenly changed their time-worn tactics, and now seems to have but one idea in their heads, and that is "to appear in public." Already two concerts have taken place at which the femmes du monde, headed by the Vicomtesse de Tredern and the Marquise de St. Paul, have sung and played to paying audiences—of course, for charitable purposes. At the last of these concerts such was the curiosity of the multitude to see these great ladies that 15,000 francs were taken at the doors, and one unfortunate ticket, which had been forgotten or mislaid till the last moment, was actually raffled for and fetched 300 francs.

The number of shocks in an earthquake varies indefinitely, as does the length of intervals between them. Sometimes the whole earthquake only lasts a few seconds. Thus, the city of Caracas was destroyed in about half a minute, 10,000 lives being lost in that time. Lisbon was overthrown in five or six minutes; but a succession of shocks may last for hours, days, weeks, or months. The Calabrian earthquake, which began in February, 1783, lasted through a continued series of shocks for nearly four years, until the end of 1786. The area shaken by an earthquake varies with the intensity of the shock from a mere local tract, where a slight trembling has been experienced, up to such catastrophes as that of Lisbon, which convulsed not only the Portuguese coasts, but extended into Iceland on the one hand and into Africa on the other; agitated lakes, rivers, and springs in Great Britain, and caused Loch Lomond to rise and to subside with startling suddenness.

The Revised Old Testament.

The American and English committees have almost finished their labors in the revision of the Old Testament. It is expected that the revision will be published in the course of a few months. The revision is said to have been made with the sole purpose of placing the Bible in a position in which the people may understand every word as the scholars understand them, and as the text stands in its original. To do this many of the beauties of expression have been sacrificed in order to give the true meaning of the original. The poetical forms and the archaisms will be retained to a larger extent than they were in the New Testament. The fabulous beast, the "unicorn," will give place to the wild ox. "The River of Egypt" will be "The Brook of Egypt." "The Book of Jasher" will be "The Book of the Upright." "The plain of Morah" will be "The rock of Morah." The children of Israel did not borrow of the Egyptians what they never intended to return, but they asked for and received gifts, not loans. "Joseph's coat of many colors" will be a "long tunic." "Judgment also will I lay to line, and righteousness to the plummet," will be, "I will make judgment for a line and righteousness for a plumb line." "In my flesh shall I see God" will be, "yet out of my flesh do I see God."

Some of the changes in the psalms will be:—

vii. 20. "If He turn not He will whet His sword," (meaning God), will be, "If a man turn not He will whet his sword."

viii. 5. "For Thou hast made him a little lower than the angels," will be, "Thou hast made him a little lower than God." "I will praise Thee, oh, Lord," is often translated, "I will give thanks unto Thee, oh, Lord."

ix. 7. "But the Lord shall endure forever," will be, "But the Lord sitteth as King forever."

xi. 7. "For the righteous Lord loveth righteousness; His countenance doth behold the upright," will be, "For the Lord is righteous; He loveth righteousness; the upright shall behold His face."

xxxviii. 8. "Fret not thyself in any wise to do evil," will be, "Fret not thyself, it tendeth to evil doing."

lxviii. 11. "The Lord gave the word; great was the company of those that published it," will be, "The Lord giveth the word, and the women that bring glad tidings are a great host."

lxxxiv. 6. "Who, passing through the Valley of Baca, make it a well; the rain also filleth the pools," will be, "Passing through the valley of weeping, they make it a place of springs."

xcvi. 12. "Then shall all the trees of the wood rejoice," will be, "Then shall all the trees of the wood sing for joy."

Irving's Only Appearance as a Politician.

"Once," says Mr. Labouchere, referring to the rumor that Henry Irving is about to run for Parliament; "Mr. Irving did appear on the hustings, and it was in this wise: I was the defeated candidate at the Middlesex election. Those were the days of hustings and display, and it was the fashion of each candidate to go down to Brentford in a carriage and four to thank his supporters. On the morning of the day that I had to perform this function Irving called upon me, and I invited him to accompany me. Down we drove; I made an inaudible speech to a mob, and we re entered our carriage to go to London. In a large constituency like Middlesex few know the candidates by sight. Irving felt it his duty to assume a mine de circonstance. He folded his arms, pressed his hat over his brows, and was every inch the baffled politician—defeated, sad, but yet sternly resigned to his fate. In this character he was so impressive that the crowd came to the conclusion that he was the defeated candidate. So woe-begone and so solemnly dignified did he look that they were overcome with emotion, and, to show their sympathy, they took the horses out of the carriage and dragged it back to London. When they left us I got up to thank them, but this did not dispel the illusion. 'Poor fellow,' I heard them say, as they watched Irving, 'his feelings are too much for him,' and they patted him and shook hands with him, with the kindly wish to comfort him."

DOMESTIC RECIPES.

EXTRA CYMBALS.—Four eggs, four tea-spoonsful of butter, eight of sugar, 12 of milk; spice; flour to roll.

CYMBALS OTHERWISE DOUGHNUTS.—A pint bowl of flour, a teacup of sugar, a piece of shortening the size of a small egg, one egg, sour milk with a small teaspoonful of soda, salt, nutmeg or cinnamon.

HARD GINGERBREAD.—One pound of flour, two tablespoonsful of ginger, one-half pound of sugar, one-third pound of butter, three eggs, a small teaspoon of soda; roll very thin. This gingerbread will keep a long time.

FISH PIE.—Remove bones and skin from any cold fish you may have, add to it an equal quantity of cold mashed potatoes, half as much cold rice, season with pepper, salt and little bits of butter, turn into a well greased dish and bake until lightly browned.

MOCK MINCE PIE.—One cup of cracker or bread crumbs; one cup of sugar; three-fourths of a cup of molasses; one-fourth of a cup of butter, one-fourth of a cup of boiled cider; one cup of warm water; spices and chopped raisins, one cup, or a half. Enough for two pies; very nice.

FRENCH PIE.—Any remains of cold meat free from fat and griatle and finely minced. Season as liked and moisten with plenty of gravy. Spread evenly on a pie dish, cover an inch thick with mashed potatoes, strew a few bits of butter on top and place in a quick oven until hot and brown.

FISH OMELET.—Use a cupful of any kind of cold fish broken up fine. You may add the boiled roes of shad, if you have them. Season with pepper and salt and heat in a cupful of cream gravy, same as used in potatoes. Make an omelet with six eggs, and when ready to fold, spread the hot fish evenly over it, roll up, dish, and send to table at once.

A GOOD PUDDING.—Break open and remove stones from enough plump raisins to line a well greased pudding dish. Cover the raisins with a quart of bread crumbs. To a quart of milk add three beaten eggs, sweeten, flavor and pour over crumbs. Bake until you think the pudding will retain its shape when turned out of dish, be careful, however, not to bake it until dried out. Eat with hard sauce.

POTATOES A LA LYONNAISE.—Use five sized potatoes; pare and drop them in cold water, let them remain two hours, then slice thin and drain. Put into a frying pan one sufficient lard or nice drippings to prevent the potatoes from sticking while cooking. Heat the lard hot; add onions to the taste, fry a few minutes, then add the potatoes. Stir diligently, and cook slowly until dry brown. Just before taking up, add pepper and seasoning.

Amusements of Millionaires.

Some years ago I sat one evening reading a volume of Prescott's histories in the library of a rich Wall street man who was a bank president at 30, when he came in and asked me if I really enjoyed reading such books. He added that he found it impossible to interest himself in any of the hundreds of volumes he had purchased, although he had tried hard to do so. "When I take this up," he said, "I see nothing but row after stock quotations on every page." This gentleman died at 40, and left a large fortune as the price of his life—a fortune which his family has since dissipated. Had he had anything to occupy his mind outside of his office and when he left Wall street he might have lived to enjoy the pleasure of spending the million he had made. In almost every case some special amusement or point of relaxation is a sanitary necessity for the business man whose brain is racked by the concentrated pressure of his six hours daily "street" labor. Jay Gould is a diligent reader of books and cultivator of exotics. Vanderbilt never opens a book, but his horses and stables help to freshen up his intellect. John Jacob Astor climbs to the top of his house, and in a secluded room hammers away at some mechanical inventions that are to revolutionize the industrial world—that is to say if they are perfected. Yachts, horses, aviaries, bird flies and fishing rods, or double-barrelled guns distract the attention of other men of wealth from the cares which riches bring in their train, and preserve the mental balance of their devotees. One well known broker keeps a select assortment of fowls in his back-yard, and he has no sooner entered his front door than he makes a bolt for the chicken-coop, where he fusses about until the repeated clamor of a starving household calls him to dinner. His neighbors complain of the crowing of his pet roosters, but he has a permit which protects his feathered friends, and he defies criticism. Before he kept fowls his nights were almost sleepless; now he snores all night like a farmer. It is the same story all around. "If I did not do this or that I should die," say these business-worn men who have returned to the loves and likings of their early life for relief against "black care."—New York Philadelphia Record.

Origin of the Pug.

The pug was not generally known or noticed in the United States prior to 1870. In England has been acquainted with the breed only for the past quarter century. Its origin is in doubt, and dog fanciers have given him a Muscovite or a Dutch pedigree. Many maintain that he is a cross between the English bulldog and the small Pug, but no matter what his origin or to what circumstances his popularity must be attributed, certain it is that he is very widely distributed, for he is known and petted in England, Russia, France, Holland and Japan.

A Single Fault.

"I think that young Mr. Cutaway is a perfect gentleman," remarked Mrs. Featherstone to her daughter after that young man had gone before the clock had struck ten-strike.

"He is certainly very pleasant company, but he is not perfect, mamma."

"And what have you seen to make you think he is not?"

"Why, you know," replied the young girl with a chuckle, "he certainly has a single fault."

"Well, my daughter, remember that this is leap year, and you will have yourself to blame if you allow him to have this fault at the end of the year."

Do Not Waste Bones.

The bones of fish, the bones of fowl, the large and small bones that are purchased with beefsteak and mutton, constitute the very best of food for fruit trees and grape vines, if the fragments are only placed where the roots can lay hold of them. Instead of allowing pieces of bones to be cast into the backyard, as food for stray dogs and strange cats, domestics should be directed to deposit everything of the sort in a small tub provided with a lid. As soon as only a few pounds have accumulated, we take the tub to some grape vine or fruit tree, dig a hole three or more feet long, a foot or two wide and not less than a foot deep, into which the bones are dumped, spread over the excavation, and covered with the soil. The more the fragments can be spread the better. But they should be buried so deep that the plow or spade will not touch them. The roots of growing vines or fruit trees will soon find the valuable mine of rich fertility, and will feed on the elements that will greatly promote the growth of healthy wood, and the development of fair and luscious fruit. Many horticulturists and farmers purchase bone dust, costing no less than two cents a pound simply to enrich the soil around and beneath their vines; fragments of bones are just as valuable as ground bones, although their elements of fertility will not be found available in so short a time as if the large pieces were reduced to small atoms. Nevertheless if large bones be buried three or four feet from a grape vine, the countless number of mouths at the end of the roots will soon dissolve, take up and appropriate every particle. When cast out of the kitchen door, bones are likely to become a nuisance; where as if properly buried, they become a source of valuable fertility. Let every person who owns a grape vine or fruit tree save all the bones that pass through the kitchen, and bury them where such worthless material will be turned to some profit.—Western Rural.

Agricultural Legislation.

At a public meeting, held in Ancaster, Wentworth Co., a few days ago, Mr. Awrey the M. P. P., for the county thus referred to the agricultural legislation during the last session of the Ontario Legislature.

An important measure for farmers was the connected with the spread of noxious weeds such as thistles, oxeyed daisies, red weed and burdock. The Grangers petitioned for a measure to prevent the spread of these weeds, and such a measure has been passed. Each farmer must cut his weeds, and the pathmasters must prevent them from going to seed on the roads. An inspector can be appointed by the Township Council when one is needed to see that the provisions of the Act are carried out. An Act was also passed to prevent the spread of infectious diseases in horses and other domestic animals. The foreign market for breadstuffs is becoming precarious, and Canadian farmers must turn their attention more and more to the raising of stock. If once the people of Europe are told that there are diseases among Canadian cattle, a profitable market will be cut off. It is much better to take steps in time to prevent such disaster.

Agricultural Items.

A writer in the London Agricultural Gazette is of the opinion that the polled or horned cattle are the elder type, and that the horned form is the intrusive modern style.

A gill of strong green tea is said to be a specific for sheep poisoned by eating laurel. A farmer who has used this remedy many years says he has saved hundreds of sheep by it.

Do not base swine feeding upon the idea that pigs will eat anything. They are, indeed, not very choice in their selection of food, but growth and health are best promoted when they are fed on a variety of food.

Peter's Magazine says that the best preventives of mildew on roses are good drainage, clean manuring, selection of strong varieties, proper pruning, and dusting with sulphur as soon as it appears. It is contagious, and some varieties are more subject to it than others.

An Ohio farmer washes his apple trees every spring and fall with strong lye that will float an egg, and finds it to be sure death to the borers. He claims that he has not lost a tree since beginning this practice, although he has lost several previously.

W. W. Dunham of Grapevine Farm at North Paris, Me., has pretty thoroughly demonstrated his theory of out door wintering of bees. Of fifty-three swarms of colonies that he commenced the winter with, he has only lost two swarms. He has now fifty-one lively swarms to commence the season of 1884.

The sewerage of the Town of Pullman is pumped into an aqueduct from a cesspool into which it flows from the houses, and through this aqueduct is conveyed three miles to a farm of sixty acres, where it is used for fertilizing purposes. Notwithstanding the cost of the pumping, irrigating, and draining systems used in the cultivation of this farm was 80 000, the net profit on the land has been $85,000.

It was found by careful trial at the garden of the New York Experiment Station, that the old and expensive method of growing celery in deep trenches, and with repeated "earthing up" as the plants grew, was in no way superior to the level culture method, with a single earthing to blanch the stems after they complete their growth. This is in accord with the common practice of our best gardeners at the present time, but is contrary to the teaching of the older writers on the subject.

In a late address, Prof. Wiley gave the result of his investigations to decide the question, "how far north may sorghum sugar industry extend?" He believes that the success of the sorghum sugar industry will not be found so far north as many of his friends had hoped, and many of its devotees prophesied. It is yet early to give a definite answer, but at present he inclines to the opinion that the isothermal lines for Sept., October, and November that pass through Cape May, N. J., should be considered the northern boundaries of successful sugar culture.

French gardeners says the American Gardener are quite whimsical about the manner of gathering their asparagus. They say that the neat asparagus knives advertised in the catalogues are intended for delicate people who are afraid of soiling their fingers; and the only proper way is to pick the shoots by hand. They consider it quite important to break them off at the point where they are united to the root, rather than in the ground above this point, as we usually do. They remove a little earth about the shoot with the hand, then work the fore and middle fingers into the soil near to the point of attachment, when a slight pressure of the finger under the base of the shoot causes the latter to snap off clean at the root.

Shade Trees—Planting, and After-care.

Trees that have grown in the open air, will do better than those from thick woods. In selecting those only should be taken that are perfectly sound; a dead spot, however small, will extend until it ruins the tree. Trees with short trunks and large thin tops should be chosen, avoiding such as divide into two nearly equal branches, for they will be very likely to split down. In taking up trees, every root should be secured to the utmost fibre as far as possible, and without splitting or bruising them, and the holes for planting them, should be large enough to receive the roots in their natural position. While out of the ground, the roots should be protected from the air and kept moist, and in setting them fine rich earth should be packed around all the fibres. Trees should be staked to prevent the wind from starting the roots, and well mulched to keep the ground moist and loose. A vicious practice prevails very extensively of cutting off the entire top. Tt is the death warrant of the tree. It may put out new branches and do well for a few years, but the wound will seldom heal; that will ultimately decay down into the centre of the trunk and the limbs will break off or die. This process, in its various stages, may be seen in a large proportion of the tres that have been treated in this way. If a trunk must be cut off, let it be just above a thrifty limb, whose growth will heal over the wound. If branches must be removed, they should be cut close to the trunk, great care being taken not to injure the bark or wood, the cut made smooth and covered at once with wax or paint so as to exclude the air. Shade trees are usually set to thick, from two to four times too many being put on; the ground consequently, as soon at they have grown a little, they interfere with each other, and a struggle for existence commences, in which all suffer and symmetrical growth is prevented. Trees should never be allowed to exclude the direct sunlight from a house; to do so, is to make it unfit for a dwelling. To remedy this by pruning, will leave naked trunks covered with unsightly scars, too large to heal over, which will ultimately decay and kill the tree. Thinning out is but little better, for the trees that remain will be stragglers standing at irregular distances, with forlorn and badly shaped tops.

Shade trees should be carefully watched, and all branches that start where they are not wanted, that will ever interfere with streets, walks, buildings, or other branches, should be promptly removed. Such branches are often neglected until their removal irreparably injures the shade tree. All dead limbs should be taken away at once. American Agriculturist.

The Honolulu Fish Market.

A visit to the fish market of Honolulu on a Saturday afternoon, Winter or Summer, (for there are no seasons here, remember,) is a sight seldom elsewhere to be met. Situated on the street lying beside the still surface of the bay, it seems as if the fish had only to be angled for with the fingers from the piers in order to be caught, cleaned, sold, cooked, and eaten. Every variety of fin afloat is to be seen in this market, pre-eminently the nutrious mullet. Fish-wives, fish-husbands, and fish-children barter the scaly merchandise from stalls or counters covered with fish and specie. Nowhere else that I know of could vendors leave in parallel piles upon their tables with impunity gold and silver coins often amounting to scores of dollars. A good deal of chatting, joking, and bargaining accompany proceedings in this place of trade, the picturesque natives preponderating both as buyers and sellers, while all around is life, noise, flutter, and business eagerness. The scene reminds one of the Neapolian fish market in the square where Masaniello organized his popular uprising and revolutionary revolt—that bold fisherman, king of but three days' reign. Fish is a favorite food of the Hawaiian at all times, which, with a bowl of poi, makes up his usual meal. Shellfish, shrimp especially, are sold for salads a la mayonnaise, but there is no native edible oyster The oyster of the Pacific, anywhere I have ever been, even on our California coast, in nowise equals our Atlantic Blue Points. Cheapeakes, or East River bivalves, either as regards size, flavor, or subsequent epicurean satisfaction.

The Age of the Newspaper.

Public attention is absorbed by the newspaper; and it is to the periodical press that the literary man owes both his salvation and his ruin. The large class of people who read simply to kill time, satisfy all literary cravings by drinking at the streams, clear or muddy, as the case may be, of their pet newspapers; and even the lighter class of stories appeal to them but seldom unless served up in long columns and sent through the postoffice. It is emphatically the age of the newspaper, and both author and preacher are rapidly finding themselves reduced to the choice between working for the periodical press and abandoning the field altogether. Of course, there are striking exceptions, but in the main this seems to us to be about the sense and substance of the whole matter. Literary men are as well off as ever, but they must adapt their methods of work to the times in which they live.

An Interchange of Compliments.

An attache had made one or two mistakes in copying a dispatch which he took to the Ambassador for signature. "Mistakes may be made," said Lord Stratford, after pointing them out, "by the most careful attache; how much more by the most careless!" The high-spirited young diplomatist got exceedingly incensed, and told Lord Straford that, although he was his Ambassador, he had no right to reprimand him for what was untrue, as he was not habitually careless. "You accuse me of untruthfulness! D—— your eyes!" exclaimed Lord Stratford. "D—— your Excellency's eyes!" retorted the youth. The Eltchi burst out laughing. Holding out his hand to him, he begged the attache to excuse the infirmity of his temper, and they shook hands most cordially.

SCIENTIFIC GOSSIP.

Miles of Railroad in the United States—Making Leather Waterproof—Instantaneous Photography—&c., &c.

There are 124,000 miles of railroad in the United States, or seven times as many miles as there are in the United Kingdom of Great Britain.

An announcement was made a short time since before the Linnæan Society of New South Wales by Mr. William Macleay that the total numbers of Australian fishes now amounts to 1,291 species.

An establishment in Bavaria for the manufacture and preserving of railroad sleepers is able to turn out 500,000 sleepers a year, which is about one-tenth of the number required annually for the maintenance of the German railroads.

There has lately been constructed by MM Chalhiot and Gratiot, of Paris, a new tool to which they have given the name of the biradical drilling machine. The arm is jointed or hinged in the middle so that the drill can be brought to any point on the table without shifting the latter. Bevel gear transmits the power.

Cast-iron may be so hardened as to resist cutting by an ordinary file by the following method: When the iron is brought to a cherry-red heat, sprinkle some cyanide of potassium upon it, raise the temperature then little above red heat, and, lastly, dip in the tempering tank. Cyanide of potassium may be used for case-hardening iron also with decided effect.

For the first time in the history of the Academy of Sciences, Paris, places have been offered by the Government to selected members to take part on a diplomatic commission. That learned body has recently received a requisition from M. Ferry to appoint three delegates to the international commission which is to meet in Washington on the 1st of October next to determine the choice of a first meridian.

When transplanting the strawberry, an expert forbids the removal of the runners, and recommends leaving six inches of them attached to each side of the plant. The end of these runners are then to be bent down and buried with the roots. Plants thus treated are provided with means for drawing nourishment at once, and will thrive in adverse conditions which prove fatal to plants stripped of their runners.

In making the fluid extract and tinctures of cinchona, arnica flowers, &c., Mr. Alfred B. Taylor has found it especially serviceable to use a portion of the finished preparation from a previous operation to macerate and partially exhaust the drug before applying the new portion of the menstruum; and as there is no limit to the quantity of finished preparation that can be used when necessary, it is possible to exhaust completely the drug operated upon.

Prof. Thompson, in a recent lecture, informed his audience that the magnetic pole is now near Boothia Felix, or more than 1,000 miles west of the geographical pole. In 1657 the magnetic pole was due north, it having been eastward before that year. Then it began to move westward until 1816, when the maximum was reached. This is now being steadily diminished, and in 1976 it will again point due north. Prof. Thompson says that the changes which will have been observed not only on the direction, but in the strength of the earth's magnetism, will show that the same causes which originally magnetized the earth are still at work.

For making leather waterproof the following receipt has been printed: Twenty-four parts oleic acid, 18 ammonia soap, 24 water, 6 raw stearic acid, and 3 tannin extract are thus incorporated. The oleic acid is first melted with the raw stearine, then the ammonia soap is added, afterward the tannin extract, and finally the water. The ammonia soap is obtained by treating oleic acid with ammonia until the smell of the latter is not perceptible after a prolonged stirring. By adding to the whole mixture a solution of two parts copperas in six parts of water a deep black color is secured, admirably adapted for dyeing shoe leather.

The instantaneous photographs taken of various animals in motion have received marked attention from the Berlin Physical Society. It was seen on examining the several photographs seperately that the conventional and customary representations of moving animals produced by artists were not always correct, and some of the pictures as photographed seemed to be impossible. A whole series of views of the different positions assumed by the horse when trotting, on being looked at through the stroboscope, gave instant proof, however, of their fidelity to nature. These achievements of Mr. Muybridge, of San Francisco, in photography have won for him a deservedly high European reputation.

Hitherto it has puzzled eminent surgeons to account for sudden death caused by apparently inadequate wounds in the heart, such as those made by the prick, without penetration even of a needle. Herr Schmey, a student of the Physiological Institute, Berlin, has, however, just discovered that when a needle pricks a certain small spot on the lower border of the upper third of the septum cordis, quite instantaneously the movements of the heart are arrested and forever set motionless in death. "It is now the task of anatomical investigation," says Prof. Kronecker, who vertified the discovery of his pupil, Herr Schmey, and communicated it to the Physiological Society of Berlin, "to demonstrate with accuracy this vital centre, the existence of which has been proved experimentally."

Flints, including chips and cores and a large tomahawk weighing four pounds, from Ugi, collected by Dr. H. B. Guppy, of the British Government vessel Lark, were lately exhibited and described by Dr. Liversidge before the Royal Society of New South Wales. Dr. Liversidge remarked that some years ago Mr. Brown, the Wesleyan missionary, brought from New-Britain a soft white limestone which was quite undistinguishable from chalk, not only physically but chemically, and pointed out that this discovery of flints afforded another very strong proof of the probable presence of true chalk or cretaceous age in the South Sea Islands. The flints which were shown before the society possesses all the characteristics of those from the chalk of Europe, and cannot by mere inspection be distinguished from them.

THE EFFECTS OF WHISKEY.

The effects of whiskey are always evil, and those who feed upon alcoholic stimulants, vainly endeavoring to cure coughs and consumption, but nurse a viper. Hagyard's Pectoral Balsam is a remedy that is always reliable for all throat bronchial and lung troubles, and never does harm to any one.

I would'nt be without the STANDARD no how: the people.

CURE FOR DEAFNESS.

As numerous testimonials will show, there is no more reliable cure for deafness than Hagyard's Yellow Oil. It is also the best remedy for ear ache, sore throat, croup, rheumatism, and for pains and lameness generally. Use externally and internally.

FRAUDULENT TRANSACTIONS.

There are many frauds perpetrated in medicine, and many advertised remedies worse than useless. Not so with Hagyard's Yellow Oil. It remains as ever the best internal and external medicine for all pain, soreness and injuries with which human flesh is afflicted.

Subscribe for the STANDARD, only $1.00 a year in advance to any address.

National Pills are sugar coated, mild but thorough, and are the best Stomach and Liver Pill in use.

A WIDE RANGE OF USEFULNESS.

The great household remedy so popular with the people—Hagyard's Yellow Oil—is alike valuable for external and internal use, curing rheumatism, colds, sore throat, croup, frost bites, burrs, bruises, and all lameness and soreness of the flesh.

Letter Heads neatly printed and put up in pads at this office.

SPRING CLEANING.

Every good housewife will renovate the entire house at least every Spring and Fall. Our systems often need renovating also, and there is nothing better to make pure blood and cleanse and regulate all the secretions than Burdock Blood Bitters, preventing diseases incidental to the season's changes.

A RELIABLE WITNESS.

R. N. Wheeler, of Everton, speaks highly of Hagyard's Pectoral Balsam, having seen its effects in his own case, a severe inflammation of the lungs and distressing cough, was quickly and perfectly cured, which has resisted other treatment.

BODY FOUND.—On Tuesday morning last a boy about twelve, named Fred. Clark, found the body of a newly born infant in a ploughed field on Lot 9 in the 3rd con. of Sydenham. The field has been ploughed about three weeks ago, and seeded, with the exception of a corner reserved for potatoes, and on Mouday evening that portion was harrowed preparatory to ploughing again. On going out to the field next day the body of the child was found. It was naked, and had evidently been buried since the first ploughing, but dragged to light by the harrow. As yet there is no clue to who placed it there. An inquest was held by Coroner Cameron on Wednesday, when the evidence of Dr. Denhart, who made the post mortem examination, was to the effect that the child had been born alive. The jury adjourned for two weeks in the hope that some information may be elicited in the meantime.—O. S. Times.

A PAINFUL OCCURRENCE.

Some of the most painful sufferings that afflict mortals occur from rheumatism. Either the acute or chronic form may be eradicated from the bloon by an early use of the grand purifying system renovator, Burdock Blood Bitters.

A BAD INFIRMITY.

The loss of the sense of hearing is both annoying and dangerous. Those suffering from deafness should try Hagyard's Yellow Oil according to directions. This invaluable house hold remedy cured John Clark, of Millbridge, Ontario, restoring his hearing in one week.

Crop Reports.

From the Bureau of Industries for May 1884.

Reports received from over six hundred correspondents of the Bureau show that the condition of Fall Wheat in the Province is much more satisfactory than it was in May of last year. Yet it is not uniformly good, and there are some districts in which the outlook is somewhat gloomy. This is noticeably the case in the extreme ends of the Province—westward of the meridian of London, and eastward of the meridian of Kingston. For the large middle district the accounts are on the whole favorable, and the weather of this month has caused a marked improvement to take place everywhere. Complete returns of the acreage under crop have not yet been received, but as far as they have been obtained they indicate an area twenty per cent. less than last year.

In the Lake Erie counties the crop got a poor start in the fall, but excepting in the southern portions of Essex and Kent it was well protected throughout the winter, and though thin on the ground it looked healthy when the snow disappeared in spring. In the localities mentioned it suffered much from intense cold and a strong wind off the lake in the month of January, and correspondents report that considerable areas have been plowed up or re-sown with barley. The extent of this injury in the townships of South Colchester, Gosfield and Mersea is estimated at about 50 per cent. Spring frosts and raw east winds had injurious effects in all the counties of this group, but especially in Essex, Kent and Elgin. The reports for Norfolk, Haldimand and Welland are much more encouraging, and farmers are hopeful of securing an average yield. Great improvement has taken place during the present month, especially on the sandy, gravelly and loamy soils. The worst effects of spring frosts were noticeable on undrained clay lands, but cloudy weather favored a partial recovery. The great importance of tree shelter is frequently referred to by correspondents, as also the necessity of efficient tillage and underdrainage.

Though reports from the Lake Huron counties vary considerably in estimating the extent to which the fall wheat crop has been injured, they are practically unanimous as to the causes of the injury and its distribution as regards soil and cultivation. The dry weather of seed time, followed as it was by frost and cold winds in September and October, left the young plants rather feebly equipped to encounter successfully the vicissitudes of winter and spring; and though they were in fair condition when the snow disappeared the dry frosts of the latter part of March and the early part of April did serious and, in many places, irrecoverable damage to the crop. Wheat sown on light, dry soils generally sustained the least injury, though in a few cases low, rich, "mucky" soils, and, in a few others, well-drained clay lands, are mentioned as having enjoyed almost coplete immunity from damage. Upon this point, however, the reports may be summed up by saying that the best safeguards against the effects of the spring frosts proved as usual to be—putting the crop in early and well, and thorough underdrainage in the case of land not naturally dry and well drained. Two or three correspondents mentioned the poor quality of the seed wheat sown as one cause—though evidently a minor one—of the poor appearance of the crop. As mentioned in the November report of the Bureau, the new seed last year was shrunken with rust and foul with weeds, and probably for that reason farmers were unable to exercise their usual care in the selection of seed grain. As the reports to the Bureau were made in the midst of weather favourable to the partial recovery of the fall wheat, the effects of the spring frosts may yet be considerably modified, and for this reason it would be unsafe to make a very positive estimate of the crop at this date. But, leaving this uncertain factor out of account, the fall wheat in these three counties can hardly be expected to be more than from one-half to two-thirds of a full crop for the total acreage sown. The quantity ploughed up has been large in some parts of Huron county, while in Lambton and Bruce the acreage is on the whole inconsiderable. From the township of Moore, Lambton county, comes a report that the wireworm has damaged wheat sown on sod.

The accounts from the Georgian Bay counties strike every note from "very poor" to "excellant," yet as a whole they promise a crop somewhat below the average. Considerably less than the usual breadth was sown, and for this a large area was got in so late that, though the crop wintered fairly well, the young plants had not body enough to withstand the frosts and cold winds of March and the early part of April. Wheat on exposed knolls and uplands from which the wind swept the snow in winter and early spring suffered most; while that on low, clayey soils, especially when well drained, as a rule escaped very serious damage. As usual the reports practically concur as to the good effects of early sowing and efficient drainage in enabling the plants to resist the prevailing spring frosts. Unfortunately, however, the acerage of wheat which is both early sown and well drained is this year apparently but a small proportion of the entire crop in those counties. On report from the township of Innisfil, Simcoe county, mentions the Hessian fly as a local, and apparently not a very searious cause of damage to the crop. The quantity of land ploughed up is very small, even in cases where the reports are rather gloomy,—a fact which would seem to imply a tacit hope of recovery under the influence of the recent more favourable weather.

The West Midland counties promise a full average crop, Perth being about the only member of the group which does not expect to realize this hope. In nearly all cases where failure is present, it is not general or in wide areas, but in patches, so that it would appear to be due not so much to universal as to local or incidental causes. The reports concur in tracing these causes to late sowing, to consequently retarded growth, to the dry, cold winds and the frosty nights of April, and to the want of careful cultivation, shelter and especially drainage. The wheat generally wintered successfully, but on emerging from the snow it had attained such little growth, unless guarded by effective drainage or shelter, as to be peculiarly liable to frost. While in some cases low, flat, heavy, undrained lands have lost half their growth, and have had to be ploughed up for other crops, properly drained lands, whether light or heavy, especially, if sown early, almost invariably promise to yeald abundantly. The general condition may be succinctly summarized in the words of a Middlesex correspondent: "On light, loamy soil, well drained by nature or art, well sheltered and well tilled, and put in in season, very good; on flat soil, and heavy clay, with these conditions reversed, appearance poor, and in some cases very poor." Another correspondent in Waterloo county says: "On light soil or drained, land, where early sown, very good; on the same soil, ten days later sown, very inferior: on heavy or undrained land, very poor." Under the recent genial showers the wheat has taken a fresh start, and with the continuance of favourable weather some of even the poorest fields, where the plant though thin shows vitality, have a chance of recovery. In certain rare cases in Oxford and Middlesex, the wireworm has been at work, but otherwise fall wheat is thus far almost entirely free from insect pests.

The report from the counties bordering on Lake Ontario are extremely encouraging. Generally, the crop promises to be about the average, and in the western counties of the group, where fall wheat is more largely sown than in the eastern, it is said to look "better than for years." From the adverse conditions which have been more or less destructive in other districts, the Lake Ontario counties have suffered but very slightly. The plant generally came through the winter backward, but healthy; and though frost destroyed some fields in a few northern townships, and some patches elsewhere owing to defective drainage, in most cases the effect of the dry cold of April was to retard growth. With the recent rains, however, the wheat has taken a fresh and vigorous start, and is rapidly making up for lost time. The farmers are highly satisfied with the prospect, for it is now growing well; it appears to be entirely free from insect pests; and, except in a few isolated instances, they will not be under the rueful necessity of ploughing up any portion of their wheat fields for other crops.

Returns for the St. Lawrence and Ottawa group of counties more than confirm the statement made in the November report of the Bureau as to the decreased acreage of fall wheat sown in these counties, and the unpromising condition of the crop when the snow fell. Fall wheat is never very largely sown in the eastern end of the Province, and the bad outlook for the decreased area under the crop this year will be likely still further to discourage its growth. Lennox and Addington are the only counties in the group from which the reports are anything like uniformly favorable, and in Lanark Renfrew, Dundas and Glengarry it is almost total failure, occasionly well-sheltered patches being apparently about the only exceptions. The report from the other countries vary, but only in a few isolated localities does there appear to be a prospect of even a fair yield, while over large areas nearly the whole crop has been plowed up and re-sown in spring grain. Spring frosts, acting on plants which had attained only a feeble growth in the fall, are usually given as the cause of failure, but in some places the crop suffered from the great depth of snow, and the icy crust which formed on surface after the January rains. While the spring frosts naturally proved most destructive to the tender, late-sown plants, those which attained a rank growth in the fall suffered most damage from "smothering" by the snow. As a rule, light sandy loam soils did best, but some reports speak of heavy clay land, well-drained, as being specially exempt from the general destruction. In some cases farmers seem at a loss to account for the failure, as in the following report from the township of McNab, Renfrew county: "I do not know a good field of fall wheat in this township. It is nearly all plowed up, and I do not know any difference as to soil. A few patches on new land are all that remain. All are at a loss to know the cause, as the season appeared favorable. The wheat appeared to rot in the ground, as the snow lay deep, and there was scarcely any frost in the ground." One report from Kenyon township, Glengarry county, speaks of "severe attacks by grubworms."

In the East Midland counties the condition of the crop is rather varying. In Victoria the opening of spring found the growth thin and delicate, and the frosts of April were so destructive as to leave only the prospect of a yield much below the average. Some fields in the southern portion of the county, enjoying exceptional advantages in the way of drainage and shelter, are looking strong and healthy; but elsewhere the outlook is anything but cheering, and on many farms from 25 to 50 per cent. of the wheat has been plowed up. In Peterboro, on the other hand, it appears to have more successfully withstood the frost, and gives promise of a fair average yield. As in other counties, the lateness of the sowing season gave no chance for good growth in the fall but under the nourishing influence of the recent rains the plant is turning out much better than the conditions of a month ago seemed to warrant any hope for. In Hastings and Haliburton fall wheat is not so largely cultivated as in the other counties of this group, but where sown and properly attended to it is a fairly successful crop. No injury from worms or insects is anywhere complained of. On the whole, present appearances do not give hope of an average crop in this district, though there is a possibility of a continuance of favorable weather producing such a change as to require a modification of this report for the better. The rule so frequently cited elsewhere has been equally realized here, that a successful crop is not so dependent upon the character of the soil as upon such controllable conditions as efficient drainage, summer fallowing, early sowing, shelter, and careful husbandry. The greatest damage has been inflicted on soils which are low and undrained, or that are unprotected from the northern winds.

In the northern districts of the Province fall wheat is not grown, except in a few isolated instances in some of the more southerly townships of Muskoka. In these cases, however, it is reported to be thriving, especially on light and dry soils.

LIESCHEN.

Who chooseth me must give and hazard all he has—Merchant of Venice.

"Lieschen," child, I must say adieu. I know not when I shall see thee again."

"Adieu, then, Gustav. A pleasant journey to you! If you didn't come back for fifty years you would find me still here, milking the cows and attending to the household. Life here is much the same year by year."

"And thou wouldst not fret, Lieschen, if I did not come for fifty years?"

He spoke as though he scarcely knew whether to jest or be in earnest, and stood watching her with a wistful, doubtful smile. She was making buttermilk cheeses at the dresser by the scullery window, and he was leaning in over the window-sill, with a pipe smoldering in one hand, while the other kept breaking off little twigs and roses that clambered all round the window, and made a pretty frame to his sun-burned face and broad shoulders.

Lieschen laughed at his question, as she shaped the little white cheeses all speckled over with caraway-seeds, and did not look up.

"You would be about a hundred years old then, Gustav, I think," was the only remark she made.

"No, come, Lieschen, that is cruel of you. I am only thirty-eight—more than twice your age, it is true, but not nearly fifty. And it is something to have a fine farm and a good new house, and the only carriage on Regen, even if your husband is old enough to know white from black."

"Yes, I know," said Lieschen, indifferently; "but there is plenty of time yet."

Gustav Baier bit his lip and frowned uneasily as he looked at her.

"Thou dost not care, Lieschen, 'tis plain to see," he said bitterly. "I think thou hast no heart at all, for all thine eyes are so sweet and thy ways so gentle. Thou'rt some mermaiden from the sea here, and one day will vanish like the foam. Is it not so?"

"I don't make myself," retorted the girl petulantly, "and I never asked you to come and fall in love with me. If you are not satisfied"—she drew the gold betrothal ring from her finger—"here's your ring. Give it to somebody that has a heart for you."

He left the window abruptly, and she glanced up, flushed and frightened, not knowing what he meant to do. The next minute he came in at the door from the yard, and went up to the table where she stood with the ring in her open hand.

"Come, come, we mustn't quarrel," he said peaceably, replacing the ring, and drawing her onto his knee as he sat on the dresser. "I shall not be satisfied till that ring is on the other hand, and you have come away home with me."

Lieschen hung her head, and her big brown eyes filled with tears

"What, crying!" he remonstrated, taking her chin in his great rough hand, and turning her unwilling face round towards him. "Thunder and lightning, why, so she is! You spoil those eyes my pretty one. What's it all about? Art not happy, Lieschen?"

"Yes, quite," she said, with a gulp, "if you would let me alone, Gustav. I am yours now—what more do you want? You say I have no heart; I can't give you what I havn't got."

"Why, that's true. Give me kisses instead, then," said he, magnanimously,—"enough for fifty years, in case I do not see thee again."

"Stupid old Gustav!" cried the girl, laughing and struggling. "There, that will do! Put me down, Gustav."

"Ach! see, now, these lovers, these lovers!" cried an old shrill voice in the doorway. "Tears and smiles and kisses, kisses and smiles and tears! So runs the world away, and the old folk are forgotten."

"Lieschen counts me one of the old folk, nurse," remarked Gustav, pausing to speak, but holding his prisoner helpless the while in his great strong arms.

"Tut, tut, child! Not many maidens of sixteen can boast of such a fine, brave lover as thine, with his broad farm and nice new house and steading, and everything heart can desire. Not but what thou canst bring him linen enough to stock the house, were it twice the size it is; but he had no need to seek out a simple child like thee to be his bride."

"So I tell him, nurse. I didn't want him — O Gustav!" Her speech was smothered in his great red beard.

"Good-by, dearest," he said at last, putting her down. "Take care of her for me, nurse. I don't think it will be fifty years before I come again," he added, turning to Lieschen as he went out, "though to me at least, it will seem twice as long."

Perhaps the wistful look in his eyes, or the sadness that crept into his voice as he said these last words, touched the girl; perhaps she loved him after all; anyhow, before he had crossed the threshold she ran after him and slipped her hand through his.

"I'll go as far as the gate with you dear Gustav," she said; and they walked away down the yard together.

"Look at my young ducks, Gustav; aren't they growing fast? And the chickens too! And look at those lazy geese; they do nothing but feed and sleep. Do you know, I thought they were all up, every one of them?"

"Ay, thou'rt a brave housewife, Lieschen; and it thou loveth thy father now, and servest him so well, I doubt not thou'lt love me when the time comes. Adieu, herzliebchen! Be good and happy and don't forget me—eh?"

"No, you dear, good Gustav! Adieu! Come soon again!" And so they parted.

"Nurse," said Lieschen, re-entering the scullery, "how do people come to have hearts?"

"Du lieber Himmel! What does the child mean? Hearts? Why, they are born so!" exclaimed the old woman, taking off her spectacles, the better to see her young questioner. "What art thou chattering about?"

"Gustav says I have no heart, nurse," she replied, sitting on the old woman's knee and stroking her white hair, "and I think he is right. How do we get hearts?"

"Herr Gustav should rejoice that thou hast none," said the old nurse, looking thoughtfully into the bright young face with her dim eyes: "it comes by suffering—suffering and sorrow and trial, and weeping and loving—loving brings it all. They say a heart is like the steel in iron; 'tis there, but you can not have it till it has gone through the terrible fires and been beaten on the anvil. The good God save thee from finding thine; for truly I think it would be thy death, my little flower."

"Gustav is very good to me," murmured Lieschen, slowly turning the ring on her finger. "I think I do love him; he is so tall and broad and strong—he could kill me with one hand, nurse, I do think."

"Behute! What nonsense the child does talk!" exclaimed the nurse. "But see," she said pointing to the window, "is not that thy Gustav come back again? Run, child, and see what brings him."

Lieschen ran out into the yard, but stopped suddenly short, petrified with fear at the sight that met her eyes.

"Bring him in—so—gently," Gustav was saying; and two farm servants followed him, bearing between them the apparently lifeless body of a young man—the head fallen back, the eyes closed, the lips parted, the hands hands hanging limply down, the clothes stained here and there with blood.

"Run, away, child, run away! 'Tis no sight for thee," Gustav called out, when he saw her standing there white and frightened. "We want the nurse."

Then he turned to the old woman, who had come out, and explained rapidly; Lieschen, instead of running away, listened eagerly to every word:

"There has been a duel—unless it was darker work. We found him in the wood up yonder, bleeding to death. Where can we lay him down? The nearer the better—here on this sofa?"

"Oh, anywhere—yes!" cried Lieschen, brimming over with pity.

And so they laid him down on the sofa in the little sitting room, and then Gustav, not unkindly, but quite irresistibly, put Lieschen outside the door.

She stood there with her hands pressed together, every nerve strained to interpret the sounds that came from within, half muffled by the loud beating of her own heart.

"Ach, Gott! If only he be not dead!" she murmured, as the stillness seemed to grow intolerable. Then there came a low gasping moan of pain, and she heard Gustav say:

"He is coming to: water now, and linen."

Then the old nurse came out hurriedly, her eye fell upon the girl's white face, and she sent her to fetch a bundle of old linen from the press in the garret as quick as might be, while she herself went for water.

When Lieschen came flying back the nurse had returned to the side of the wounded man, and she stole in after her with the linen. She could hardly repress the cry of pain and pity that rose to her lips when she saw the deathlike pallor of the face lying back on Gustav's supporting shoulder; but she felt that she must be very quiet if she would not draw attention to the fact that she had come in unbidden.

The nurse took the linen from her hands without noticing her at all, and then Gustav helped with his disengaged hand, gently unfastening and laying open the young man't coat, disclosing a white shirt all soaked with blood.

"Cut it—cut it!" said Gustav impatiently; "there's no time to lose."

"What a pity! and the linen so fair and fine," lamented the nurse, in an undertone. "The lad is noble, no doubt."

"No doubt," echoed Gustav: "but, noble or not, he must die if we can't staunch this bleeding at once. If only I had both hands free!" he muttered, exasperated at the tremulous slowness of the old woman. "This won't do, and not a soul in the house to help! Here, Lieschen, you must be useful. Come and hold up his head—so, so—upon your shoulder. Lucky I've seen so much of this in the war, and know what to be at," he remarked to himself. And Lischen knelt and took the heavy, fainting head upon her bosom, and closed her eyes to shut out the sight of blood that almost overcame her.

Now and then, when one of those gasping moans broke from him, she opened them quickly, and gazed in tearful distress at the white face so near her own, and yet seeming, too, so far away—half-way into those cold domains of death that are so very far off to those that are strong and young.

"Yes, he is noble," she thought to herself, trying to keep still and patient, under the weight that began to make her limbs ache and tremble. "His hair is like the sunshine, and all waving—like that picture of an angel in my Bible," she thought, noting him curiously; "and his forehead is so white that the veins show through. No doubt he is an officer,"—this she merely inferred from the nightly growth that fringed his upper lip,—"and how beautiful he is! Gustav is handsome, but not like him;" and she could almost have laughed at the idea of a comparison between great, broad Gustav, with his sun-browned face, fine rough-hewn features, and his red beard, and the delicate refinement and almost womanly fairness of the other face. At length Gustav released her, and laid the lad as he called him—he looked about five-and-twenty—gently down on the pillows.

"He may do now," he said, after watching him a while. "I must leave him to your care, nurse, and that of Herr Uterhart. You will explain it—what little we know—when he returns to-night. Good-by, heart's darling! Thou'lt be a first-rate nurse ere I come again," and he kissed his betrothed on either cheek, and went away.

It was drawing towards evening. A familiar clatter of wooden shoes on the outside told Lieschen it was time to go amilking. She stole out, tied on her great sunbonnet, took up her stool and pail, and followed the women away to the meadows, as she did morning and evening all the summer through.

The shadows were growing very long and the colors fading in the western sky when they came back; and Lieschen still had her young ducks and fowls to shut up for the night. As she crossed and recrossed the yard—now with a can of water, now with the pail and stool ready for the morning—she sang in a shrill, sweet voice some of those lovely, plaintive volkelieder—those "songs of love and longing," of endless wandering, seeking, and yearning, that have sprung from the heart of the German people.

Before going into the house, all her work done, she wandered through the garden, under the heavy-laden syringa and bowery wilderness of roses, down on to the seashore, and stood there, dreamly looking over the smooth water into the fading sky, and listening to the plash of the little waves falling on the sand. She thought of what Gustav had said about the mermaid, and thought if would be sweet to float away on the quiet tide, under the glimmering sky, and see the little stars light up one after another in the golden green up there, and watch the flights of birds winging over, and singing beside the boats of fishermen at their nightly toil, and dip down at sunrise—down, down among the seaweed forests where strange wild creatures swim in and out, and the sea flowers bloom, and the mermaids sit combing their long, golden hair under the tideless Baltic sea.

She was a strange, romantic child, this Lieschen, full of dreams and longing fancies; and this seemed better to her than to be a creature of flesh and blood, with a human heart and human hope and blessed with the love of man.

"And they live three hundred years," she murmured half aloud, as the light died off the sea, "unless they strive to win an immortal soul by the love of a living man; if they fail they vanish in the sea-foam on the day when he weds another. But there is never, never found a man. He gives his love to a creature of his own sphere, and the foam ever gathers on the sea. If I were a mermaid, though,"—a shy, proud smile gleamed across her face,—"I would not fail."

Lieschen was sitting in the sick-room one hot summer afternoon, her patient asleep on the couch, and the warm, fragrant air floating in with the murmuring of bees at the open window. Her work lay in her lap, but her hands were idle, and her eyes gazing dreamily out at the sky, while very, very low and softly, she sang: "War' ich ein Vogelein."

"Brava! brava!" murmured a voice from the couch behind her. "A sweet voice and a sweet song!"

Lieschen colored at his praise and went and knelt by his side.

"I thought you were asleep. You are stronger—you feel better, life is coming back!" she said, in a voice quite tremulous with joy. "Ach, Gott! you have been so ill; do you not know it?"

He smiled faintly.

"How long have I been here?" he asked.

"Nearly three weeks," she answered. "See how thin!" and she lifted up the hand that lay on the coverlet, and showed him how wasted it had grown.

He looked at it with a languid sort of curiosity, and then let it fall heavily by his side, and turned his head on the pillow to look at her.

She was a good sight for sick eyes to rest upon, with her pretty brown hair, and great, gentle brown eyes so full of womanly pity, tenderness and submission, and, withal, dreamy and wistful as a child's eyes

"And who art thou, dear child?" he asked presently.

"I am Eliso Uterhart—Lieschen they call me. Thit is my home; I live here with my father and nurse, and keep the house."

"And hast thou nursed me all these week?"

"Yes," she answerad, "and I have prayed for you when I thought you were dying, and see, the dear God has heard. You live and will grow well and strong again."

"Dear child! I owe thee my life. What can I give thee or do for thee?"

Lieschen blushed, her eyes faltered from his face, and she looked down in silence.

"Náy, ask what thou wilt, 'tis thine, if I have it to give.

"Indeed, I know not; 'tis nothing I have done, only watching," stammered Lieschen. "Tell me your name," and she raised her eyes to his.

He tried to hold out his hand, and she put hers into it. "Let be, then, "he said, slowly;" there is time enough. My name? is Otto von der Lanken: I—"

"Ach! You are tired," interrupted the girl, seeing a helpless look come into his eyes as he broke off." Drink this, and do not speak any more."

She raised his head with one arm, and he drank the milk she held to his lips. Then she laid him down upon the pillows, and went back to her seat by the window, he watching her with the idle look of a man still too weak to speculate about things, or think any thoughts, but one or two that seemed of themselves to pass in and out of his brain.

Lieschen smiled and shook her head at him, "Shut your eyes and sleep," said she with a pretty little authoritative air.

"Sing, then," he murmured, inclined to dictate his own terms, and watching her every gesture with passive enjoyment; "sing to me."

Lieschen could think of no song but the one she had been singing when he woke, which was still running in her head and she sang it.

Ach! wie ist's moglich dann
Dass ich dich lassen kann?
"Ah! can it ever be
That I should part from thee

When she had finished she turned and looked at him, and saw tears standing in his eyes.

"'Tis very sweet," he murmured, "and plain to see that thou knowest what love is. Sing again—the last verse again."

So she sang again:

"Were I a birdie wee,
And by thy side would be,
Fearing not hawk nor kite,
To thee swift I'd fly.
Pierced by the hunter's dart,
I'd nestle next thy heart;
If one tear dimmed thy eye,
Glad then I'd die."

And he closed hif eyes ahd slept.

So the slow summer days went by. Every day he grew a little stronger, and by degrees she gathered from him the story of the duel which had so nearly been fatal to him; how he and his friend had quarreled about a lady and had fought.

"I suppose they thought me dead and left me," said Otto. "One has not much time to waste on these occasions. Poor Rudolf! He will have fled; but he can come back now, since no harm is done."

"And the lady?" asked Lieschen, breathlessly.

"She will marry Rudolf no doubt," replied Otto, with a hard laugh; "and I shall dance at the wedding."

Lieschen said nothing; but the great, dark eyes that rested on his face were lighted with a new fire, a burning worship, an unspeakable devotion; her heart beat, and her pulses thrilled with a new, sweet, mysterious pain. The die was cast.

At last there came a day—oh, those days, those few days that make up the earthly history of a life! Some all in white and garlanded with fresh flowers of spring; some flaming in gold and crowned with sun—coming slowly, surely on, each in its appointed time, neither sooner for our longing nor later for our agony of fear; and we can not choose but take them all and bear them shine; some—some there must be — draped deep in black. There they are within the veiled future, till the last sands have run, and there are no more. There came a day when Otto von der Lanken bade farewell. He went through the garden looking for his little nurse to say good-by to her, but could not find her; then he saw little foot-marks in the sandy path under the roses and syringas that led down on to the shore. He followed them, and found Lieschen standing by the tide looking out to sea.

"Lieschen," he said, coming up to her, "I am come to say good-by!"

"Oh, not to-day!" cried Lieschen, clasping her hands and looking up at him with her great piteous eyes: "not so soon!"

"Doch ja, liebes kind," he answered, kindly; "I am well again and strong, thanks to my good little Lieschen, and it is time to be up and doing. And now," he added, seeing the tears rush to her eyes, "now what can I do for thee, sweet child? Ask what thou wilt."

She looked up at him a moment, standing there so tall and straight and fair, with the sun on his bright hair and the blue sky shining in his eyes, and then she put her hands over her face and sobbed aloud like a little child.

"Donner!" ejaculated the young count softly to himself, in great perplexity. Then he drew a step nearer. "Dear little Lieschen, don't cry, for pity's sake! What can I do for thee? Tell me."

"Oh, give me your love—your love!" she cried out passionately. "Love me, if only a little!" and then she broke down utterly and leaned her little brown head against his arm, crying bitterly.

"Why, that thou hast, dear one—not a little, but a great deal. Who could help loving thee?" he answered soothingly. "Ask something harder, for my love thou hast."

After a long pause she looked up through her tears. "And thou wilt—thou wilt come back one day?"

"Why, surely," said he, "I am not worth all these tears, pretty one! Be happy, right happy, till I come again. Adieu now, sweet child! Auf Wiedersehen! auf baldig Wiedersehen!" He stooped and kissed her on the forehead, and went away up the sand, turning under the syringas to wave another farewell, and then she heard his horse's hoofs clattering up the yard, and he was gone.

Gone! How it haunted her day after day as she passed in and out of the house, empty of his presence; down the garden and the meadows, which knew his step and voice no more; and upon the shore, where he had bidden her farewell! Weeks passed before she at all turned from that feeling of missing him so sorely to the hope of his return. He had said "Auf Wiedersehen!" Perhaps in a week, a month—perhaps at harvest-time—perhaps at Christmas—he would come, she thought, as the time went by.

But he did not come—not even when it was spring, and the early leaves came out, and the clouds lifted and shone white in the young sunshine, and the birds sang merrily.

Gustav came and went, and began to urge the marriage. Perhaps he saw that his betrothed was losing the pretty roses in her cheeks, and that the light in her eyes was growing sad and strange; and he—knowing as none but he knew how much he loved her—longed to take her to himself in his own home and make her happy.

So they fixed a day at last, and Lieschen, like one in a dream, helped the old nurse to make all preparations, and plied her needle busily.

All was ready at length, and two days before the wedding Lieschen stood on the shore, her work done, and no more to do but to wait now for the dawning of the day that was to bring Gustav and make her his wife.

As she stood there she seemed to hear a voice answering her own thoughts:

"Thou wilt lose all, bethink thee well—all if thou fail. Thy father's love, thy peaceful home, thy fair name, thy good, honest husband—all will be lost!"

"Alas, alas, I know it!" she answered, weeping; "but I can not, will not fail!"

She went into the house and looked into the sitting room. There sat her father in his chair asleep, the pipe still between his fingers, and the room dim with smoke. Her lips seemed to frame some word they vainly sought to utter, and then with a choking, stifled sob, she turned and stole away—away out of the house, across the meadows, and on toward the shore of the other side of the promontory, on which lay her father's farm. She was not strong, but something within her gave her power to walk all night in the chill spring weather. Long before noon next day she had caught the Stralsund steamer on its backward way, and was being crrried across the water to Stralsund.

She felt no weariness, no hunger, thirst, or cold, and only longed to be on foot once more. She was quite familar with the quaint old town, and hurried up the quay, across the Water street, and up under the dark, shadowy Zemlower gateway, along the quiet streets where grass grows between the stones of the pavement, and the old gabled houses have looked down for hundreds of years upon the simple burgher life below. She went through the town and out into the country beyond, past many a pleasant little farm, where the storks were patching up their great nests on the thatched barns and cow-houses, and making their curious rattling cry as they flew to and fro. She remembered that the storks used to bring summer in old days and all good gifts when they came back, and that this spring they had not yet come to her home on Rugen. In one little village she asked for a drink of milk, and they made her eat and rest a little while; but she was restless and anxious to be gone, so they let her go, though the wind was rising and blowing sharp and keen, and little flakes of snow were flying through the air.

By nightfall a fierce storm was blowing, and the air was thick with driving snow. Lieschen asked shelter at a farm lying a little back from the high road.

"How far is it to Friedenhagen?" she asked.

"What, hast thou friends at Friedenhagen? In the service of the Count von der Lanken, then?"

"Yes, I have a friend there," answered the girl, with a faint smile. "Is it far now?"

"Why thou wilt not walk it, surely? 'Tis a good four hours from here."

"Oh, I am very strong," answered Lieschen bravely. "Only let me sleep here, and then I shall be able to do it."

So she slept there; but very early in the morning she rose and stole away out on the snowy road in the cutting, pitiless wind, leaving behind her as a token of her gratitude, the only thing she had to give—her betrothal ring.

"She has a sad story, doubtless, poor thing!" said the good people, shaking their heads over it; and they put it away, forgot all about it and her.

Meanwhile she pressed on till it was growing toward noon, and then the walls turrets of the great Schloss Friedenhagen rose dimly through the falling snow, every step her tired feet grew heavier, snow glared upon her aching eyes, and cold winds seemed to pierce her through and through; but still she struggled on, stood at length under the great porchere, and rang the bell. She had thought of her soiled and draggled dress or of the impression she might make on the servants; no thought at all of them, only of him, of Otto von der Lanken, that another moment must bring them face to face.

She heard bells ringing merrily—the only phanton music in her tired brain! then the door opened, and a rough man demanded her business and her name.

"Who are you, and what are you about on such a day as this?"

Lieschen vaguely fancied he was rude to the snow, and timidly asked to see the young Herr Graf.

The man laughed aloud.

"A pretty request, truly! Come another day, mein fraulein. Know you not that the young Herr Graf has just brought home a bride, and is to-day receiving the congratulations of all his noble friends? The most gracious lord would be somewhat astonished to take it, to see a beggar-maiden like you among the train. Make way, make way," and he pushed her hastily aside as a carriage came rolling up the drive.

Lieschen turned away faint, stunned, exhausted, broken-hearted, and the gay throng went laughing and chatting up the steps and into the great hall, and the door was shut.

Two days later a big, broad-shouldered man, with a sun-browned face and a long beard, came riding along the snowy road toward Friedenhagen. The storm was over, but the great drifts still lay piled by the roadside—deep, broad, and white. The green buds of spring were withered on the boughs; sullen clouds moved slowly across the leaden sky, and huddled in great masses about the south and west; it was freezing, but the bitter wind was still. The horseman's face was sad and stern, and he looked absently at the snow as he rode along, and suddenly a great cry broke from his lips. He flung down the reins and sprang to the ground.

"Ach, nimmermehr! Ach, du Gott! Lieschen, Lieschen! my little Lieschen!"

For there, covered but not hidden by the snow, he discovered something—something that told him all, almost before his eyes had fully seen it—a few shadows, a few waving lines, a sweeping tress of dark-brown hair. He fell down beside the still, unbreathing form, and put back the matted hair which was blown across her face, and kissed the frozen eyes, the frozen parted lips, and the little frozen hands in vain; dead, quite dead, his little Lieschen—frozen in the drifted snow.

That was the end of it all. He saw the ring was gone from her hand, but for what why he could not guess. He only knew that she had fled from her wedding-day and from him, and dimly felt that Otto von der Lanken might be the cause—whether innocent or guilty he could not tell, and little cared to know, since all was lost.

And Otto von der Lanken never knew. "That pretty child will have forgotten me," he said once to himself that same day when something reminded him of his promise at parting from her," and will soon be married the good Baier by this time, or I might send for her to wait upon my wife."

SHORT TALKS WITH THE BOYS

My son, I heard you speak of your father ...e other day as "the old man,' and of your ...ther as "her highness."

What's the matter that you can't refer to ...em as your father and mother?

Suppose your parents should speak of you ...s "the kid," or "the fly?" You'd soon be...in to think you had been born into the ...rong family. The son who is ashamed of ...is parents ought to be ashamed of himself.

Suppose their ways are old fashioned, and ...heir grammar a little off, and they don't ...ll like keeping up with the fashions of ...he day. Not one father or mother in ten ...ld the advantages you enjoy. Forty or ...fty years ago they walked three or four ...les to a country school to pick up a little ...arning, while now you are talking of going ...o college. They began poor and have toiled ...and labored and saved for their children. ...ou just remember that things have greatly ...changed in this country. Years ago a ...ilico dress was seen at church far oftener ...han a silk. Men went to meeting clad in ...omespun. The rule in most houses was for ...the children to stand up to eat. The big...est pieces of pie went to father and mother, ...and children were not allowed to sit up ...until ten o'clock at night, or to argue a ...question after the head of the family had ...decided it.

My boy, don't get any foolish notions into ...your head. If your father is old and gray ...and bent—if your mother is trembling and ...sick and has no cares for the frivolities of ...to-day, it is toil which has brought these, ...years of hard work and nights full of anxiety ...lest their children might be spared the ...heartbreaking life. Where they wore blue ...jeans you have broadcloth. Where they ate ...gingercake you have sweet cake and pie. ...Where their mode of life and forced economy ...prevented them from enjoying society, ...entertainments or books, just think how you ...scatter the shillings fly, and what is offered ...for interest and amuse you!

Now let's have a word to say about economy. ...I've been right among you, and I know ...when you want this, that and the other, and ...you don't get it bad." Up to the time of the war ...not one of the boys of that day had a dime to ...spend for Fourth of July, he thought himself well fixed. The boys want about five ...dollars apiece nowadays, and that's all gone ...very soon.

When we got a new book it was considered a ...great piece of extravagance. The lad who ...had cash enough to walk into a panoramic ...exhibition, buy a pair of skates, or treat ...himself to sweet meats was looked upon by ...the rest of us as a Jay Gould.

I'm not saying that you shouldn't have ...money and use it, but right there is a vital ...point. Be sure that you really need what ...you buy. Ask yourself if it will pay? Money ...is the wheels on which the world moves. ...Acquire the habit of throwing it after every ...thing brought out and you'll by and by ...have a second-hand museum and no cash to ...boot.

I dislike a stingy boy, but when I see a ...boy clinking his nickels down at the desk of ...savings bank I know that he is one of the ...young men who is going to build our railroads and do our wholesale business. There ...is a big difference between being stingy and ...being economical. The richest men of America are liberal in giving to churches, asylums and to the unfortunate, but they never ...waste. They don't indulge in this or that ...simply because they have money to pay for ...it.

Now, if you are about 15 years old you've ...got a sneaking idea into your head that it's ...becoming to use an oath occasionally. You've made a greater mistake! It is true ...that men use more or less oaths, but I ...don't like to have you find me one who ...is ashamed of it! It's a mean habit, for a ...start. I know you can point to the ...best men in the land and prove that ...they put out oaths, but that's no reason why ...you should follow suit. There isn't a swearer in this country who doesn't feel a ...little satisfaction in sitting down to ...converse with a man whose language is clean ...and pure. There's nothing manly in using ...profanity. Swearing is about the first ...thing you hear from the lips of a fool or ...a coward. Even a heathen can swear.

Now don't get the idea that I want you ...to be good. The too good boy is a nuisance. He was born to be an angel, but ...forgot to splice on the wings. Go to ...circus? Certainly! I know there are ...men in this world who look upon a circus ...as the next thing to a visit from old Satan ...himself, but they ought to have lived forty ...years ago. If you were my boy I'd walk ...in to show you every animal and curiosity ...then we'd take a reserved seat and see ...the circus. When a man has trained a horse ...or dog to obey him with almost human ...intelligence he has proved to you the ...practical value of patience and perseverance. ...A parade of men will stop on the street ...to see a man lift, or to watch a jumping-...match. Then why deprive you of the sight ...of the performance of an athlete, who has ...taken years to bring his strength and agility ...to perfection?

Should I take you to the theatre? To a ...good play—yes: to a Buffalo Bill barn-...storming burlesque—no. Five plays out of ...six are healthy in sentiment, and point a ...moral so plainly that even a child can catch ...it.

I want my boy to rub against every day ...life a little while he is a boy. If he ...gets the idea that a hunter's life is full of ...buffalo steaks and victories over grizzlies, ...I'm going to send him into the woods ...a week to live on woodchuck meat, carry ...a rock in his head and be jumped out of his ...boots the first time an owl hoots. If he asks ...for money I'm going to give it to him, but I ...want to sit down of a Saturday night and ...know how he spent it, and show up some of ...his foolish bargains. If he wants to sail the ...rolling billow I know of a lake captain ...who will take him on a trip from Detroit to ...Chicago, and if he can't cure him in just one ...trip nobody else need try.

Sit down and talk to your boy as you ...would to your brother. Don't bulldose because you happen to be his father and have ...a right to charge on him Argue and reason. Don't ...expect to make assertions and have him ...follow them as gospel truths unless you ...show the backing. Teach him what to avoid ...and what to cultivate and turn him loose for ...a while. If he seeks the good he has the ...right instincts; if he runs after the bad, don't ...whip him into the woodshed for a pounding ...but you have asked yourself if he doesn't ...get it naturally by that failing.

It is not enough in this world to "mean ...well." We ought to do well. Thoughtfulness ...for others, becomes a duty, and gratitude ...one of the graces.

A Fox-Hunting Feat.

One of Leech's old fox-hunting sketches in Punch used to represent a Frenchman in a wonderful riding-dress galloping wildly after the fox at a meet before the hounds had thrown off. "Do you think you can catch a fox?" scornfully asks "the whip." I do not know," replies "mounseer," bowing politely as he rises in his stirrups, "I will trai, I will trai."

Nothing amuses Johnny over the water as much as Johnny Crapaud's attempts at sport and the sketch was keenly appreciated by fox-hunting Englishmen. But it seems that the feat so sarcastically referred to by the whip has been successfully performed, and by two French officers of the "heavies" at that.

The sporting editor of Figaro relates that two officers of the 6th cuirassiers, in camp at Chalons, Lieuts. de Beaurepaire and Coffiniere de Nardeck, were riding for amusement, not long ago, down the old Roman Road near the camp, when they started a fox. Both were accomplished horsemen and ardent sportsmen. They chased reynard across the vast plain of Sept-Saux (where MacMahon should have given battle to the Prussians) and into a pine wool opposite the village of Thuisy, where they lost sight of him. However, he soon appeared, and after an exciting chase of fourteen miles they ran the little red rascal to earth near the home of Champagne, Sillery, and brought him back to camp in triumph. To capture a fox after a fourteen-mile run without dogs is certainly an extraordinary feat.

An old English gentleman, whose wife read him the story in Galignani's Messenger, simply remarked: "Pooh! pooh! my dear. It was only a French fox."

An English paper says "Lawrence Barrett is not handsome," and an American contemporary replies that, at any rate, "his legs are mates," which cannot be said of Henry Irving.

The World's Great Bells.

Russia is in the lead in the line of bells, some of her manufacture being the most famous of the world. It is said that in Moscow alone, before the great fire, there were no fewer than 1,706 large bells. One called the Giant which was cast in the sixteenth century and broken by falling from its support, and recast in 1064 was so large that it required twenty-four men to ring it; its weight was estimated at 288,000 pounds. It was suspended from an immense beam at the foot of a bell-tower, but it again fell during the fire of June 19. 1706, and was a second time broken to fragments, which were used with additional materials in 1732 in casting the King of Bells, still to be seen in Moscow. Some falling timbers in the fire of 1737 broke a piece from its side, which has never been replaced. This bell is estimated to weigh 443,732 pounds; it is nineteen feet three inches high, and measures around the margin sixty feet nine inches. Its value in metal alone is estimated to amount to upward of $300,000. St. Ivan's, also in Moscow, is forty feet nine inches in circumference, sixteen and one-half inches thick, and weighs 127,830 pounds. The bells of China rank next to those of Russia in size. In Pekin there are seven bells, each of which, according to Father Le Compt, weighs 120,000 pounds. The weight of the leading great bells of the world may be seen in the following:

King of Bells (Moscow)	445,732
St. Ivan's (Moscow)	127,830
Pekin	120 000
Vienna	40 200
Olmutz (Bohemia)	40 000
Rouen (France)	40,000
St Paul's	38,470
"Big Ben" (Westminster)	30,350
Montreal	23,560
St. Peter's (Rome)	18,600

Why the Duke of Albany Had a Military Funeral.

An extraordinary story is told in English court circles, and has been retailed by the Spiritualists, as to the reason which induced the Queen at the last moment to alter the arrangements for Prince Leopold's funeral. It is said that a short time before his death, dancing with an intimate friend, a lady of Danish birth, of great personal beauty, and the wife of an English peer, he was rallied by her upon his unwonted abstraction. His answer was that his sister Alice had come to him in the night, warned him of an approaching calamity, and told him not to trouble, for all would soon be well. The royal Duke, like his mother, the Queen, seems to have accepted supernatural visitations as real, and he told the lady he would prefer, if anything happened him, to have a military funeral. Her ladyship, the recipient of these confidences, wrote a letter to a high court official, telling him the story, and he laid her communication before her Majesty. At once the Queen ordered her dead son's desires, expressed in life, to be fulfilled. Hence that change at the last moment which led to so much perplexity and inconvenience.

A Tree With Hands.

Lieut. Houghton, who has recently visited New Guinea and several other groups of islands in the Pacific, reports the existence of a prehensile tree. It appears to be a species of ficus, allied to the well-known banyan tree, which throws out from its branches air roots, that eventually reach the ground and take root there, and in their turn become new stems which perform the same function; so that a single tree will eventually extend so far as to form a complete forest, in which the stems are united by the branches to each other. The prehensile tree in question, similarly throws out from its branches long, flexible tendrils, which, touching the ground, do not take root there, but twine around any article that may lie within their reach. After a time these quasi branches contract, so that they fail to reach the ground; but the finger-like processes continue to closely grip the article round which they have twined themselves, and which are consequently suspended in mid-air. In this way articles of considerable weight may be picked up from the ground and held in suspension.

Facts About Spools.

Spools are made in immense numbers. One factory turns out 100,000 gross a day, and consumes 25,000 cords of birch wood annually. The wood is first sawed into sticks four or five feet long, and from seven-eighths of an inch to three inches square, according to the size of the spool to be produced. These sticks, after being thoroughly seasoned, are sawed into short blocks, and the blocks are dried in a hot air kiln. At the time they are sawed a hole is bored through them. The spool machine is managed by a boy, who throws out the knotty or defective pieces. The spools polish themselves by their motion and contact in revolving drums. Some of the spools are dyed yellow, red, or black; others are ready for use when they leave the drums.

The number of yards of cotton on a spool is determined by the size of the spool. The cotton is never measured, but the spool is guaged to contain 100, 200, or 500 yards, as the case may be. Silk and linen firms always send to their spool makers patterns giving the size and shape of the head and bevel, which determines the amount of silk or thread that the spool will hold.

Italian Epigrams.

The world is hard enough, God knows, without one shutting one's mouth the day it rains comfits.

To a woman's eyes there is always an atmosphere of youth about a man who has once made love to her.

The chestnut is for the man who takes its shell off.

If bad temper was a fever there wouldn't be hospitals enough to hold us all.

Another man's admiration is a background against which many an ordinary woman has shone, clad in unaccustomed graces to her lover's eyes.

It is a poor sort of business to waste your breath whistling for yesterday's breeze.

He is one of those men in whom necessity is the mother of virtue.

It is only a fool who would expect the wind to be always blowing from the same point of the compass. And a real sorrow—an old sorrow—I've known it to act like a ballast. It's heavy, aye, but it trims the boat. There's many a man wouldn't sail so straight if there wasn't some dead weight o' that sort at his heart to steady him.

Obeying Orders.

Frederick the Great, whose brilliant victories elevated Prussia from an inferior to a superior position among European nations, was noted for the strictness of his military discipline. His soldiers were disciplined so to obey orders that they had no will of their own.

The discipline which the great Frederick stamped upon the Prussian army remains to-day, in all the clearness of the original impression. Not long ago, a little event took place at Powdowsk, a military station near Berlin, which shows what is the German soldier's idea of obeying orders.

The officer in command one morning posted a veteran in front of his own residence, with orders to pace up and down a certain distance, and on no account to lower his gun from the "carry." The officer, a pompous, self-important man, was expecting visitors that day, and he wished to impress them with his military style. Calling the soldier before him, he gave his orders,

"You are to pass the distance assigned, with your gun at the 'carry.' Do you understand?"

"Yes, commander."

"On no account are you to deviate from your walk, or remove your weapon from its position. You understand?"

"Yes, commander."

"You will observe strict silence, On no account are you to speak with anyone on your beat, you understand?"

"Yes, commander."

"Very well; go, and obey!"

An hour after, the officer's guests were ushered into his presence. They entered, each with a broad grin on his countenance.

"My friend," asked one of them of the host. "what is this procession in front of your house?"

"Procession! Procession! There is no procession!" blurted out the host, growing red in the face.

"But look for yourself."

The commander rushed to the window. There was the soldier, as stiff and erect as his own weapon, with eyes stolidly staring right ahead, marching solemnly up and down his beat, followed by a motley crew of street arabs armed with old brooms, sticks, pitchforks and other improvised weapons. Seeing that the soldier was, apparently, oblivious to all around him one bold scamp had affixed to the sentinel's coat-tail a string, at whose end dangled a rusty tin can. And this unique procession had been going on for half an hour, to the intense delight of the populace in the street and the edification of the guests when they arrived.

Out rushed the irate officer. The mob, seeing him, dispersed, and he began to vent his anger on the sentinel.

"Idiot! Blockhead! Senseless! Why did you not strike them down, disperse them?"

"The commander forgets. I had orders not to remove my gun from position."

"True. I am a fool! But you might have ordered them off."

"The commander, pardon me, forgets again. I had orders not to speak."

"It is true. But"——

"There is no but. You ordered. I obeyed. What more can be said?"

Indeed, nothing could be said. The officer swallowed his wrath as best he could. It would be altogether unmilitary to punish a soldier for obeying orders.

EQUINE SAGACITY.

A Horse to be Put in Evidence in a Murder Case.

It is a well-known fact that a horse which has once been driven over a strange road will recognize that road the next time he is driven over it. Such testimony has been admitted as evidence in the highest French courts. Proceeding upon this theory, which was suggested to the coroner in the Wissahickon murder case by Dr. Huidekoper, the Professor of Vetinary Surgery at the University of Pennsylvania, and an expert in all matters pertaining to the horse, the coroner, Detective Houser, and Dr. Huidekoper on Wednesday went to Dieterle's stable and harnessed his horse to the butcher waggon. The party drove up Susquehanna avenue and turned into Germantown road, proceeding along the street railway to Wissahickon. The reins lay loosely upon the animal's back, no whip was used, nor was he at any time given the word to stop or go, either to the right or left. He was simply allowed to pick his way at a fast walk. Dr. Huidekoper explained to the two members of the party that the horse would testify by its manner and action whether it had been over the road before. When the horse saw the Wissahickon drive he threw up his head and whinnied. Then he struck up a brisker pace, appearing to recognize certain objects along the road. At the covered bridge, some distance this side of the ruins of Megoregee's paper mill, the horse again threw up his head and whinnied, looked at the bridge and hesitated a moment. He looked first at the bridge and then up the drive, whinnied again, and of his own accord started up the drive. Several times when, at a bend in the road, the creek would be brought into dim view through a clear space in the underbrush, he threw up his head and whinnied. During the entire drive along the creek it was very dark, and the rain was falling.

After passing Indian Rock Hotel the horse paid special attention to the road, several times throwing up his head, and whinnied. When he reached the old covered bridge over Hauwell's dam, where the body supposed to be Stahl was found, he deliberately drew up, looked at the bridge, then up the creek and whinnied. He stopped fully half a minute apparently undecided whether to go across the bridge or up the drive. Then with a loud whinney, brushing his ears and looking first one side of the road and then the other, he kept to the road. He threw up his head and neighed once more before reaching the bridge at Thorp's dam. Before this the horse had passed several bridges without offering to go over them. When he reached the cross road which crosses Thorp's bridge, he turned off on his own accord with the reins loosely upon his back, walked slowly upon the bridge and when in the middle of it, in full view of the creek, he stopped short, threw up his head and whinnied. Dr. Huidekoper picked up the reins and turned the waggon round. He drove the animal several hundred feet further up the creek to see if he still knew the road. The horse did not whinney once more above the bridge, and appeared to be ignorant of his whereabouts. Dr. Huidekoper said he was evidently moving unwillingly, and had ceased to recognize the road. He was again turned, and the reins let fall upon his back. Instead of passing Thorp's bridge and going back along the road over which he came, the horse again walked upon the bridge and for the second time stopped in the middle of it and whinnied. In speaking of the trip afterward Dr. Huidekoper said it was plain that the horse had been driven before along the road and that he had crossed Thorp's bridge, which is the bridge from which the body of the murdered man is believed by the detectives to have been thrown into the creek. Dr. Huidekoper took a description of the horse, and should the testimony be admitted as evidence the horse will be admitted.

CURIOUS FACTS.

The latest use of paper is the making of spokes for wheels.

A novel feature in the dining-room of a hotel at Niagara Falls is a colossial mirror, in which the falls are reflected in such a manner that the guests may admire while they eat.

Mrs. Genevieve Hummel, of Jeffriesburg, Missouri, aged 80, cut a wisdom tooth last week. She also cut one a year ago. They come a little late with some people, but they never come amiss.

Art is making great strides in New York. It has reached a point now where a genuine oil painting three feet by two and a half can be painted in twenty minutes. The pictures are made almost exclusively for the American market.

There is a birch tree in York, Me., only about forty feet high, two roots of which have been able to lift, some twelve inches, a block of granite computed to weigh twenty tons. The tree is still growing, and the rock continues to be raised and pushed sideways at the rate of nearly an inch a year.

A clergyman of Clinton, Ill., announced that on the following Sunday he would preach from the longest verse in the Bible, and should not announce his text, but would give a silver dollar to all members of the Sunday school who would find out for themselves what verse it was. On Sunday he received thirty eight correct answers, and awarded the prizes as promised.

The Midnight Sun.

In the far north-west there were streaks of cloud, grey, rose, pink, orange and purple, beneath which the sun suddenly dipped into the sea and went out of sight; but the glory of sunset continued all night. The darkness of the darkest hour was never greater than that of a summer evening in England. On deck we could read all night, even the smallest type. The sea was smooth and clear as a mirror. All night long the seagulls and other birds, of which by the way there are marvellously few in Norway, were flying across our bows, and the minutest objects on shore could be distinctly seen. The effect was intensified by the appearance of the moon, which was at full; and just as the sun set in a warm glow in the north-west, the moon became prominent in the south-east, clear and cold and silvery. As going to bed on such a night was out of the question, we remained on deck till sunrise, which came about two o'clock. As that hour approached the glow in the north-north-east became more intense. Suddenly the orb appeared in a niche formed by the intersection of two islands, and the hilltops with young light. Presently, as the vapours on the rocky islet became condensed, a weird halo was formed around the sun's disc, so that it seemed like the eye of an eagle looking out on the desert of waters. Deep and dark were the shadows cast by fishing-boat and rock. The shimmer on the rippling water was like that of the moonlight. By and by, as the sun got clear of the horizon, rosy hues stole over the sky, and Nature rejoiced in the glories of a new day.—W. S. Dalgleish.

How Long it Would Take.

The project for filling the Desert of Sahara with water is creating a great deal of discussion among foreign, especially French, journals. Naturally the question has arisen, how long it would take to fill the whole basin of Sahara, and some startling figures are given in connection therewith. Five thousand years, it is claimed, would be required to fill up that vast sea of sand were the water to flow through a passage 100 feet wide and 25 feet deep, with the velocity of four miles an hour. Under the same conditions it would take 4 000 years for the waters of the Mediterranean to fill the valley of the Jordan. With a channel 100 times greater capacity it would do the work in forty years. At the same rate it would take 400,000 years to fill the Caspian Sea to the level of the Mediterranean. Fortunately, it is only a portion of Sahara which can be made into a lake or inland sea, and doubtless they are middle aged men to-day who will live to see this feat accomplished.

The Technicality and the Court.

A weary-looking, over worked Technicality strolled into a court room to while away an afternoon.

A prisoner took the witness-stand.

Prosecuting Attorney—"Now, sir, tell the jury, did you or did you not kill that inoffensive man?"

Witness—"I did."

Attorney—"Let's understand each other clearly. Did you commit this most foul murder, coolly and deliberately"

Witness—"I did."

Attorney—"Your Honor, we rest our case."

"Mr. Sheriff, bring a rope," said the judge.

"No, you don't," cried the Technicality; and, springing to its feet, it snatched the prisoner in its strong arms and bore him off to freedom amid the triumphant shouts of the lawyers for the defense.

"Saved! Saved!"—Chicago News.

Artemus Ward's Best.

Artemus Ward was once travelling on a railway where, in consequence of the bad state of the road the trains ran very slow. When the pompous Conductor came round and punched the tickets Artemus meekly said:—"Does this railroad company allow passengers to give it advice, if they do so in a respectful manner?" The conductor replied in gruff tones that he guessed so. "Well," Artemus went on, "it occurred to me it would be well to detach the cow-catcher from the front of the engine and hitch it to the rear of the train. For you see we are not liable to overtake a cow, but what's to prevent a cow strolling into this car and biting a passenger?"

MARKDALE MAY 29, 1884.

THE QUEEN'S BIRTHDAY IN MARKDALE.

The morning of the 24th opened exceedingly gloomy and continued very discouraging until the afternoon with showers about 12 o'clock, so that the committee of management almost decided, at half-past twelve, to adjourn the sports; however the people commenced to crowd around the gate for admission to the grounds, while quite a number could be seen climbing over the high board fence. The weather also began to improve, and it was thought advisable to go on with the sports, so the gate was opened, and before many hours had elapsed, over one thousand spectators were on the grounds. The program was at once entered on and mostly gone through with, to the entire satisfaction of all concerned. Everything passed off quietly and orderly, and all left well pleased with their day's outing.

The judges were Messrs. John McDonald, Chatsworth; Dr. Sproule, Markdale, and F. Burton, Holland. Their names were sufficient to guarantee fair play. Following is the list of prizes awarded:

PRIZE LIST.

HORSE RACES.

Trot—1st, W. H. Campaigne; 2nd, R. T. McGirr.

Running race—1st, E. Large; 2nd, J. H. Carson; 3rd, Ed. Davis.

SPORTS.

100 yard race—1st, James Sproule; 2nd, M. Herriman; 3rd, R. Hannah.

Boys under 15 years—1st, R. Benson; 2nd, M. Fleming.

Boys under 10 years—1st, G. A. Wilson; 2nd, M. Fleming.

Wheelbarrow race—1st, Dan Shea; 2nd, J. Richards; 3rd, J. W. Sproule.

Three legged race—1st, Sproule & Herriman; 2nd, Richards & Gawley.

Running, hop, step and jump—1st, J. Campbell; 2nd, Robt. Sproule.

Boys under 15—1st. W. Arrowsmith; 2nd, G. A. Wilson.

Putting 21 lb. shot—1st, J. Campbell; 2nd, M. Beaton.

Putting 14 lb. shot—1st, J. Campbell; 2nd, M. Beaton.

One quarter mile race—1st, M. Herriman; 2nd, R. Benson; 3rd, J. W. Benson.

The Gymnasium Club gave a bar performance which was a credit to themselves, and highly appreciated by the spectators.

LADIES DEPARTMENT.

The Ladies' Bazaar was well patronized, and they disposed readily of their large stock of useful, fancy and other articles.

The concert was well attended in connection with the latter and highly interesting. W. J. McFarland, Esq., took the chair, which position he filled admirably, and a good program was gone through, the following taking part:—Music by the choir; Wesley Whitby, recitation; Misses Lyons and McDowell and Mrs. Trimble, song; Miss Henry, song; Misses McDowell and Christoe, song; John Richards, recitation; Mr. and Miss McDowell, song; Messrs. Bowes, Armstrong and Mason, and Miss Lyons and Mrs. Hill, quartette; C. W. Rutledge, recitation, and Rev. Mr. Casson, reading.

The total proceeds for bazaar and concert amounted to $77.00.

A FELT WANT.

If there is one thing wanted in Markdale more than another at the present time, it is we believe, a town hall. The village is actually without a place fit for a public entertainment. We would like to have the matter discussed by our leading men, and have suggestions as to the best way of supplying this great want. Every citizen should be more or less interested in this matter, and we hope to see a lively interest taken in this important matter.

Shelburne built an $8000 town hall which brings a rental of 12 per cent. per annum on the capital invested.

Chatsworth is about erecting one at a cost of $875, and they only ask assistance from the village by way of tax to the amount of $150. We trust our citizens will give the matter their earnest consideration.

Williamsford.

Holland council met here Wednesday as a court of revision. An extensive day's business was done.

Mr. H. Foster has purchased the west corner lot, upon which he will erect a large store next season.

Mr. C. Price is preparing the foundation for a store, the one now occupied being too small for his increasing business.

Mr. W. H. Walker has a good stock of tinware and stoves and appears to be doing well.

Meaford Road.

From our own correspondent.

Mr. W. Buchanan, Sr., and Mr. J. C. Buchanan are each going to build new houses this summer.

Mrs. W. J. McMullen is confined to her bed with a severe attack of inflammation of the kidneys. Dr. Sproule is attending her.

The farmers here will have plenty of entire horses to chose from this season as there is a number of them passing along the Meafor Road every day.

The spring seeding is wound up for this year.

There is a good show for fruit if the frost keeps away.

Cheese making is booming, there being two milk waggons in this neighborhood, one to the Flesherton and the other to the Markdale factory.

Flesherton.

From our own correspondent.

The Temperance convention, held in the Town Hall here last Thursday, was well attended. A good representation of active Temperance workers throughout the township were present. The meeting was unanimously in favor of submitting the Scott Act in this county.

The 24th of May passed off quietly throughout the day in this village, business places closed, and almost everybody away, either fishing, hunting, pic-nicing, driving until evening, when groups might be seen wending their way to the Town Hall to enjoy the social gathering or basket social held in that place, under the auspices of the Ladies Aid Society of the Presbyterian church here. A most enjoyable evening was spent. Proceeds $20.

The handsome illuminated clock which graces the tower of Mr. M. Richardson's new block, and which was illuminated and set running for the first time on the evening of the 24th is a valuable ornament to the village.

Artemesia Council.

This council met in the town hall, Flesherton, on Monday, May 5th, 1884. Members all present: the Reeve in the chair. Minutes of last meeting read and approved.

Communications as follows, presented and read:—Deputy-Reeve, Glenelg, re bridge on town line; Fred Gee re statute labor; John McAuley re opening Kincardine street, Priceville.

By-laws Nos. 360, appointing local board of health for 1884; 361 amending; 359 appointing municipal officers, were introduced and read the requisite number of times and passed.

Moved by Mr. McArthur, seconded by Mr. Blakley, that the auditors' report as presented and finally audited by committee, be adopted and two hundred copies printed, and that the public health by-law be printed as an appendix to the same.—Carried.

Moved by Mr. McArthur, seconded by Mr. Blakley, that it has been shown to this council that many persons in the township have built fences across roads and streets in their vicinity, contrary to the by-law in that behalf, made and provided (being by-law No. 277), and notwithstanding that the attention of pathmasters has been called to the fact they have failed to give the proper notice to parties offending and arraign them before a justice of the peace. This council now peremptorly demand that every pathmaster must perform his duty in such cases, else be subject to the penalty which may be imposed in the manner provided by said by-law, and that this resolution be printed on the road lists.—Carried.

Moved by Mr. McArthur, seconded by Mr. Blakley, that $600 be appropriated for repairs to roads for 1884, viz., $150 in each ward.—Carried.

Moved by Mr. Pedlar, seconded by Mr. Blakley, that Mr. McArthur act conjointly with the Deputy Reeve of Glenelg in repairing bridge on the town line near Priceville.—Carried.

Moved by Mr. McArthur, seconded by Mr. Blakley, that this council purchase from Moffat Bros, Markdale, 12 scrapers for the use of the township, viz., three for each ward, at $10 each, to be delivered where required.—Carried.

Moved by Mr. Pedlar, seconded by Mr. Blakley, that the Reeve issue his order in favor of S. S. No. 13, for $29.90, balance of Trustees rate for 1883.—Carried.

Moved by Mr. McArthur, seconded by Mr. Elliott, that B. Ghent be refunded $2, being refund for statute labor performed, but returned in 1882.—Carried.

Moved by Mr. Pedlar, seconded by Mr. Blakley, that David Wright be refunded $6.50 for statute labor performed, but returned against his lots in Euphrasia, 1883.—Carried.

The council adjourned to meet as a Court of Revision on the assessment of 1884, on Monday, June 2nd, 1884.

The following were appointed a board of health for 1884:—W. S. Christoe, M. D., W. J. Bellamy, Wm. Brown, C. C. James, J. B. Sloan.

FLUID LIGHTNING.

Fluid Lightning is the only cure for Toothache, Headache, Earache, and Neuralgia. It does not take a day or an hour to cure it, but in less than a minute all pain is gone. Thousands have tested its merits within the last year. Fluid Lightning is also a positive cure for Rheumatism. The worst possible cases have been permanently cured in one week. Price 25 cents at Hill Bro's. A. & M. 3

DEATH OF MRS. SMITH.—The flags displayed at half-mast from the vessels in harbor last Sunday morning proclaimed to our citizens the fact that Mrs. Frances J. Smith, the owner of the Frances Smith, had passed away during the previous night. The deceased lady came to Owen Sound in 1855 with her husband, and during the intervening time has been one of our best known citizens, not only in social, but also in commercial circles, as since the death of her husband she had been the owner and manager of the favorite steamer called after her. A faithful friend amongst her companions, and of a kind disposition which made her very ready with sympathy or more substantial tokens when necessary to those in address, she was a general favorite; and many were the anxious enquiries as to her welfare during her lingering illness, borne with Christian patience. Now that she has passed away, many of our citizens will long cherish a kindly remembrance of her; whilst the bereaved family have the general sympathy in their affliction.—O. S. Times.

WHAT IN A NAME?

Scrofula is so called from the Latin scrofa, a pig, from the supposition that the disease came from eating swine's flesh. It is often inherited from parents, and leades to abscesses, ulcerous sores, debility, king's evil and consumption. The case of the Rev. Wm. Stout, of Wiarton, who suffered 23 years from scrofulous abscesses, is one of the most remarkable on record. Burdock Blood Bitters cured him after the best medical skill had failed.

Mr. Robert Benson, who purchased the business, is now in possession and will doubtless do a lively trade.

The leading merchants of Markdale have agreed unanimously on closing their stores at 7 o'clock sharp every evening, beginning from 1st May to 1st Oct. Farmers and others will kindly take notice of this and try to have their shopping done before seven so that clerks, who have to stand in stores all through the heat of a long Summer day, may have a chance of engaging in some out door exercise and enjoying the fresh air. 190-94

Two young gentlemen, brothers, from Cheltenham, England, arrived last week, having come to this part with the intention of learning to farm. The eldest is a graduate of Dublin University, while the younger has also a good education. They are very respectable and well-to-do. The younger has already secured a place with Mr. B. Wright, and the elder, who is 24 years of age, is desirous of securing one. He is now staying with Mr. Thos. Boland, where another from the same place has been for two years learning to farm with satisfactory results both to his employer and himself.

Mr. John McAlear has secured license for the new hotel in this place, to be known as the City Hotel. The house is now fitted out in good style and has new stables erected in connection therewith, so that the travelling public will find a comfortable lodging place, with every necessary attention paid to their wants. We are opposed to any increase in the number of hotels in Markdale, and also to the great liquor traffic generally, yet when we have both in our midst, we are pleased to have such men as Mr. John McAlear in the business, who will conduct it properly and efficiently.

The Late Mr. Miller.

THE LAST TRIBUTE OF RESPECT PAID TO HIS REMAINS.

(From Friday's Globe.)

Parry Sound, May 20.—On Saturday evening, the 17th inst., the steamer Northern Belle arrived from Collingwood with the remains of Mr. J. C. Miller, ex-M. P. P. for Muskoka and Parry Sound, who died at Colton, Southern California, on the second day of April. Early on Sunday morning the friends of the deceased began to arrive—persons of every creed and shade of politics, and from many miles distant. The Rev. Mr. Casson, of Markdale, (who was there by a special request of the deceased) conducted the ceremonies. He read the ninetieth Psalm, and addressed the large assemblage in a brief and truthful eulogy on the deceased's many treats of goodness, his free and fearless manner of recognizing right, his determined character, his pronounced principles, his appreciation of honesty and worth, and his industrious habit and active life, his persevering enterprise, his indomitable courage, his buoyant and hopeful spirit while battling with ill-healt and the burdens and care of business, his shrewdness and courage, which often changed what seemed to be disaster into a successful venture, his keen judgment of character, his warm and unswerving friendship, when he found a friend worthy of his confidence and esteem. He then spoke of the closing scenes of his busy life, passing away in a quiet and peaceful rest, commending his spirit to God who gave it and in hope of a glorious resurrection through Jesus Christ our Lord and Saviour.

After a short prayer, at ten minutes to three p.m., the coffin was borne to the hearse, and the procession moved off to the cemetery in the following order:—The Parry Sound Brass Band, playing the Dead March. Immediately preceding the hearse where the attending physician and officiating clergyman, Dr. Bridgland, of Bracebridge, and the Rev. Mr. Casson, of Markdale; the hearse; and the pall-bearers, namely:—A. P. Cockburn, M.P., D. F. Macdonald, John T. Harvie, George Paget, Thos. R. Caton, Thomas Myers, J. S. Rogerson, Frank Strain. Next came the chief mourners, including Mr. J. B. Miller, only son of the deceased; Mr. S. B. Purvis and Mr. John Purvis, nephews of the deceased; also Mr. W. H. Pratt. Following the chief mourners came about two hundred of the Parry Sound Lumber Company's employees; immediately after them the Reeves and Corporations of the townships of McDougall, Foley, McKellar and Humphrey; then followed the friends, visitors, and delegates from all parts of the district.

VALLEY OF THE JORDAN.

A Visit to Sulphur Springs Known to the Romans 2,000 Years Ago.

At the spot where the Jordan issues from Lake Tiberias there are two large mounds, a fragment of sea wall, and a causeway on arches which projects into the river, dividing it from the waters of the lake, and suggesting that it may possibly, in ancient times, have formed the approach to a bridge. There is no bridge there now. The river swirls round the arches, which are choked with ruins and reeds, and in a broad swift stream winds its way to the Dead Sea. Here, in old time, stood the Roman city of Tarichæa, built on a site of a Phœnician fortress of still older date. Nothing remains but heaps of rubbish covered with broken pottery, and fragments of sculpture; but it offers probably a rich field for future excavation. The modern name Kerah signifies in Syriac "Fortress," and its natural position was remarkably strong, as the Jordan, after leaving the lake, takes a sharp bend to the westward and flows almost parallel with it, thus leaving an intervening peninsula on which the town was situated. It was defended on the westward by a broad ditch, traces of which still remain, connecting the Jordan with the lake, thus making the peninsula an island approached only by a causeway.

Josephus mentions Tarichæa as having been a important military post in the wars of his time. When I visited it the lake was unusually high, and the Jordan was unfordable, so we were obliged to ferry over, swimming our horses and mules a distance of 70 or 80 yards across the rapid current. Then we mounted and galloped in a southeasterly direction, over a fertile plain, waving at this season of the year with luxuriant crops. I was so much struck with the fertility and agricultural capacity of this region that I made inquiry as to its ownership, and found that it had bee presented by a former Sultan to one of the principal Bedouin sheiks of this Eastern country, and that he was exempt from all taxation. His lands extend to the foothills, where the Yarmuk issues from the mountains of Gilead and Juaian, which we were now approaching. We had ascended these but a little way when a scene burst upon us which surprised and delighted us by

ITS WILD AND UNEXPECTED GRANDEUR.

The Yarmuk here enters the plain of the Jordan on its way to join that river with a volume of water fully equal to the latter, pouring its swollen torrent between two perfectly perpendicular precipices of basalt, which are about two hundred yards apart and look like some majestic gateway expressly designed by nature to afford the river a fitting outlet to the plain after its wild course through the mountains.

On each side of these cliffs the country swells back abruptly to a height of 1 700 feet above the stream. At their base, here and there, the limestone or basalt rock, for the two formations are curiously intermixed, crops out sharply, forming terraces with precipitous sides. The more distant summits are fringed with oak forests. The general effect of the landscape as you first burst upon it after leaving the Jordan valley is in the highest degree impressive. The path, gradually ascending, winds along the edge of cliffs, rising to a sheer height of 300 feet from the torrent which foams beneath. We are so close to their margin on the right that it makes us giddy to look down, while on the left hand, grassy slopes, covered with wild flowers, rise to the base of other cliffs above us. For an hour we wind along these dizzy ledges. In one place I observed a hundred feet of limestone superimposed upon two hundred of basalt, the whole forming a black and white precipice very remarkable to look upon. In fact, my further investigations of this valley of the Yarmuk, some portion of which, I believe, we were the first to explore, have convinced me that it affords finer scenery than is to be found in any other part of Palestine. It is astonishing that it should have remained until now almost entirely unknown. Where the valley opened a little we saw beneath us a small plain, almost encircled by the river, and on it about twenty Bedouin tents. Our unexpected and novel appearance on the cliff above evidently caused some little stir and amazement, but they were too far below us to communicate with, so we pushed on to a point where the path suddenly plunged down by a series of steps between walls of black basalt making a very steep descent for loaded mules, and one not altogether pleasant for mounted men. It had the advantage of bringing us soon to the bottom, however, but not before my eyes were gladdened by the sight of one of the objects for which I had undertaken the trip.

At my feet, and separated from the river by a narrow strip of land covered with bushes, was a long pool of bluish-gray water in marked contrast with the yellow stream. Above it floated a very light mist, or rather haze. Following with the eye a little stream of the same colored water which entered it, past a primitive mill, I saw that it debouched from another pond similar in color, and evidently its source, and to this our path was conducting us. It was the first of the hot sulphur springs of Amatha, celebrated by Eusebius as being much frequented in the time of the Romans, and famous for their healing qualities. We soon reached its margin, and, dismounting, tether our horses under the shade of a large tree, and stretching ourselves for a rest after our ride, preparatory to a slight repast and a more minute investigation of the springs and the ruins by which they are surrounded. Our nostrils were regaled by a strong odor of rotten eggs, which left no doubt in our minds as to the quality of the waters by which we were surrounded. We were here at a depression of 550 feet below the surface of the sea, but the climate, which must be was at this time of year delightful. We were soon sufficiently rested to scramble first down to the pool, only a few yards below us, which was about fifty yards long by thirty broad, and apparently five or six feet deep. The temperature was 98°, and the taste of the water very strongly sulphurous. Then we ascended a mound behind, covered with ruins, consisting principally of fragments of columns, carved stone seats, and drafted blocks which had been used for building purposes. Immediately behind this mound was an extensive ruin, consisting of three arches in a fair state of preservation. Some of the arches were 15 or 26 feet high, and enclosed a semicircular space or hall for bathers. On the other side was a vaulted building which partly enclosed what is at this day the only frequented spring. This is a circular pool. Part of the old masonry which enclosed it still remains. The pool is about 25 feet wide, with a temperature so high that I found it impossible to keep my hand in it. To my great astonishment, and to theirs also when they saw me suddenly appear, four or five Arabs were bathing in it. How their bodies could support the heat was to me a mystery. They did not support it long. They were no sooner in than out, their bodies looked as much like lobsters as the complexion of their skin would permit. They laughed and invited me to join them. One or two were stretched full length on the identical stone slabs under the building on which doubtless 2,000 years ago the bathers of that date used to repose after having been half boiled alive.

This spring must be of immense volume to judge by the size of the torrent which gushed from it, and which was crossed on stepping stones, flowing away in what would be considered a good sized trout stream, to mingle its waters with the Yarmuk after a course of a few hundred yards. We determined when our tents arrived to pitch them near this spring on the brink of another stream which flowed in from the eastward, and which, though slightly sulphurous was drinkable. Indeed, we do not object to taking in a moderate amount of this wholesome medicament into our organisms. We found another strong spring, not quite so hot as the one in use, a little above our tents, so that there is no lack of water. Indeed, I doubt whether sulphur springs of so much volume exist anywhere else in the world. Not far from this, with its back to another mound, were the ruins of an old Roman theatre, some of the rows of seats still clearly discernible.

These springs are situated on a plain about a mile long and a half a mile broad, semicircular in shape, the chord of the arc consisting of a fine basalt precipice, from which it slopes gradually to the river, which forms the bow. It is watered by a good fresh water spring, which rushes from the base of the cliffs. The hot sulphur stream which issues from the pool we first visited turns a mill and then flows into the long oblong pond I first saw from above. Here, after the exertions of the day, I determined to bathe. I never enjoyed a swim more than the one in this soft sulphur water, with a temperature of 96°. The pool was about one hundred yards long and ten wide, and out of my depth nearly throughout its length. The rocks upon which I could sit comfortably up to my neck where the stream entered the pool were covered with a heavy white deposit. The sensation afterward was one of delicious langour; but my full enjoyment of the bath was a little marred by the fact that I had to walk a quarter of a mile back to the tents afterward. I had a long talk on my way to the miller, the solitary resident of this lonely but enchanting spot, and tried to induce him to desert the mill, of which he was the guardian, and act as my guide up the river on the following day, but he was either too conscientious, too lazy, or too ignorant—I suspect the latter, as I found by experience that all the information he gave me of a topographical nature was erroneous. It was, therefore, with a pleasing sense of anticipation that we retired to rest, determined to trust to our own geographical instincts alone for our proposed exploration.

Ringing the Baby.

There is one young couple in Toronto who are ready to open an exchange where they may get rid of some superfluous jewellery they have on hand, or, rather, haven't on hand, because the hand is quite too small for the jewellery. There is a new baby in the family and before it was a week old they received a small box from California, and upon opening it found a tiny gold ring with "Welcome, little stranger," engraved on the inside.

"It's much too large for the baby and not quite large enough to fit me," said the young mother, plaintively; but on the principle that it would keep she put it away, and dictated a letter of thanks to the sender.

The next day the baby's aunt sent it a lovely little ring set in pearls, with "Our pet" marked on the inner circle.

Then its grandmother sent a ring made out of a piece of gold found in dear grandpa's pocket after his death, and it had two sets of initials and a Bible text inscribed on it.

But the next ring was from a school friend, and was a wide band of gold with a quarter dollar bangle hung by a tiny chain, and the sentiment "Of such is the kingdom of Heaven," was condensed into it, quite discernible with a microscope, however.

Then the baby's uncle got home from New York, and when he had kissed the new arrival he took something out of his vest pocket:

"I couldn't see a thing to get the kid except this," he said, as he opened a tiny box. "I knew nobody would think of giving such a little shaver a ring, so I got one. Hello, sis, what's the matter!"

The young mother had fainted. But they restored her in time to see her dear old Aunt Letitia, who had stopped over on her way to the Pacific Coast to see that blessed baby.

"Not a ring on her dear, sweet little hands," said the old lady, severely; "Aunty Lishy didn't forget her tootsey-wootsey." And she slipped a cameo circlet on the small red finger. It had a Greek word engraved on it which means "Hope."

"There's the postman's ring," said the nurse one day as she looked out of the window.

"He's bringing another off-ring to the baby; I know it;" said the pale young mother.

But they carry them to another room now, where they are numbered, sorted out and put away in regular order, shining mementoes of the awful want of originality, which is usually possessed by the friends of a first baby.

Most bells were originally feminine, now the two or three called by Christian names in England are masculine. The most celebrated, Great Tom, at Oxford, was originally named Mary. Tresham, the Vice Chancellor of the period, writes: "Oh, beautiful Mary, how musically she sounds." She has done little to belie this reputation since she became Tom. Once only, in the year 1880, Tom got into disgrace by a series of incontinent strikings which greatly alarmed the undergraduates, who were divided in opinion as to "whether there was an earthquake, the Dean was dead, or the college on fire."

THE WORLD OVER.

Idle Steamships—Cure for Heart Disease—Balaclava—The Tricycle in England—Another Great Tunnel—&c., &c.

In the English northeastern ports 137 ocean steamships are idle.

The Prince Imperial of Austria speaks, it is asserted, every dialect known in the Austrian dominions, except Turkish.

Within two months the House of Lords has had two Roman Catholic accessions—the Earl of Abingdon and Lord North, both converts.

The health record of Cincinnati is reported to have greatly improved since the flood cleansed the unwholesome districts.

It is thought probable that the late Duke of Buccleuch has made a considerable division of his vast estates. One of $50,000 a year he has given to his second son absolutely.

Many months ago the medical press was crowded with articles to show the action of a so-called new remedy in heart disease—extract of lily of the valley. But a bookworm in Rome finds that the remedy was highly esteemed in Germany for the same malady prior to the year 1821.

A correspondent, writing to Naturen, states that the past winter has been remarkable for the differences in climate observed within short distances in Norway. For instance, while at Carlstiania the ice was from ten inches to twelve inches thick last January, at Stovanger the thermometer fell to freezing point only once during the whole month.

The Rev. Dr. Wright, a distinguished A. M. of Trinity College, Dublin, has created some sensation by an article in which he says that many of the fellows of that university do not believe in divine revelation or the existence of a personal God. Several are, at the best, agnostics, if not atheists. There is no way for disciplining either a fellow or professor for erroneous views, and so it is a propaganda of skepticism.

There is a controversy as to whether an eagle will sit on a limb and let himself become encased in ice. Edward P. Roe related an instance of that kind, and his accuracy was questioned. John Holder now tells how, at Bloomington, Ill., he had an eagle brought to him covered by ice so completely that it could not move legs or wings, fell from the tree on which it had perched, and was captured by a boy.

Balaclava, although its name will be ever famous in history as associated with the famous light cavalry charge, has hitherto remained an unimportant town. It is, however, now beginning to develop resources, and bids fair to become a fashionable resort for invalids. A medical commission visiting it last summer has reported very favorably on its sheltered position and climate.

The sale of the Hamilton library realized £12 907, which added to the Beckford total, makes £86 458 ($432,270) for the Hamilton Palace libraries. The disposal of these libraries occupied forty-eight days, extended over nearly two years. It is understood that the German Government paid £100,000 for the Hamilton MSS., which were sold by private contract.

A young and well-known English nobleman is the owner of thirty-five cabs and seventy horses in London. The hansoms may be recognised by their smart appearance and the letters S. T. under the driver's box. There was a great probability the other day of his lordship appearing as a defendant, owing to one of his cabs having come into collision with a private owner's vehicle, but the spectacle of the noble lord in a London county court has been obviated by a compromise.

From a French state paper, lately brought to light, it appears that in 1770 the following Parliamentary decree was solemnly passed and duly registered under King Louis XV.: "Whosoever, by means of red or white paint, perfumes, essences, artificial teeth, false hair, cotton, wool, iron corsets, hoops, shoes with high heels, or false hips, shall seek to entice into the bands of marriage any male subject of his Majesty, shall be prosecuted for witchcraft, and declared incapable of matrimony."

Ladies' handkerchiefs this season in Paris match the gown, so that if your gown is made of a material with a design of rosebuds, or trimmed with rosebud embroidery, you should have a handkerchief with a rosebud border. If your gown is brown tweed your handkerchief should have a brown border, and if your dress is made of striped material your handkerchief should have a border striped to match. The latest novelties in men's handkerchiefs have a border of little red or black devils in grotesque attitudes.

In England 50 miles have been covered in 3 hours 27 minutes on a tricycle, and the 100 miles between Bath and London have been ridden in 8 hours 18 minutes on a bicycle. A mile has been ridden in 2 minutes 31 2-5 seconds; 10 miles in 29 minutes 30 2-5 seconds; 20 miles in 59 minutes 58 3-5 seconds, and 100 miles in 5 hours 50 minutes 5 3 5 seconds. The other day, a very windy one, a veteran of 77 rode 53 miles in 5 hours, and a man and his wife rode 117 miles in 12 hours to show what they could do.

The new kind of gunpowder lately introduced by M. Himly is superior to all others now in use, in the ease and rapidity of its production and the entire absence of danger in the processes of manufacture. Its freedom from any hygroscopic qualities is also evident from the fact that 100 grams of the article, exposed to damp weather for some four days in an open window, showed no gain of weight, with a delicate balance. It is two and one-half times more powerful than common powder, and there is but a very slight residue. Another advantage is the slight amount of smoke given off, and this, as contrasted with that from nitro-explosives, is totally innocuous.

The preliminary surveys for the great Simpion Tunnel have now been definitely accomplished by a Commission of experts, the result being a report adverse to any operations being undertaked on the route suggested, in view of the extreme heat likely to be encountered in the interior of the vast mountain—the normal temperature of the same being estimated at nearly ninety-eight degrees—during the process of construction. In other respects, however, it is admitted that the geological conditions are quite as favorable as those of St. Gothard. They propose, under these circumstances, a line slightly different from that originally contemplated, and which, though somewhat longer than the first, would reduce the temperature to about eighty-six degrees, and would afford better opportunities also for the required ventilation.

Darwin writes that he created immense excitement once in a monkey cage in the London Zoo by bringing a stuffed snake there. Three species of cercopithecus were the most alarmed. They darted about their cages and uttered sharp cries of danger, which were understood by the other monkeys. He then placed it in the ground in one of the larger compartments. After a time all the monkeys collected round it in a large circle, and, staring intently, presented a most ludicrous appearance. They became extremely nervous, so that when a wooden ball with which they were familiar as a plaything was accidentally moved in the straw under which it was hidden they all instantly leaped away.

Several of the French newspapers publish extracts from a paper by M. A. Milne Edwards, the eminent naturalist, on the gorilla in the Jardin des Plantes. He has made a lengthened study of this ape, and the description he gave of him was very much the reverse of favorable. The chimpanzee and orange-outang were, he declared, in comparison with the gorilla, models of sweetness and amiability. He never gave his keeper the least mark of affection; he never permitted himself to be touched without manifesting the utmost repugnance to the familiarity, and, in general, a bite was the return he made for a caress. He would not play with the other apes nor tolerate them in his neighbourhood. M. Milne Edwards concided by ranking the gorilla in point of intelligence, a long way below any of the other anthropoid apes. The gorilla has recently died—killed, one wag says, by M. Milne Edward's article.

The national monument at Washington, when finished, will be the loftiest structure in the world, by about thirty feet. The towers of the cathedral at Cologne, just finished, have a height of 524 feet and 11 inches; tower of St. Nicholas, Hamburg, 473 feet 1 inch; cupola of St. Peter's, Rome, 469 feet 2 inches; cathedral spire at Strasburg, 465 feet 11 inches; pyramid of Cheops, 449 feet 5 inches; tower of St. Stephen's, Vienna, 443 feet 19 inches; cathedral spire at Freiburg, 410 feet 1 inch; cathedral of Antwerp, 404 feet 10 inches; cathedral of Florence, 390 feet 5 inches; St. Paul's, London, 465 feet 1 inch; cathedral tower at Magdeburg, 339 feet 11 inches; tower of the new votive church at Vienna, 314 feet 11 inches; tower of the Rathhaus at Berlin, 288 feet 8 inches; towers of Notre Dame, Paris. 232 feet 11 inches. Of American structures, the Washington monument, Baltimore, is 210 feet; Bunker Hill monument, 225 feet; Trinity Church, New York, 284 feet; St. Patric's Cathedral, New York, to be 360 feet.

Suggestions to Independent Voters.

In an article on "The Use and Abuse of Parties," in the June Century, the Rev. Dr. Washington Gladden in conclusion says of parties: "What, then, is the duty of intelligent and patriotic men respecting them? To this question various answers are given.

"1. Keep out of political life. It is hopelessly corrupt. You can do nothing to purify it. Let it alone.

"This is the argument of despair, lightly urged by many frivulous and faithless souls, but not to be entertained by any patriot.

"2. Vote always, but belong to no party. Join the unorganized mob of Independents; take your place on what Mr. Charles Francis Adams, Jr., calls 'the centre of the tilting-board,' and put your votes in every election where they will do the most good—voting always for the best men, or, at any rate, against the worst rascals.

"This is a comfortable way of doing political duty; the practical difficulty is in determining which rascal is the worst. Both are sometimes so bad that it is hard to choose.

"2 Maintain a loose relation to one party or the other, but take no part in the primary meetings, and bolt when they offer you bad candidates or bad measures. The theory is that in this semi-attached condition you will influence somewhat the nominations; that the party managers will be thinking of you when they make up the ticket.

"This, too, is apt to leave the voter simply a choice of two evils. The gentlemen left by you in charge of the primary meetings are not sure to think of you, and if they do, they console themselves with the reflection that the other fellows will probably nominate a worse man than theirs.

"4. Join one party or the other. Go into the caucuses, if you can get in. Take your pluck and your independence along with you. Tell the gentlemen in charge that you are interested in the success of the party, and that you want to help keep it in a shape in which it will deserve to succeed. Give them distinctly to understand that while you ask nothing for yourself, you intend to take a hand in shaping the party policy and in making the nominations; and that you will be guided in all this by a supreme regard for national interests rather than personal interests. If, in spite of your protests, they make bad nominations, bolt the nominations, and return to the charge the next time, taking with you as many as you can of your well-intentioned neighbors. If you preserve your temper, and use reason, and keep standing up for men and things that are honest and of good report, peradventure they will listen to you at length, and you may succeed in lifting up the standards and in purifying party management.

"This last method appears to me by far the wisest one."

The Chinese Farmhouse.

The Chinese farmhouse is a curious-looking abode. Usually it is sheltered with groves of leathery bamboo and thick-spreading banyans. The walls are of clay or wood and the interior of the house consists of one main room extending from the floor to the tiled roof, with closet looking apartments in the corners for sleeping rooms. There is a sliding window on the roof, made of cut oyster shells arranged in rows, while the side windows are mere wooden shutters. The floor is the bare earth where at nighttall there often gathers together a miscellaneous family of dirty children, fowls, ducks, pigeons and a litter of pigs, all living together in happy harmony. In some districts infested by marauding bands, houses are strongly fortified with high walls, containing apertures for firearms and protected by a moat crossed by a rude drawbridge. With grain, swine and a well under his roof, the farmer and his men might hold out against a year's siege.

The coral insect is a great reef-former.

The Care of Sheep.

ct in sheep husbandry means the most ous and judicious feeding and care, ed out in every part of the system. this is done, so far from sheep being fitable upon our higher priced lands, doubtful if any other animal pays so In England, it has been said that, on worth $300 to $500 per acre, fertility more profitably kept up with sheep any other stock. Dairy stock, for ow, carry off much more in the milk alone than sheep in all ways, besides taking as much to build the bones and grow their bodies. The waste of phosphates is much more rapid in dairying than sheep husbandry. If, then, sheep may be fed to profit in England on land worth $400 per acre, we should not be deterred from sheep feeding on lands worth $50 to $150 per acre. England is considered peculiarly a beef-eating country; but yet the best mutton brings a higher price than beef. Our large cities and manufacturing towns are constantly increasing their demands for good mutton, and this demand is likely to increase as fast as the production. If we should feed as large a number of sheep per hundred acres in the Middle and Eastern States as does Great Britain, the desire for emigration from these States to more fertile lands of the West would soon cease.

How the Old Printer Passed Away.

And so, year after year, he wrought among the boys on a morning paper. He went to bed about the time the rest of the world got up, and he arose about the time the rest of the world sat down to dinner. He worked by every kind of light except sunlight. There were candles in the office when he came in; then they had lard oil lamps that smoked and spluttered and smelled; then he saw two or three printers blinded by explosions of camphene and spirit gas, then kerosene came in and heated up the newsroom on summer nights like a furnace; then the office put in gas, and now the electric light swung from the ceiling and dazzled his old eyes, and glared into them from his copy. If he sang on his way home a policeman bade him "cheese that," and reminded him that he was disturbing the peace and people wanted to sleep. But when he wanted to sleep the rest of the world, for whom he had sat up all night to make a morning paper, roared and crashed by down the noisy streets under his window, with cart and truck and omnibus; blared with brass bands, howled with hand-organs, talked and shouted; and even the shrieking newsboys, with a ghastly sarcasm, murdered the sleep of the tired old printer by yelling the name of his own paper.

Year after year the foreman roared at him to remember that this wasn't an afternoon paper; editors shrieked down the tube to have a blind man put on that dead man's case; smart young proof-readers scribbled sarcastic comments on his work on the margin of his proof slips they didn't know how to read; long-winded correspondents learning to write, and long-haired poets who could never learn to spell, wrathfully cast all their imperfections upon his head. But through it all he wrought patiently, and found more sunshine than shadow in the world; he had more friends than enemies. Printers and foremen and pressmen and reporters came and went, but he stayed, and he saw newsroom and sanctum filled and emptied and filled and emptied again and filled again with new strange faces. He believed in his craft, and to the end he had a silent pity, that came as near being contempt as his good, forgiving old heart could feel, for an editor who had not worked his way from a regular devilship up past the cases and the imposing stone.

He worked all that night, and when the hours that are so short in the bail-room and so long in the composing-room drew wearily on, he was tired. He hadn't thrown in a very full case, he said, and he had to climb clear into the boxes and chase a type into a corner before he could get hold of it. One of the boys, tired as himself—but a printer is never too tired to be good-natured—offered to change places with him, but the old man said there was enough in the case to last him through this take, and he wouldn't work any more to-night. The type clicked in the silent room, and by and by the old man said:

"I'm out of sorts."

And he sat down on the low window sill by his case, with his stick in his hand, his hands folded wearily in his lap. The types clicked on. A galley of telegraph waited.

"What gentleman is lingering with D 13?" called the foreman, who was always dangerously polished and polite when he was on the point of exploding with wrath and impatience.

Slug Nine, passing by the alley, stopped to speak to the old man sitting there so quietly.

The telegraph boy came running in with the last manifold sheet, shouting:

"Thirty!"

They carried the old man to the foreman's long table and laid him down reverently and covered his face. They took the stick out of his nerveless hand, and read his last take:

Australia as a Borrower.

The Australian Colonies have to pay England at least $60,000,000 a year, interest on borrowed money. The Governments have borrowed about $550,000,000, mortgage companies $125,000,000; and the Economist estimates the British deposits in Australian banks at nearly $60,000,000. There was a balance against these colonies on the trade with England of $35,000,000, last two years, during which the total balance due to England, under every head, was about $100,000,000. But the amount raised in England on Australian account, last year, was more than this, perhaps $10,000,000 more. What might have been expected to happen, did happen. England having more to send to Australia than to receive therefrom, shipped something like $1,600,000 in gold. The reserves of the Australian banks recently sank low, those of Victoria and New South being 2 8½ in the pound; and the banks have been trying in vain to increase them. Australia will have to slacken her swift rate of borrowing in future.

THE TERRIBLE KNOUT.

The Dreadful Punishment of a Murderer in Russia.

Mazof had murdered a man, a woman and a little boy. Before the Magistrate he made a full confesion of his guilt. A determined attempt was made by the soldiers to mob him while he was making this confession but it was repressed. He was reserved for a much more terrible punishment than that accorded by lynch law. He was sentenced to 399 lashes with the knout, which meant to be knouted to death, unless he possessed superhuman endurance.

He was marched out to punishment in company with two forgers, all St. Petersburg turning out to witness the spectacle. This horrible show is thus graphically described by the old chronicle:

"The stake prepared for him was a strong block of wood fixed in the ground with three grooves at the top and two rings near the bottom; the middle groove was for the neck, and the two others for the armpits, the rings below to lock around the ankles; about the stakes were laid coarse skins, especially where the knout-master trod, upon which lay his whips, marking irons, pincers, etc. An officer then read a paper to the people, signifying that forgery upon the Imperial bank being a capital crime, and two of the prisoners convicted of it, weree condemned to receive eleven blows with the knout, to have their nostrils pulled out, and be banished for life to Siberia; the murderer of so many persons to receive 399 blows, to be branded three times in the face, have his nostrils pulled out, and (if then alive) be banished for life to the mines of Siberia.

"The executioner and his assistants then stripped him, tied his hands across, and led him to the post. After fixing his ankles they bent his neck and arms over it, and drew the rope with which his hands were tied through the ring on the opposite side, which seemed to stretch all the muscles of the back. He then retired about four of five yards from him, and, taking up one of the knouts, worked it with his hands to give it a proper elasticity. Walking towards the prisoner with four or five steady steps, then taking a spring he struck a perpendicular stroke with a heavy, loud crack. The first stroke cut from the right side of the bottom of the neck to the left armpit. The effect was visible in a moment, and by the violence of his screams afforded reason to suppose that the pain was very great. The second was about half an inch below the first, and so on till twenty-five, when, changing the whip, the operater erased the former wound, striking from the left side to the right, and afterward quite perpendicular. The strokes were given with the greatest regularity. Between each a person might deliberately count eight the executioner always walking slowly to and from the stake.

"His cries were now so terrible that some of the spectators were obliged to turn their backs and put their fingers in their ears. All was quiet and silent, and the crack of the knout was heard a great distance. After receiving three hundred lashes the culprit's voice grew faint, and during the last one hundred he showed no signs of life whatever, the whole of the upper part of the back being beaten to a black mummy. After the last blow the assistants lifted up the face by the hair, and the executioner struck him forcibly three times with an instrument that left the initial of murderer, throwing each time a handful of black dust into the wound; after which, at two pulls, he tore the gristle of his nose, and loosened him from the block. The whole lasted about three-quarters of an hour and it was generally thought that he had been dead some time; however, he made a feeble attempt to put on his coat, and recovered sufficiently to be able to make some reparation to society by working in the iron mines."

"Why! What's the matter?" Lady—(With face enveloped in roll of hot cloths)—"Oh! I'm crazy with that Neuralgia that continually troubles me." —"Well, how foolish! Why don't you go to Hill Bro's. and get bottle of Fluid Lightning? It cured me in less than one minute. I always keep a bottle in the house. It only costs 25 cents. A. & M. 2

Special Services are still going on in the Methodist Church, with gratifying success. So far, about 300 have been blessed, and over 250 members added to the Church.—Owen Sound Times.

FLUID LIGHTNING.

There are but few that have never suffered almost intolerable pain from Toothache, Neuralgia, or like acute pains. To them such an instant relief in Fluid Lightning is an untold blessing in time of trouble. No disgusting offensive medicines to be taken for days. On application of Fluid Lightning cures. Sold at Hill Bro's. A. & M. 1

Prayer is the preface to the book of Christian living; the text of the life sermon; the girding on of the armour for battle; the pilgrim's preparations for his journey. It must be supplemented by action or it amounts to nothing.—Phelps.

THE EFFECTS OF WHISKEY.

The effects of whiskey are always evil, and those who feed upon alcoholic stimulants, vainly endeavoring to cure coughs and consumption, but nurse a viper. Hagyard's Pectoral Balsam is a remedy that is always relisble for all throat bronchial and lung troubles, and never does harm to any one.

The new C. P. R. steamers are making splendid running. The Alberta came down from the Sault in 19 hours; but the Athabasca beat that record, arriving here on Tuesday night in 16 hours and 55 minutes from Sault Ste Marie.

CURE FOR DEAFNESS.

As numerous testimonials will show, there is no more reliable cure for deafness than Hagyard's Yellow Oil. It is also the best remedy for ear ache, sore throat, croup, rheumatism, and for pains and lameness generally. Use externally and internally.

Mr. G. S. Brown has returned from the south where he has been wintering for the benefit of his health, we are pleased to note his very much improved appearance, and hope the change for the better may continue.—Meaford Monitor.

FRAUDULENT TRANSACTIONS.

There are many frauds perpetrated in medicine, and many advertised remedies worse than useless. Not so with Hagyard's Yellow Oil. It remains as ever the best internal and external medicine for all pain, soreness and injuries with which human flesh is afflicted.

Mr Chas. McConnell caught a large bear on Friday last, measuring seven feet in length. Considerable havoc had been made by the animal among the sheep in the neighborhood where he was caught, about four miles from here. A flattenod bullet was found in his lungs, that to all appearance had been there for some time.—Dundalk Herald.

A WIDE RANGE OF USEFULNESS.

The great household remedy so popular with the people—Hagyard's Yellow Oil—is alike valuable for external and internal use, curing rheumatism, colds, sore throat, croup, frost bites, burns, bruises, and all lameness and soreness of the flesh.

A Love Potion.—A young wife who thought she was losing her husband's affection went to the seventh daughter of a seventh daughter for a love powder. The mystery-woman told her: "Get a raw piece of beef, cut flat, about half an inch thick. Slice an onion in two and rub the meat on both sides with it. Put on pepper and salt, and toast it on each side over a red coal fire. Drop on it three lumps of butter and two sprigs of parsley, and get him to eat it." The young wife did so, and her husband loved her ever after.—Philadelphia Record.

WELL REWARDED.

A liberal reward will be paid to any person who will produce a case of Liver, Kidney or Stomach complaint that Electric Bitters will not speedily cure. Bring them along, it will cost you nothing for the medicine if it fails to cure, and you will be well rewarded for your trouble besides. All Blood diseases, Biliousness, Jaundice, Constipation and general debility are quickly cured. Satisfaction guaranteed or money refunded. Price only fifty cents a bottle, For sale by A. Turner & Co. 5

SPRING CLEANING.

Every good housewife will renovate the entire house at least every Spring and Fall. Our systems often need renovating also, and there is nothing better to make pure blood and cleanse and regulate all the secretions than Burdock Blood Bitters, preventing diseases incidental to the season's changes.

A VICTIM OF MISPLACED CONFIDENCE.

The individual who places trust in many of the claims of advertised remedies is often sadly disappointed, but the array of facts regarding the honest virtues of Burdock Blood Bitters are indisputable. It positively cures diseases of the blood, liver and kidneys Investigate the proofs and testimonials.

Raise Chickens.—If you have a nice little garden by all means raise chickens. Your neighbor's hens are the best ones to raise. You will find them from 5:30 a. m. until 6:20 p. m. on your lettuce, onion, radish and flower beds. You can raise them higher with a shot gun than anything else. N. B.—always eat the hen you raise. P. S.—Cook the hen before eating.

BUCKLEN'S ARNICA SALVE.

The best Salve in the world for cuts, bruises sores, ulcers, salt rheum, fever sores, tetter, chapped hands, chilblains, corns, and all skin eruptions, and positively cures piles or no pay required. It is guaranteed to give perfect satisfaction, or money refunded. Price 25 cents per box. For Sale by A. Turner & Co.

IMPORTANT CHANGES.

There are two periods in the life of every female when the system undergoes great changes. First the change from childhood to womanhood; next, that of womanhood to old age. These are the critical changes of life, and the system should be nourished and regulated by that matchless tonic, Burdock Blood Bitters. It is invaluable in all diseases peculiar to females.

Mind Your P's.—Persons who patronize papers shoulk pay promptly for the pecuniary prospects of the press have a peculiar power in pushing forward public prosperity. If the printer is paid promptly and his pocket book kept plethoric by prompt paying patrons he puts his pen to paper in peace, his paragraphs of pressing events have more pleasing colors, and the perusal of his paper is a pleasure to the people. Paste this piece of proverbial philosophy in some place where all parties can perceive.—Mirror.

A RELIABLE WITNESS.

R. N. Wheeler, of Everton, speaks highly of Hagyard's Pectoral Balsam, having seen its effects in his own case, a severe inflammation of the lungs and distressing cough, was quickly and perfectly cured, which has resisted other treatment.

A PAINFUL OCCURRENCE.

Some of the most painful sufferings that afflict mortals occur from rheumatism. Either the acute or chronic form may be eradicated from the bloon by an early use of the grand purifying system renovator, Burdock Blood Bitters.

An Exciting Race.—The Athabaska and Campana had quiet an exciting race between Port Arthur and the Sault, and also from the Sault to Cabot's Head. Both boats left the Landing Sunday evening last, the Campana leaving one hour and ten minutes ahead of the Athabaska, but at 12 o'clock Sunday night the Athabaska passed her in Lake Superior. The Athabaska led as far as White Fish Point, but getting in the ice, and consequently making slow time the Campana passed her, but only to be re-passed again, the Athabaska going through the canal first. In the race from the Sault to Cabot's Head there was only a difference of about two miles, the Athabaska having the lead, making the trip from the Sault to Owen Sound, seventeen hours the fastest time on record.—O. S. Advertiser.

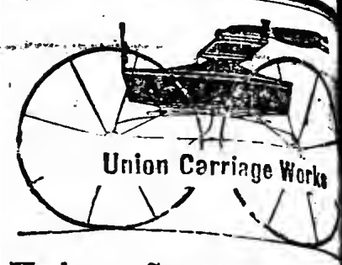
A BAD INFIRMITY.

The loss of the sense of hearing is both annoying and dangerous. Those suffering from deafness should try Hagyard's Yellow Oil according to directions. This invaluable house hold remedy cured John Clark, of Millbridge, Ontario, restoring his hearing in one week.

Letter Heads neatly printed and put up in pads at this office.



THE SECRET OUT.

The secret of beauty has been at last revealed. Without good health, pure blood and a fair clear skin none can possess good looks. What is more repulsive than pimples, blotches and a sallow or pasty complexion? Burdock Blood Bitters reveal the fact that all can gain pure blood and freedom from the repulsive diseases of the skin that result from impurities.
